Insurance can subsidize cost of home care

By JANICE CLOTH
Special to The CJN

'If you need a caregiver every day or every second day, it can add up' care will increase as well.

"As the generations are lasting longer, the chances of needing some kind of attendant care will increase. It's more likely women will need long-term-care insurance because women outlive men," Tomlinson said.

Landen says there is one thing he wishes he had during his father's final years. "I wish we had long-term-care insurance. If my father had purchased it before he became disabled, it would have helped handle the bills and expenses."

Long-term-care insurance is now available in Canada. Through the insurance, you can receive up to $300 a day to subsidize or cover the cost of home care or facility care when you or a loved one can no longer perform specific tasks or are cognitively impaired. Currently, the cost for a private long-term-care facility can range from $4,000 to $7,000 a month.

Tomlinson advises families to consider buying long-term-care insurance and to think about the potential consequences to their family's future if a family member should require long-term care, either at home or in an institution.

Long-term-care insurance is as important a part of retirement and estate planning as mutual funds and life insurance are. With the insurance, you and your family will be ready with a contingency plan and not have to react in a panic should a crisis occur.

Long-term-care insurance allows us to control the options we will have available when we or our parents grow older and need help. Through the purchase of long-term-care insurance, we can give ourselves and our families the best chance of making the best choices regarding quality of life and the level of dignity.

Life insurance is for those who are worried about what they leave behind after they die. Long-term-care insurance is for those who are concerned about living longer and not knowing if they will have enough money to maintain their quality of life.

Long-term-care insurance may be the way to ensure that you are financially prepared to look after your health without putting a strain on limited financial resources. Otherwise, you may deplete what you intended to leave your children as their inheritance or, worse, leave your children financially responsible for your care.

Some people feel that the government will take care of them. Public facilities are available for those who cannot afford private care. However, there may be long waiting lists and lack of choice in the location of the facility. You could be rooming with three other people and sharing one bathroom.

The care you provide for your parents will set an example for your children about how you would want them to care for you.

When Rachel Weiss broke her hip in 2006, she was happy that she and her husband had purchased long-term-care insurance. As long as she is on claim, she will have her care subsidized. The insurance has allowed her to stay in her own home with a live-in caregiver, without being a financial burden to her husband or children.

Long-term-care insurance is "selfish insurance" you purchase to insure that you will be looked after in the manner you feel you are entitled to.

Janice Cloth is a living benefit specialist.

Barry Landen thinks back to when his father was suffering from Alzheimer's disease before his death. Deprived of his capacities, Sid Landen needed care around the clock.

"The nurses couldn't give him the attention he needed, so we were forced to hire a private caregiver. The hospital encouraged us to hire our own caregiver because the facility was so understaffed from the budget cuts," said Landen.

Sid was one of a growing number of Canadian seniors who needed a live-in attendant, which can cost upward of $200 to $500 a day.

"Private care costs about $20 an hour, with a minimum of three hours per visit. So that's $60.00 right there," said Mary Ellen Tomlinson, founder of Senior Care Options. "If you need a caregiver every day or every second day, it can add up."

According to a Statistics Canada publication titled A Portrait of Seniors in Canada, people are living longer than in the past. Near the beginning of the 20th century, the average 65-year-old Canadian could expect to live another 13.3 years. In 2003, that individual could expect to live another 19.2 years.

Over the next 20 years, this trend will accelerate, particularly as the baby boomers begin turning 65. Stats Canada reports that by 2026, the number of seniors is projected to increase from 4.3 million to 8.0 million. As the senior population increases, you can be sure that the cost of attendant

Agency seeks to streamline local health services

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Hy Eliasoph wants to start a health-care dialogue with residents in the northern parts of the GTA.

He is CEO of Central Local Health Integration Network (LHIN), one of 14 not-for-profit community organizations set up by the province with responsibility for planning, integrating and funding local health services in 14 different geographic areas of the province.

Central LHIN, which stretches from north central Toronto through York Region to the shores of Lake Simcoe, works with more than 130 health-care organizations for the more than 1.5 million residents in its catchment area.

Eliasoph said that LHINs are based on the principle that local people – two-thirds of the Toronto-area Jewish community live in the area – are best able to determine their health service needs and priorities, and his LHIN is trying to reach them through newspapers and community groups.

He said he recently finished a round of consultation sessions, some targeted at the Jewish community.

"Our plan is driven by engaging with the community and identifying their priorities, such as aging at home and chronic care. We are mandated to build services at local levels."

The benefit of LHINs – the concept is about two years old – Eliasoph said, is that health-service decisions affecting communities are made by local people.

"We develop ways to improve access to health services, respond to concerns, and look for ways for service providers to improve quality of care."

Central LHIN plays a role in ensuring patients have better access to co-ordinated and integrated services, he said. "In Central LHIN, there are 140 organizations that fall under our umbrella. Previously, each of them would have to be approached individually. There really was no system."

"We've brought folks together and co-ordinated their planning. We're trying to create a platform so they don't have to run around from one organization to another."

By working in collaboration with health-care providers, Eliasoph said, Central LHIN is easing the flow of patients across the health-care system and improving access to services in the community.

People can reach Central LHIN through phone or e-mail, he said, or they can attend one of the many information sessions it runs. "Ideally, groups can have us come out and chat with them."

Aging at home is a big issue, Eliasoph said, and his organization has a three-year commitment to build an aging-at-home program.

"The concept is that people can continue to live in their home environment with help and support," he said.

"At some point it becomes impossible for people to remain in their own homes without help. We're trying to find an alternative to building more facilities. It's really very exciting."

For more information about upcoming events, check the agency's website at centralhin.on.ca, call the Central LHIN office at 1-866-392-5446, or e-mail central@lhins.on.ca.

Website offers info on basics of natural health

By LAURA STRICKER
CJN Intern

People looking to make the switch to living a naturally healthy lifestyle often find the wealth of information available confusing and overwhelming. Two Toronto-based women are trying to change that.

Andrea Donsky and Randy Boyer, co-founders of The Healthy Shopper, a coupon book filled with natural and organic products, started Naturally Savvy in March 2007. Naturally Savvy is an information-based website on the basics of natural health.

"Our goal is to educate people on the benefits of natural and organic products," Donsky said. "We use easy to understand terms that speak to the general public in a non-fear-based, purely educational way."

The Naturally Savvy website is designed in a user-friendly, interactive way, complete with naturallysavvytv, which includes videos on everything from the Whole Foods Market to the differences between natural and organic versus conventional meats. There is also a blog written by dentists, entrepreneurs and everyone in between. Visitors to the site can browse through many delicious – and healthy – recipes and sign up for the Naturally Savvy monthly newsletter.

Also featured is a section on Natural Nutrition, where people can send in questions to the Naturally Savvy nutritionist, Lisa Tsakos.

"Lisa is one of the smartest people I know in her field," Donsky said.

Naturally Savvy only features content that has something natural about it, and works only with companies that have similar beliefs as her and Boyer, Donsky said.

"Everyone and everything mentioned on our site has a natural component to it," she said.

Cookbooks to help you eat well this year

Lisa Weinberg

My patients and people at my lectures often ask me to recommend cookbooks that will help them make easy, nutritious meals and inspire them to add some variety to their typical repertoire of recipes.

Here, then, are some of my favourites. I chose these carefully, realizing that purchasing a book is an expense, and I would not want you to buy one you will use only once or twice. I think you'll agree that these are worth the money. The next time you're trying to come up with a creative hostess gift, consider giving a cookbook – she'll love it!

The Joy of Cooking by Irma S. Rombauer, Marion Rombauer Becker and Ethan Becker (Simon & Schuster) – This is very simply my bible, the book I use most often and refer to always, from when I was first married. It has it all, whether you're making a roast, a sauce, a dressing, sushi, baking, it's all there and I have never made a bad recipe from it. This is a fabulous gift for a bride!

The Eat-Clean Diet Cookbook: Great-Tasting Recipes That Keep You Lean by Tosca Reno (Robert Kennedy Publishing) – This is a new book and I love it. The recipes are easy, healthy and delicious, and the book will inspire you to wake up tomorrow and have oatmeal for breakfast. Try egg white and turkey scramble, garlicky couscous, whole wheat flax cookies and wheat berry salad. This book has many good vegetarian recipes too.

Kosher by Design, Short on Time by Susie Fishbein (ArtScroll/Shaar Press) – This is an excellent, picturesque book.

Try spinach, strawberry, banana salad; cookie brittle; cherry tomato crisp; and turkey marsala with artichokes.

Norene's Healthy Kitchen: Eat Your Way to Good Health by Norene Gilletz (Whitecap Books) – I have long been a loyal user of all of Gilletz's books, from her food processor book to Meal-Lean-i-Yumm, now called Healthy Helpings, and the newest, Healthy Kitchens. Her recipes are healthy, easy and family friendly. Try crunchy roasted chick peas, confetti vegetable strudel, chocolate zucchini walnut muffins and Passover meat lasagna.

Food to Live By by Myra Goodman (Workman Publishing Company, Inc.) – This is an Earthbound Farm organic cookbook, but you don't have to buy organic to love the fresh flavours in the book, which has interesting sidebar information. You'll love these recipes. Try hearty cauliflower bisque, roasted beet and arugula salad with walnuts and feta, fusion coleslaw and pumpkin pecan muffins.

Real Simple, Meals Made Easy, published by Real Simple magazine – This is from one of my favourite magazines. The book is colourful, and the recipes are easy and delicious.

"We work with companies who are true to our beliefs."

Donsky and Boyer have many future plans for Naturally Savvy, as well as for other projects. They are currently working with a literary agent and are writing a book together.

"We want to be the number 1 source for trusted information," Donsky said.

The two health connoisseurs are also hoping to expand into the media, whether it is through radio or on television – anything that will get Naturally Savvy more publicity, she said.

For people who want to adopt a healthier lifestyle but are not sure how to begin, Donsky has some simple tips.

She suggests starting by taking one or two products that get a lot of use, such as milk, and substituting it with something natural or organic. Donsky also recommends buying organic fruits and vegetables.

For cleaning products, she suggests gradually replacing chemical ones with natural products. When you run out of a certain cleaning product, Donsky says to replace it with something natural.

What is important to remember, she added, is that trying natural cleaning products requires patience.

"Your expectations have to be altered," she said. "Chemical products tend to work faster than natural ones, so you need to be patient."

"Natural products might take a bit more patience and experimenting. It's all about finding the right product that works for you."

To get started on the path to a healthier lifestyle, visit the Naturally Savvy website at www.naturallysavvy.com. For discounts on natural and organic products, visit Donsky and Boyer's other site, The Healthy Shopper, at www.healthysupplier.ca.

Keeping a journal can promote weight loss

I have long been a fan of keeping a journal, and often recommend it to my clients as a fantastic tool in their overall success.

So whether it's to help you focus, set goals, cope with stress, have a catharsis or just keep your thoughts in one place, keeping a journal can have a myriad of positive outcomes.

Life
Coach Corner

Judy
Sibling-Librach

When we write things down, we gain clarity, inspiration, focus, wisdom, joy and creativity, all elements that can improve our lives both personally and professionally.

Julia Cameron, in her book The Artist's Way, suggests a technique I absolutely love. It's called the "morning pages."

Every morning, you write three pages in a journal on whatever comes to mind. Initially, this is a way to release your stress, worries and anxieties, which clears your concerns and frees you to write about what excites and delights you. Once you have released all of the negative chatter, there is room to record your inspirations, exciting dreams, goals and ideas. But probably the most advantageous reason to keep a journal is that by committing to do something in writing, you really do make things happen. In Henriette Klausner's book, Write It Down to Make It Happen, she tells story after story of celebrities who wrote down their dreams and goals, which contributed to their success.

Cameron suggests writing in a journal every day for 21 days to get into the habit; to write in the morning and don't aim for perfection, just aim for writing three pages the moment you get up. Keep the journal with you for inspiration and don't judge your writing in any way.

As a longtime fan of these "morning pages," I was thrilled to discover Cameron's latest book, The Writing Diet: Write Yourself Right-Size. As I am someone who is constantly looking for inspirational weight-loss aids and is often being asked by people to help them get to their ideal weight, I thought the book was worth perusing.

Essentially, Cameron suggests writing the "morning pages" every day, along with writing every time you feel like eating.

She says: "Writing brings motion into our lives. A habit of daily 'morning pages' brings us into contact with our thoughts and feelings. We learn what's eating us. From our food journal, we learn what we ourselves are eating. This is good as far as it goes, but it doesn't go quite far enough. We need to exercise as well, and the best way to do this is by walking. Twenty minutes a day can be chiselled out of the busiest life simply by replacing our worrying with walking, and walking does help teach us not to worry. When we walk, our problems are drawn to scale."

She also talks about the four questions, which should not be confused with the four questions we ask at the Passover seder. They are: Am I hungry?; is this what I feel like eating?; is this what I feel like eating now?; and is there something else that I could eat instead?

By asking these questions, we become more aware, and have more energy and optimism, Cameron says. Another tool she recommends for weight loss is to use the word HALT, which stands for what to do if we get too hungry, angry, too lonely or too tired, and how those are all conditions that make us vulnerable. This technique is a reminder to eat regularly, write things down to make them happen, and keep tracking your experiences.

There are many other tools that Cameron recommends, including "triggers," "body buddies" and how to "picture yourself perfect," but it all comes back to this – whether you're on a "writing diet"; a "writing your dreams and goals"; or "writing away your worries," keeping a journal is an easy, effective and enjoyable way of making things happen. And any kind of reflection, when practiced through keeping a journal, has been shown to have a variety of positive outcomes. As TV talk-show host Oprah Winfrey says, "Writing in a journal will change your life in ways you've never imagined."

So whether you want to win a Pulitzer Prize, get a promotion, find love in your life, lose weight, solve a problem or find more joy, fun, adventure and peace of mind, pick up a pen and paper and start writing!

Israel's skin-care industry goes natural

By ORIT ARFA
ISRAEL21c

In biblical, talmudic and medieval times, it was not unusual for the empires that ruled Israel's soil to exploit the healing properties of trees and plants indigenous to the country. Over the last decade, a growing number of Israeli researchers and companies have rediscovered these ancient herbal formulas and repackaged them as healthy natural alternatives to mainstream skin-care and hair products.

"The herbal remedies have always existed, but we never granted them importance," said herbalist Shimon Shemla. "But today, more and more people are finding that they lack effective answers to viruses, allergies, and even cancer, so they are returning to the sources."

Fifteen years ago, Shemla left his career as a real-estate developer to study botany, naturopathy, and ancient herbal remedies. Five years later, he founded Merapeh Habosem (Simple Natural in English), a study centre and small-scale manufacturer specializing in ancient Hebrew remedies.

Shemla has studied and documented the properties of more than 500 herbs, plants and trees, many of which feature prominently in his serums, shampoos, soaps, ointments, toners and peels. Using homeopathic techniques, he concocts recipes for the hair and skin using plants and trees mentioned in the Bible and Talmud.

In the Judean desert, Herbs of Kedem specializes in plants cultivated in a specific desert region: the dunes located between the Dead Sea, the lowest place on earth, and the cool Hebron hills. Research conducted by Nissim Amzallag, the company's founder, has shown that these plants contain compounds that allow them to adapt to the harsh and extreme climates of the region.

"If they can regenerate themselves effectively, Amzallag assumed they would have a similar effect on humans," explained chemical engineer Amir Kitron, CEO of Herbs of Kedem. The company's products have been shown to effectively treat nail fungus, psoriasis, dermatitis, acne, scars, and hair loss. The company has set up a non-profit research and development center near its factory in Moshav Carmel to further explore scientifically the medical uses and benefits of the plants.

Herbs of Kedem has established itself as one of Israel's leaders in the field of natural skin care in part because of the purity of its products and ingredients.

"We are fanatic about using no synthetic ingredients whatsoever," Kitron told ISRAEL21c. He considers moisturizing creams particularly problematic, since they are created by bonding oil and water, an unstable compound which usually requires preservatives to ward off bacteria. As an alternative to lotions, Herbs of Kedem has created a line of moisturizing ointments made from essential oils.

In Afula, Moraz Galilee Medical Herbs specializes in a unique plant prolific in the Galilee: polygonum, which contains natural anti-oxidant and anti-bacterial compounds that have been found to repair tissue and promote the healing of wounds. About 90 per cent of the company's products feature this ingredient.

Jamal Hamoud, co-founder of Aya Natural.

"Polygonum is found in other countries and cultures, but the strain grown in Israel is known to have higher healing properties than other strains around the world due to the climate, atmosphere and minerals in the Galilean soil," says Moraz's CEO Ofer Mor.

The Galilee is not only a breeding ground for a variety of herbs and plants, but for coexistence between the variety of peoples and cultures represented in Israel.

Aya Natural, a natural cosmetics company, is headquartered in the Druze village of Beit Jann. The Druze people, an offshoot of Islam since the 10th century, have been taking advantage of the medicinal properties of herbs, plants and trees growing in the Galilee for centuries.

Aya's two founders, Ziad Dabour, a pharmacist, and Jamal Hamoud, a chemist, deliberately built their boutique and visitors centre in Beit Jann to bring employment to their village. Their mission is to combine modern pharmaceutical knowledge with Druze tradition.

"In the Druze tradition and in Beit Jann in particular, we wrapped babies in olive oil and myrtle powder for immunization," said Hamoud.

Most of Aya's products are 100 per cent natural and biodegradable, made from Galilean olive oil and other essential oils, and they are sold across Israel and Europe.

While Israel has long been recognized in the skin-care industry for its Dead Sea products, there has been a surge of worldwide interest in Israel's plant-based products as well.

"The demand for alternative cosmetic or pharmaceutical products in Israel and the world is growing 15 to 20 per cent annually, compared to a two to five per cent growth of conventional skin-care and cosmetics products," says Mor.

"More people are in search of natural products, particularly Israeli-made products," says Gilia Gilad, a naturopath based in Jerusalem. "The awareness of what people put in their mouth is increasing, but so is what they put on their body."

And while several Israeli companies are expanding their markets abroad, Gilad thinks the best beneficiaries are Israelis.

"It's known that the organism of the human body is an inextricable part of nature, and therefore it responds better to ingredients found in their natural habitat. This is true for food, and certainly with regards to ingredients that come in contact with the skin."

Mindfulness meditation can prevent depression's return

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For the millions of people who suffer from depression, Dr. Zindel Segal, the chair of psychotherapy for the psychiatry department at the University of Toronto, has good news.

Based on clinical and scientific research, the practice of mindfulness meditation can reduce the likelihood of a relapse into depression by 50 per cent, Segal said.

In October, Segal was in Atlanta at a conference called Mindfulness, Compassion and the Treatment of Depression, sharing a stage with the Dalai Lama, and giving his findings about the benefits of mindfulness meditation, in which people learn to watch their thoughts in a non-judgmental way. It is a technique that plays a central role in Buddhism.

"Part of what happens to the brain when we pay attention and learn how to watch our thoughts is that... we're developing a platform from which we can watch what our minds are doing," said Segal, who heads the cognitive behavior therapy unit at the Center for Addiction and Mental Health and authored a book titled The Mindful Way Through Depression.

"When we are able to do that, we are less likely to be hijacked by the messages that our minds give us. The training in meditation is really how to develop a platform of observation and non-judgment. You could be practising mindfulness meditation and get very good at watching your thoughts, and you might also notice that you have a lot of negative thoughts during the day."

He added that if you're not aware of the prevalence of negative thoughts, it can lead to physical tension in the body, and even changes in the levels of stress hormones.

"You basically believe and buy into those messages. With mindfulness meditation, part of what you're helping yourself do is to develop an awareness that these thoughts are going through my mind. I don't necessarily have to believe them or act on them, I can just watch them," said Segal, who is conducting a study funded by the National Institute of Mental Health in Washington, D.C., on the prevention of relapse in recurrent depression.

"It is unusual for the United States to fund a study in Canada, and it looks at the use of this mindfulness program with people who have been treated with anti-depressants for their depression."

He said that this work is meant to help people who have recovered from bouts of depression and anxiety, and want to find ways of preventing a recurrence.

"Depression is one of the most common mental health problems faced by our society. It is so common that it has been called the common cold of mental illness. In general, close to eight per cent of the population suffer from depression, which is very high... The difficulty faced by many of these folks is that depression tends to come back into their lives at an alarming rate."

But Segal said that advances in this area have shown that there are different ways to stay mentally healthy.

"You can use an anti-depressant drug, you can go speak to a therapist to help pull you out of the depression, but then to stay well, there are a number of practices that have been found through clinical trials to promote wellness, to increase people's ability to work wisely with their emotions and, ultimately, they will have lower risk for the recurrence of their illness."

"One of these happens to be learning about mindfulness and mindfulness meditation. It is an unusual thing to be doing in terms of secular health care and part of the interest is that it is an approach that is being used more broadly with physical problems that is now starting to find a home in the treatment of psychiatric problems."

Segal said the Dalai Lama was very interested in understanding how the practice of mindfulness meditation, which originated in Buddhism to calm and still the mind, has been imported into the field of medicine and psychiatry.

"When we teach people these practices, we don't teach them anything about Buddhism or anything that has to do with a religious basis. It is taught as a way of taking care of yourself as a kind of treatment, not as a doctrine," Segal said.

"[The Dalai Lama] is very encouraging of these different forms of mental training being used by as many people as possible. He's not trying to say that to do this you need to be a Buddhist... He feels that if this practice can help people reduce their suffering and help them feel more positive then that is enough."

Mindfulness meditation has been developed and clinically tested as an eight-week group program. During the group sessions, patients practice mindfulness, and they also are given CDs with which to practise at home.

Segal said that two of the clinical trials that have been done have used the mindfulness meditation method on its own.

Dentist fights bad breath

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For Dr. Harold Katz, a California-based dentist, eating a raw onion during an interview is routine.

Known as the bad breath guru, Katz is an expert in the field.

"Bad breath can ruin your career, your romance, your chic designer outfit... and your life," says Katz, founder of the California Breath Clinics and creator of the TheraBreath System, an oral rinse and toothpaste that act on the bacteria that cause bad breath.

In Toronto recently, Katz, who has appeared on such shows as 20/20, The Today Show and Good Morning America, said his interest in bad breath dates back to the early 1990s, when his then-13-year-old daughter had a severe and chronic breath problem.

"Despite immaculate oral hygiene with the most popular products, the problem persisted. You can imagine how a young girl felt about that. She was in tears."

Armed with a degree in bacteriology, Katz realized that her bad breath was caused by a group of bacteria that breed within the tongue's surface and throat. Under certain conditions, these bacteria initiate the production of the volatile sulfur compounds found in bad breath.

"Despite what some highly advertised products falsely claim, bad breath does not come from the digestive system."

He began to experiment with products that would attack these bacteria, and the resulting products, refined over and over again, "have shown astonishing results. Tests have resulted in the complete elimination of over 98 per cent of the compounds that cause bad breath within the mouth."

It was at this point in the interview that Katz took out his halimetre, a hand-held device that measures the acceptability ty of people's breath, and chomped down on the onion.

While most products did nothing to hide his onion breath, TheraBreath oral rinse took it away.

"I've proven with my onion breath that over-the-counter breath mints, mouthwashes, chewing gum and breath-freshening toothpastes — they are a $6-billion business in Canada — don't even make a dent [on bad breath.] In fact, they make bad breath even worse. Our aim is to get rid of the odour, not add flavour."

With the Los Angeles branch of his clinic located next to the Twentieth Century Fox studios, Katz said that he has helped a number of celebrities with their oral health problems, especially those who are filming scenes involving kissing and extreme close-ups.

"Throughout the day or evening, even during a quick break in their schedules, stars would dash into my office to grab some TheraBreath to give to their co-stars whose bad breath was interfering with their concentration and even making them forget their lines.

"Hollywood stars are obsessed with the challenge of constantly maintaining sweet-smelling breath.

They've learned the hard way that over-the-counter mints, gums, toothpastes and sprays don't give them 24/7 results—and peace of mind. Imagine greeting an adoring fan or a journalist with stinky breath."

TheraBreath has become popular on the Hollywood circuit, he said. "Everybody is using it — stars, agents, producers, even production crews [because] the toothpaste and oral rinse contain natural ingredients that maintain good oral health. No alcohol, peroxide, harsh chemicals — just brush and rinse twice daily. Today, Hollywood is into heavy breathin' n' smoochin' without the worry."

Asked for tips about avoiding bad breath, Katz advised to avoid alcohol, cauliflower, cabbage, sugar — it feeds bacteria — dairy foods and high protein diets.

"As well, certain medications such as antihistamines and birth control pills, and hormonal changes such as menopause or puberty can cause bad breath," he said.

Drink a lot of water to replenish saliva and eat fruits and vegetables such as celery, watermelon and strawberries, he said. "They are nature's way of keeping breath fresh."

TheraBreath products are available in Ontario at Shoppers Drug Mart and PharmaPlus.

Finding relief from annoying migraines

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Although doctors are still learning about what triggers migraine headaches, sufferers need to know that there are several methods of treatment that could reduce their suffering.

"We do know a lot more than we did 10 to 20 years ago, but there is still a lot that evades us. What we do know is that it is a biological disorder, just like asthma, diabetes and high blood pressure," said Dr. Ian Finkelstein, director of the Toronto Headache and Pain Clinic who specializes in treating chronic headaches and other forms of chronic pain.

He said that according to a national migraine survey done in 2005, about 38 per cent of migraines don't seek medical help and suffer in silence because of a misconception that migraines can't be treated.

"One of the big problems for patients is that it is either under-diagnosed or misdiagnosed, or when it is diagnosed, it isn't properly treated," he said.

"If you're going to get migraines, there are lifestyle modifications, there are things you can do to try to decrease attacks," Finkelstein said.

But first, it is important to understand how a migraine affects a sufferer.

Many people who have migraines experience nausea and vomiting with their attacks. It has been reported that some experience an "aura"—blurred vision, numbness and tingling—before an attack.

Finkelstein said that migraine is a disorder of the central nervous system in which the central nervous system becomes hyper-sensitive to specific triggers or various stimuli.

"You typically hear these migraines are sensitive to change in weather or sensitive to their period, or sensitive to certain foods," he said, adding that there is also often a genetic connection.

"It is a disorder of both the nerve cells in the brain and the blood vessels surrounding the outside of the brain. These nerve cells in the brain... tend to be activated by a mechanism that we still don't understand. What we do know is that once these nerve cells do become activated in the brain, it precipitates this cascade of other events," Finkelstein explained.

"These events will cause the release of what we call inflammatory substances that surround the blood vessels in the brain and the surrounding tissue on the outside of the brain. By virtue of having these inflammatory substances around the blood vessels and the surrounding tissue outside the brain, these pain pathways become activated and then these patients end up with horrid migraines."

Finkelstein said that on top of the challenge of living with these attacks that are "extraordinarily disabling," many patients are misunderstood.

"People who don't suffer from migraines don't understand migrainers. A migraine patient calls in, or is at work and says, 'I have a horrible migraine. I have to leave.'"

"You mean, you have a headache?"

"No, I have a migraine."

"Well, you know, take two Tylenol and get back to work. That's what I do when I get a headache." The idea that a migraine is just a headache is a misnomer," Finkelstein said.

Women tend to suffer from migraines at a rate much higher than men—at a ratio of three to one—and they often have their first attack around the time of puberty because their estrogen levels change.

"It is the fluctuation of hormone levels that cause women to be more sensitive to migraines."

Many women stop having migraine headaches after menopause because their estrogen levels "settle right down," Finkelstein said.

What can Botox® do for you?

Botox®, which is marketed as Botox Cosmetic® for cosmetic purposes, is a muscle-relaxing agent that has proven to be a safe and effective ally in the battle against the aging face. It smoothes out forehead wrinkles, frown lines (which can create an angry facial expression), crow's feet, and lines around the upper lip, and it can relax prominent neck cords. In addition, Botox® significantly reduces excessive underarm sweating.

What does the treatment involve?

Botox® is injected into a few points either in the skin or in the muscles under the skin. It takes less than 15 minutes to perform, and patients can resume their daily activities right away. Significant improvement is usually seen within a week, and the best result appears after a few weeks.

ACCREDITATION: Dr. Stephen Kraft is one of Canada's Botox® pioneers. In 1985, he became the first doctor in Ontario to use Botox®. Dr. Kraft has authored or co-authored more than a dozen publications on Botox®, and has lectured on that subject to Ophthalmologists, Family Physicians, Optometrists, Neurologists, and Allied Health Personnel.

Doctors rely on patient's description

Since there are no blood tests or X-rays that can help a doctor make the diagnosis, doctors rely on a patient's description of their symptoms.

Although there is no cure for migraine attacks, patients should work with a doctor to establish a treatment plan that could lessen the frequency and duration of the attacks.

Eating a healthy diet and avoiding triggers such as alcohol, could help lessen an attack. Biofeedback, which involves learning to control how your body reacts to stress, yoga, and more sleep can also help, Finkelstein said.

"Exercise is key for these patients because it releases endorphins in your body, which is beneficial. If you exercise, you'll sleep well, and if you sleep the same every night and you sleep the same hours, that will improve your migraines."

He said that when it comes to treatment while you're suffering from a migraine, patients are often prescribed triptan medications that relieve pain by narrowing blood vessels and balancing the chemicals in the brain.

Migraine sufferers are also encouraged to take anti-inflammatory medications such as ibuprofen.

"What the recent literature is now showing, is that the combination of both an anti-inflammatory and a triptan medication is far superior than either alone."

He said that there is also an option to take drugs such as beta-blockers, anti-depressants and anti-epileptic medications on a daily basis as a preventative measure.

"They aren't necessarily going to get rid of the migraine headaches completely, but they will change the frequency, severity and duration of the headaches."

Finkelstein said he is currently involved in a phase-three clinical research trial to get approval by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and Health Canada to use Botox in chronic migraines.

"What Botox does is that it is supposed to relax the muscles by inhibiting the release of acetylcholine. It relaxes the muscles and people don't frown. What the literature suggests is that Botox will inhibit the release of various chemicals that are involved in a migraine attack. By virtue of injecting Botox in set areas in the head, it will stop the release of these chemicals and stop that migraine cascade from going on and on and causing recurrent attacks," Finkelstein said, adding that he expects to hear if this technique has been approved by the summertime.

For more information about migraine attacks and how to deal with them, visit www.headachenetwork.ca or www.headaches.org.

Chiropractic, conventional medicine can be complementary

Later, when she was comfortable, she started lying down in the chair to receive the light adjustments that are so gentle they can even be used on newborns. (In adults, adjustments sometimes cause an audible "crack" as trapped carbon dioxide is released; this type of adjustment is not done with children.)

Done right, Nusbaum believes chiropractic and conventional medicine can be complementary, as long as patients and doctors are open with one another. "All my patients' MDs know that they come to see me," Nusbaum says.

He's seen mostly positive responses from the medical community and received many referrals from local doctors.

In Czukar's case, it was actually her family doctor who first suggested she try chiropractic before consulting a rheumatologist. "We're working towards the same goal," says Nusbaum. "If it's possible to get better without taking medication, I think that's terrific."

When Czukar first told her pediatrician that her kids were seeing a chiropractor, the doctor "was neither here nor there," she says. "He didn't jump up and down and say, 'Are you crazy?'"

About Olivia's vanishing eczema, he simply said, "It could happen."

"We don't see much relevance to it in terms of pediatric care," Leduc explains. If there is benefit, it's probably attributable to a placebo effect. And he remains concerned about the expense of repeated chiropractic visits with so little scientific validation.

But as Czukar says: "If it's not showing a benefit, I'm not going to spend money for it... I saw the results for myself, and [saw them] so quickly for my daughter."

"Most doctors aren't giving enough credit to patients," Nusbaum says. Like the patient whose doctor told him chiropractic was far too risky, without mentioning the risks associated with the anti-inflammatory drugs he prescribed instead: unpleasant complications ranging from gastrointestinal bleeding to death. The patient had no idea. He simply trusted his doctor.

Although Leduc and the CPS remain skeptical about birth trauma and the use of chiropractic adjustments to eliminate colic and chronic conditions in childhood, Nusbaum says the proof is in the calmer, happier, healthier kids - even if medical science doesn't understand it fully.

"Ask a mother: if it works, it works."

What people are doing is learning how to look after their emotions

"This has been done with people who were treated with an anti-depressant and then when they were no longer on their anti-depressant. They went through the mindfulness program, and they were able to reduce their risk of relapse of depression."

He said they are also testing the method on people who are on an anti-depressant, and tests have shown that it can be combined with drugs as well.

"What people are doing is learning how to look after their emotions in a way that is more helpful, more kind, and eventually more effective."

An afternoon nap proven great for the brain box

A 90-minute daytime nap helps speed up the process of long-term memory consolidation, a recent study by Prof. Avi Karni and Dr. Maria Korman of the Center for Brain and Behavior Research at the University of Haifa found.

The research was published last fall in the journal Nature Neuroscience.

"We still don't know the exact mechanism of the memory process that occurs during sleep, but the results of this research suggest that it is possible to speed up memory consolidation, and in the future, we may be able to do it artificially," Karni says.

Long-term memory is defined as a permanent memory that doesn't disappear or that disappears after many years. This part of our memory is divided into two types – memories of "what" (for example, what happened yesterday or what one remembers from an article one read yesterday) and memories of "how to" (for example, how to read Hebrew, drive, play basketball or play the piano).

The new research, conducted by researchers at the University of Haifa in co-operation with the Sleep Laboratory at the Sheba Medical Center and researchers from the psychology department at the University of Montreal, revealed that a daytime nap changes the course of consolidation in the brain. Two groups of participants in the study practised a repeated motor activity that consisted of bringing the thumb and a finger together in a specific sequence. The research examined the "how" aspect of memory in the participants' ability to perform the task quickly and in the correct sequence. One of the groups was allowed to nap for an hour and a half after learning the task, while the other group stayed awake.

The group that slept in the afternoon showed a distinct improvement in their task performance by that evening, compared with the group that stayed awake, which did not show any improvement. Following an entire night's sleep, both groups exhibited the same skill level.

"This part of the research showed that a daytime nap speeds up performance improvement in the brain. After a night's sleep, the two groups were at the same level, but the group that slept in the afternoon improved much faster than the group that stayed awake," Karni says.

A second experiment showed that another aspect of memory consolidation is also accelerated by sleep. It had previously been shown that during the six to eight hours after completion of an effective practice session, the neural process of "how" memory consolidation is susceptible to interference – if, for example, one learns or performs a second, different task, one's brain will not be able to successfully remember the first trained task.

A third group of participants in the University of Haifa study learned a different thumb-to-finger movement sequence two hours after practising the first task. As the second task was introduced at the beginning of the six to eight hours during which the brain consolidates memories, the second task disturbed the memory consolidation process and this group did not show any improvement in their ability to perform the first task, either in the evening of that day or on the following morning.

When a fourth group of participants was allowed a 90-minute nap between learning the first set of movements and the practising second, they did not show much improvement in the evening, but the following morning, these participants showed a marked improvement in their performance, as if there had been no interference at all.

"This part of the study demonstrated for the first time, that daytime sleep can shorten the time 'how to' memory becomes immune to interference and forgetting. Instead of six to eight hours, the brain consolidated the memory during the 90 minute nap," explains Karni, who added that while this study demonstrates that the process of memory consolidation is accelerated during daytime sleep, it is still not clear which mechanisms are accelerated in the process.

The elucidation of these mechanisms, the researchers say, could enable researchers to develop methods to accelerate memory consolidation in adults and create stable memories in a short time. Until then, if you need to memorize something quickly, or if your schedule is filled with different activities that require learning "how" to do things, it is worth finding the time for an afternoon nap.

Israelis from Tel Aviv and elsewhere joined residents of Sderot on Sunday to protest what they said were the failed policies of the Olmert government regarding the unceasing barrage of Qassam rockets into Sderot from Hamas-ruled Gaza. The Tel Aviv protest followed a similar one in Jerusalem. Please see related stories on page 4 and 29.

Gaza's Hamas rulers go into hiding

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Leaders of the ruling Hamas movement in the Gaza Strip have scaled back their public appearances and stepped up other security measures, fearing Israeli assassination attempts in response to a wave of Palestinian rocket attacks on southern Israel, Hamas officials said Monday.

The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and the Shin Bet internal security service are preparing to step up assassinations against key Hamas figures in the Gaza Strip, in response to the continued Qassam rocket attacks against Sderot.

The renewed campaign of targeted killings is not likely, at this stage, to include members of the Hamas political leadership.

Hamas spokesman Fawzi Barhoum said: "We are taking all the precautions. We take the Israeli threats seriously."

He declined to elaborate, but top Hamas officials, including Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, have not been seen in public for several days.

The Al-Quds Al-Arabi daily reported on Sunday that Haniyeh has gone underground as a result of Israel's assassination campaign. According to the report, Haniyeh has disclosed his whereabouts only to his closest aides and guards.

Hamas' spokesman in the Gaza Strip, Sami Abu Zuhri, warned that Hamas would use "all means necessary" against such an assassination campaign, Israel Radio reported.

"Our response to attacks on Hamas leaders will be unprecedented," he said.

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Haim Ramon said on Monday that a number of actions could topple Gaza's Hamas leaders within months.

Durban II counter-conference to proceed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A proposed counter-conference that would run parallel to Durban II continues to gather support from parliamentarians around the world, says Senator Jerry Grafstein, the Canadian lawmaker behind the alternative event.

Grafstein has been calling on his contacts among parliamentarians around the world for their support for an anti-Durban conference that would run in the same city as Durban II — the followup to the 2001 United Nations anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa — but would focus on anti-racism and anti-Semitism.

The parallel conference would serve as a corrective to the UN-sponsored gathering, which is likely to reprise the anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism that characterized the original Durban conference, Grafstein said.

Jerry Grafstein

U.S. Congressman Alcee Hastings has agreed to join Grafstein as head of an organizing committee.

MPs from a number of western democracies and other states have given verbal support to the parallel conference. "I've discussed it with parliamentarians in Europe, Africa, the United States, Australia and Canada, and so far the response has been positive," Grafstein said. "They like the idea in principle."

Grafstein said he expects many will sign on to assist in assembling a program "of outstanding international speakers" and to offer

Hatemonger Jailed

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress and the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center commended the B.C. Supreme Court last week for convicting Keith Noble, 32, of rural Fort St. John, for wilfully promoting hatred against Jews, gays and non-whites in Internet postings he made on his own website from 2003 to 2005. He was sentenced to four months in jail and three years probation, and he was ordered to stay off the Internet. His computer equipment was also to be forfeited and destroyed. Police said the Wiesenthal Center tipped them off to Noble's postings.

Natives Visit Israel

TORONTO — Seventeen aboriginal women are back in Canada after a recent 11-day tour of Israel organized by Canadian Jewish Congress and financed by Toronto businessman Larry Tanenbaum. The women on the trip included lawyers, tribal chiefs and academics from such places as Calgary and the Yukon. CJC has organized tours to Israel for native Canadians in the past and said it plans to do more.

Canadian Forces Report Raps Israel

OTTAWA — A Canadian Forces inquiry blamed Israeli forces for the killing of four UN observers, including one Canadian, during the Second Lebanon War.

An Israeli air strike on a UN Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO) post in southern Lebanon on July 26, 2006, was "tragic and preventable," said the investigative report, delivered Feb. 1.

"The board was unable to determine if a specific individual was to blame for the death; the board does however find that, as an organization, the [Israel Defence Forces] is responsible," it added, complaining of limited co-operation from Israel in the probe.

Aside from Canadian Maj. Paeta Hess-Von Krudener, the others killed were from China, Austria and Finland. Israel apologized for the incident, calling it an accident.

The UN secretary general at the time, Kofi Annan, angered Israel by calling the attack "intentional." Israel's Winograd Commission of inquiry into the war, which published its conclusions this month, provided no new details on the controversial shelling.

"This was a tragic accident that demonstrates the very real dangers inherent in the work that members of the Canadian Forces are asked to do on a daily basis," Canada's chief of defence staff, Gen. Rick Hillier, said.

New Prayer Rapped

ROME — A coalition of Jewish groups expressed disappointment at the new text of the Catholic Church's Prayer for the Jews. The prayer removes offensive language, including a reference to Jews' "blindness" and a call that God "may lift the veil from their hearts," but still prays for the salvation of the Jews through conversion to Christianity. Pope Benedict XVI on Feb. 5 unveiled the replacement for the Good Friday prayer in Latin, which is not used by most Catholics. "We had hoped that the prayer in the Latin rite would be the same as that of the universal Catholic liturgy in use since 1970," said Rabbi David Rosen, chairman of the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations. "This new version for the Latin rite appears to be a regression from the path advanced by the declaration of the Second Vatican Council... [which affirmed] the eternal validity of God's divine Covenant with the Jewish People."

Trustee to seek Jewish programs in TDSB schools

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

While the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) continues to struggle with the divisive idea of an "Africentric" school, Josh Matlow, the trustee for St. Paul's who opposes the plan, says it could open the door to more faith-based programming in the public system.

As a dissenting voice in the board's 11-9 vote on Jan. 29 to approve a publicly funded black-only school for Toronto, Matlow believes there's a better way to foster cultural harmony in the city.

Speaking to The CJN last week – after unsuccessfully calling for an emergency meeting to try to reverse the board's decision – Matlow said that once the Africentric school issue calms down, he hopes to renew his push to have the TDSB fund more multicultural programming for Jewish and other ethnic children in public schools.

Following up on his statements from last fall's provincial election campaign – when he took a middle-ground approach between the

Liberals' stance against any public funding for faith-based schools and the Conservatives' call to fund them as part of the public system – Matlow said he will put forward proposals this summer to "explore" more ways to bring "faith-based programming" into public schools.

Matlow said he believes that when TDSB staff table a report in May on issues such as operational budgets and enrolment figures for a black-only school, the idea will lose steam and possibly be overturned due to a lack of finances and a projected lack of enrolment.

That's when he hopes to begin his push for public cultural programming.

"I've always been advocating for more optional programs and courses for all kids... African, aboriginal and many other cultures," said Matlow, who is Jewish. "The reality in our society is we have Muslims, Jews and others who need to learn about one another."

During the 2007 election campaign, he said he planned to urge the TDSB to study options for funding alternate programs for ethnic communities.

"There are several models... One might be to create Jewish, Muslim, Hindu, etc. 'immersion' or 'enrichment' programs at some of Toronto's public schools where there is interest and demand," Matlow told The CJN last September. "Another model might be to welcome some faith-independent schools into the TDSB, with full funding."

Despite his public calls for cultural co-existence, Matlow said he was the target of anti-Semitic remarks for his "nay" vote during the heated Africentric school debate.

"One of the comments [from a supporter of the Africentric school] was 'We're gonna shut down your Jewish schools,'" he said. "It was absolutely uncalled for and was repeated in various forms throughout the night."

The next evening, on Jan. 30, Matlow said he faced more bigotry, this time from a woman with whom he said he'd previously had an "affable" working relationship.

"I was told, 'It's the rich Jews that built the projects the black people live in.' I stared in disbelief. I hadn't received a blatant anti-Semitic comment like that since I was a child and am still getting over it," he said.

Trustee Stephanie Payne, who is black, reportedly also faced threats and derogatory comments because of her opposition to the proposal. Police are investigating.

Speaking to The CJN last week, TDSB chair John Campbell said that before taking any action in Matlow's case, he wants to meet with the woman who allegedly uttered the anti-Semitic remarks to him.

Ghouls govern Gaza

The leadership of Hamas in Gaza must be feeling quite robustly smug about their achievements in the past few days.

Last weekend, their ongoing fusillade of Qassam rockets "successfully" targeted Israelis.

Two brothers in Sderot were severely wounded on Shabbat. The younger of the two, an eight-year-old, lost one of his legs.

Many residents were treated for shock. And a number of others, long past the boiling point of their anger, travelled to Jerusalem to protest what they described as the government's failure to defend against the continued rocket fire. The Sderotis and a number of Jerusalemites blocked the main highway entrance to the city and then picketed in front of the prime minister's residence.

The rockets that landed near the brothers were part of a barrage of some 40 rockets launched into Israel from Gaza on Friday and Saturday. Israel, of course, correctly retaliated for the attack on Sderot that harmed the two brothers. The Hamas leaders who govern in Gaza with such ghoulish glee should not be allowed to feel they are protected by any sense of immunity for the atrocities they continue to perpetrate on Israel. Merely hours after the two brothers were hurt, the IDF sent its own missile that killed a local leader of Hamas in Rafah, in southern Gaza, who was part of the network that smuggles arms from Egypt.

The Hamas leaders who plan and direct the rocket attacks against the Jewish state are of two minds regarding Israel's retaliation. They cringe at the possibility that the arm of the Israel Defence Forces might reach them personally. Yet they cheer for the chance that women, children and other non-violent bystanders could be killed in the inevitable Israeli reaction. They have capitalized on the fact that the western media seem little bothered by the unceasing barrage of Qassam rockets. The rockets are invariably described in the western reports as "home-made devices" that will indeed kill what they land on but seem to land mostly in fields or on buildings but not on people.

The Israeli retaliation is more accurate and thus more deadly, the reporters always note, animated very often by a barely masked outrage at the "unfairness" of the duel.

The debate in the Israeli cabinet on Sunday was charged with emotion as the ministers and the government try to grapple with the Gaza quandary.

The frustration among the ministers is mounting. They observe that Hamas maintains its cruel offensive yet enjoys a protective cover of sorts from western governments, the United Nations and a host of NGOs. Hamas seldom, if ever, is condemned for its murderous campaign against the Jews. Israel, on the other hand, seldom, if ever, is not condemned for its retaliation, even when the means of that retaliation is non-military, such as cutting the supply of power to Gaza.

The Israeli cabinet thus issued the following emotionally controlled statement on Sunday: "We must act [against the Hamas regime in Gaza] in a systematic and orderly fashion over time. This is what we are doing. This is what we will continue to do. We will continue to reach all the responsible terrorists including those who dispatch and operate them. We will not give anyone special consideration. We will do this in order to make sure that it is possible to reduce the danger and alleviate the pressure and distress that is hitting the residents of Sderot and the communities adjacent to the Gaza Strip so severely."

Emboldened by the "success" of the Qassam campaign, a spokesman in Gaza for the Popular Resistance Committee, one of the groups that fires rockets at Israel, boasted last Friday that worse barrages of rockets were on the way.

The surrealistic approach by the West to the terrorists is simply becoming too much for the government of Israel to bear with its usual diplomatic equanimity. It prompted Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni to make the following statement on Sunday:

"When an Israeli child is hit by a rocket and loses his leg, and the world relates to that as one of the casualties of the conflict, our response is no. An Israeli child who suffers terror-inflicted injuries is not similar to a civilian who is injured unintentionally by defensive measures anchored in international law. I say to the world: You want to judge Israel, do it by your own criteria. Intentional murder can never be compared to unintentional injury. Here too, terror is terror is terror, and there can be no justification for it. Gaza is today a problem for anyone who seeks peace, and therefore can never be part of a future Palestinian state."

Later, Livni added: "There is a need for the international community to understand that there are certain steps that Israel needs to take in order to stop it [the almost daily barrage of Qassams]."

In an effort to pre-empt Israel from taking those "steps," chief Palestinian peace negotiator Ahmed Qureia warned on Sunday that any Israel Defence Forces escalation on the Gaza Strip would "affect the negotiation process."

A deleterious effect on the peace process is, of course, precisely what the Hamas rulers of Gaza are counting on when they set out to kill Israelis.

If Mahmoud Abbas and his Palestinian Authority do not understand this, if they expect Israel not to take "steps" to stop the Qassams, then the peace process is doomed.

Deputy mayor offended by handshake snub

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Richmond Hill's deputy mayor says she was the victim of "blatant gender discrimination" when local Orthodox rabbis refused to shake her hand at a menorah-lighting ceremony last year, and at another event where Muslim men wouldn't acknowledge her presence.

In addition to making comments to the media last week, Brenda Hogg also wrote about the two events in an article for this month's Richmond Hill Post, describing the incidents alternately as an "experience of rejection" and something that "didn't feel right."

In a Feb. 7 National Post report, Hogg said the refusal by rabbis to shake her hand at a Chanukah event at York Central Hospital was a "shock," and she called their actions incompatible with "Canadian laws and traditions... based on acceptance and inclusivity."

Later that day, Hogg re-iterated and expanded on her feelings on AM640's John Oakley morning radio show.

"I'm 55 years old this year. I've never experienced that kind of absolute rejection," she told Oakley.

Hogg added that she'd once attended a "religious seminar" to educate herself about various cultural mores and was impressed with what one Muslim imam said about cultural respect for Canada.

"He said if you have come to Canada, your host country, and cannot respect their laws – and certainly gender discrimination falls within those laws – then you do not belong here," she recalled to Oakley.

"Shaking hands is a big part of [Canadian] culture. It creates an aura of equality," Hogg told the host. "One older rabbi jumped back and looked at me with shock [when she stuck her hand out to shake his]. I didn't know what I had done. Then a younger rabbi said to me, 'Out of respect for you, we will not shake your hand.' And I thought, there's really something wrong here."

Hogg continued: "If you want equality... the other side better be able to shake my hand or not invite me [or] don't get involved in politics. They're reaching out to us, you know?"

There's something wrong."

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, the director of Chabad @ Flamingo in Thornhill, who attended the Chanukah event in question, said he couldn't remember if he was one of the rabbis who met with Hogg and didn't shake her hand, but he took issue with her assessment of the events.

"It's a modesty issue, not a discrimination issue," he told

The C.J.N. "My wife doesn't shake men's hands either. [For Hogg] to make accusations or stir up the pot is irresponsible. It's unfortunate that a deputy mayor in a city... with a vast Jewish population wouldn't have the time or patience to do a little bit of research [on Jewish Orthodox modesty protocols] before she went around dropping accusations like that."

Rabbi Kaplan was referring to the halachic principle of shomer negiyah, which forbids a man from touching a woman he is not married to.

On Monday, Hogg spoke to The C.J.N. after considering her comments and after having followup discussions with Rabbi Kaplan.

"That question of 'touch' never came up [at prior] Chanukah events I've attended," Hogg said. "It would have been fine, except for how totally off-guard I was. I've dear friends for years who are Jewish, but I never heard of the touch thing."

Although her talks with Rabbi Kaplan softened her position somewhat, Hogg maintained that there is inherent discrimination in Orthodox modesty practices.

"To me it's discrimination. To him, it's the laws of modesty. I can see the intent of the law is to strengthen monogamy. I understand that," she said. "He told me not everyone practices it. But when all of my male colleagues have treatment that is denied me, that isn't part of my culture."

Hogg said she knew the rabbis never intended any embarrassment or harm, but she said she wished she'd been warned in advance of Orthodox protocols.

"I've never been a fan of... silence. But I do think we need to talk about [these events] and I think the community is grateful for the opportunity to have this discussion," she said.

Last week, Richmond Hill Mayor Dave Barrow told The Post his office would continue to foster understanding between cultural groups.

JDL is back – protests Israel Apartheid Week event

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Defence League of Canada is back – again.

The on-again, off-again organization has been reconstituted under its former leader, Meir Weinstein, in response to a growing radical Islamic element in Canadian society, Weinstein said last week.

About 50 JDL members along with supporters from other Jewish organizations, held a vigil last week at Ryerson University to protest an Israel Apartheid Week (IAW) event.

Weinstein, who used to go by the name Meir Halevi, said the JDL's purpose is "to confront anti-Semitism. We see it as worse than ever before."

"We believe this Israel Apartheid Week program is an attempt to foment hatred for the Jewish people and justification for the terrorists."

JDL members handed out leaflets and attempted to turn the tables on IAW organizers, arguing Israel's Arab neighbours routinely practice discrimination but do not come under the microscope the way Israel does, he said.

In addition to protesting anti-Israel events – earlier, the group picketed outside the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) during an appearance by anti-Zionist speaker Norman Finkelstein – JDL monitors various organizations on the Internet and "we have moles in anti-Israeli groups to gather more information," Weinstein said.

He said the JDL is also highlighting the participation of Canadian Arab groups at a conference in Cairo last year that forged closer links between the international antiwar movement and Islamic radical organizations, including Hamas and Hezbollah.

Referring to an Ottawa Citizen story from May 2007, Weinstein said representatives of the Canadian Arab Federation and the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid as well as Not in My Name – Jews Against Israel's Wars, attended the conference.

The Citizen reported that "according to conference literature, the main purpose of the gathering, sponsored by the officially banned Muslim Brotherhood and Egyptian opposition parties, was to forge 'an international alliance against imperialism and Zionism'."

Weinstein said "the situation today is more serious than ever."

People from Islamic states that do not recognize Israel and "who have a negative view of Jews" are immigrating to Canada and bringing those attitudes with them.

It was at a pro-Hezbollah rally during Israel's 2006 war with the Islamic terror group that Weinstein felt the need to reconstitute the JDL. (It had been most active in the 1980s, was moribund for a time, then was re-invented for a few years as the United Israel Action Committee before again lapsing into inactivity).

The Hezbollah flag was being flown freely even though Hezbollah had been designated a terrorist organization by the Canadian government. Some chanted "death for the Jews," he said, and police stood by and did nothing.

The JDL got back together around September 2007. Its first activity was to protest a forum sponsored by the Coalition against Israeli Apartheid at OISE. Fistfights broke out when supporters of the Coalition confronted JDL protesters, Weinstein said.

"We don't think it's fair that when we're protesting that people should put fists in our faces and try to push us around. That doesn't happen," he said.

Last week's protest at the IAW event was peaceful. "We are not looking to start any confrontation," he said. "The emphasis is on defence."

Weinstein distanced the JDL in Canada from the American JDL whose leader Irv Rubin was jailed for planning bomb attacks against Muslims (he died awaiting trial). Weinstein said there were no organizational links between the two groups, though he did contribute to its website.

The JDL name "has more positives to it than negatives. I think haters of Jews are used to seeing Jews as timid and easy to push around. The JDL makes it clear this is one group you can't push around," he said.

Vital ally against Iran

These words were written as Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arrived in Berlin for a two-day visit to Germany. The main topic of discussion with his counterpart Chancellor Angela Merkel was no secret. "The issues that will be raised in Germany are vital to Israel's security," Olmert told reporters on the plane to Germany. The subject was Iran.

To be sure, other items of bilateral interest were on the agenda as well. For example, a new, upgraded relationship between the two countries is evolving. Indeed, as a visible demonstration of the fact, Merkel will visit Israel next month, along with a large contingent of her cabinet, in honour of the Jewish state's impending 60th anniversary. There has even been mentioned the possibility of an historic joint sitting in Jerusalem of the Israeli and German cabinets.

But the key reason for Olmert's visit on Sunday was to try to secure German agreement to a new, stiffer round of sanctions against Iran for its refusal to halt uranium enrichment in defiance of the United Nations. The timing could hardly be more propitious.

Two weeks ago, after Tehran received the final shipment of the 82 tons of enriched uranium from Russia needed to start the process of bringing the Bushehr nuclear reactor on line, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, again inveighed against the Jewish state.

In a speech from Bushehr carried live on state television, he urged the international community to "abandon the filthy Zionist entity, which has reached the end of the line. It has lost its reason to be and will sooner or later fall." Ahmadinejad added: "The ones who still support the criminal Zionists should know that the occupiers' days are numbered."

Last week, Israeli defence officials announced that Iran had assisted Syria in developing a new surface-to-surface missile. According to Israel, Tehran has shared technical know-how with Damascus that enabled Syria to upgrade the Iranian-made Zelzal. The missile now has a range of approximately 250 kilometres and is capable of carrying a large warhead and is also believed to be more accurate than other similar weapons in the Syrian arsenal.

Also last week, United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon called on Iran and Syria to respect the arms embargo on the militias in Lebanon (i.e.: Hezbollah). A report submitted by Ban to the Security Council said that the two states are transferring anti-tank and anti-aircraft weapons across to Hezbollah in violation of the terms of the UN-brokered agreement that ended the Second Lebanon War in 2006. We trust that Ban was not surprised with the findings of the report.

Given the circumstances of Iran's increasingly brazen actions aimed at harming Israel and the uncertainty attached to the outcome of the presidential elections in the United States, it is of vital strategic importance for Israel that Germany becomes an ally against Iran. We hope that Olmert's visit was successful.

25 years ago in The CJN

U.S. President Ronald Reagan told 150 people at the biennial meeting of the World Jewish Congress in Washington that the United States won't impose sanctions on Israel to hasten its pull-out from Lebanon. He said U.S. goals for Lebanon were a speedy withdrawal of all foreign troops, a strong central government and a guarantee that southern Lebanon won't be a staging ground for attacks on Israel.

HOLMES, THE UN REFERS TO GAZA AS OCCUPIED TERRITORY,

BUT THE ONLY NON-PALESTINIAN FORCE NOW IN GAZA IS THE UN ITSELF!!

DOES THIS MEAN THAT GAZA IS OCCUPIED BY THE UN?

WHAT IT MEANS, WATSON,

IS THAT THE "PALESTINIANS" HAVE OCCUPIED THE UN.

Israeli Apartheid Week

A full-page ad titled "Why you should care about Israel Apartheid Week," sponsored by Jewish Students for Self-Respect, was published in your Jan. 31 Toronto issue. What shocked me was the question the group asked: "Why has our Jewish leadership let us down?"

I have been involved with Jewish life on campus for five years and have personally dealt with the University of Toronto administration regarding Israeli Apartheid Week. The Jewish students at U of T are not to blame when it comes to the continuation of this annual hate-fest. Instead of choosing to turn our campus into a battlefield, as other educational institutions have, we continually attempted to build bridges on common grounds with the Muslim students groups. Our programming is always of the highest quality and always sends a powerful message of peace to the administration.

I challenge UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy and B'nai Brith to continue to show active support to those students who seek to rid campuses of this event across Canada, the United States and Britain. I encourage these organizations to provide educational workshops for students, as well as other tools necessary to keep our campuses a safe environment for all.

Response to Held

As a rabbi at one of the so called "big-box establishments" described in Daniel Held's column, "We need to create our own shuls" (CJN, Feb. 7), I feel obligated to respond. One of the great gifts of the Ontario Jewish community, which I have observed as an American-born Jew who moved here eight years ago, is the fact that this community is multi-generational. Many of the large congregations in the Greater Toronto Area comprise three- or four-generational families.

Because of the demographic challenges facing our community, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the large congregations formed a think-tank. In terms of an alleged lack of creativity, many of our shuls are experimenting in one way or another with "synplex" models of pluralism and choice, so that a menu of davening and spiritual options can be found in our synagogues.

Frankly, all of our congregations are desperately seeking the younger demographics to come into our synagogues. Many of the larger ones have gladly worked with the younger echelons in structuring age-appropriate spaces for university students and young professionals. At Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, for example, over the several years that I have served as its rabbi, we have graciously opened our doors to independent Shabbat experiences for university students and young professionals.

I am quite confident that if our spiritually seeking young people asked for creative liturgical options that respect the basic religious and/or halachic tenets of a particular congregation, such options would be explored and provided. Don't create your own shuls. Help the existing ones to thrive and grow so that the great gift of our multi-generational community will continue to flourish for decades to come.

Response to Lootsteen

Yair Lootsteen, in his column "Supreme Court's authority must be maintained" (CJN, Jan. 24), presents a very one-sided account of Israeli Justice Minister Daniel Friedman's proposed changes to the functioning of Israel's Supreme Court.

In Israel, Supreme Court judges effectively control the selection of new judges, which has resulted in a monolithic Supreme Court producing, more often than not, unanimous rulings on highly controversial and significant public issues. Moreover, it is questionable whether the Supreme Court should be intervening at all in matters of national security, in which they lack the military expertise.

Supreme Courts, in any democracy, tread a fine line between overseeing laws passed by a democratically elected government and usurping the role of government for themselves. The late Supreme Court of Canada chief justice, Antonio Lamer, was resolute in his conviction that the Supreme Court of Canada was not to usurp the role of Parliament. In contrast, Israeli Supreme Court Chief Justice Dorit Beinisch recently met with the U.S. ambassador to Israel to discuss the Israeli Supreme Court's position on the settlements — a meeting that provoked a controversy for the perception of allowing politics to interfere with or influence judicial independence.

Friedmann's proposal would encourage the selection of a more varied and pluralistic judiciary. Friedmann's attempt to limit the role of the Supreme Court judges in a self-perpetuating ideological process has rattled certain judges and others on the Israeli political left. Volunteer lawyers from the Canadian Legal Forum for Israel are in the process of drafting legal opinions in support of Friedmann's proposals.

Just another day in Jewish communal work

By AVIVA MILLSTONE

I am sitting in a brightly coloured room on the fourth floor of a small and cozy Jewish community centre (JCC). I am tired but energized from teaching the aleph bet (Hebrew alphabet) and the rituals of Tu b'Shvat (New Year for Trees) to two kindergarten classes. I just finished a long conversation with the program director about the location for the summer camp and details surrounding the budget. I am looking forward to meeting with a group of madrichim (counsellors) about a program for teenagers that will take place next weekend.

I sound like I could be at any JCC in North America working as an educator and community builder. But I'm not sitting a community centre in North America. I am sitting in the JCC in Tallinn, Estonia, a city and country that most people have not heard of, and if they have, have not even considered that Jewish life exists here.

I never thought that I, in my mid-twenties, would end up in Estonia. What is a Jewish girl from Toronto doing in Estonia? I'm asked this question on a regular basis, no matter where I am. What I am doing in Estonia is what I believe to be important work for the continuation of Jewish life in the world today. I am doing what I feel is significant in terms of building on existing Jewish communities and providing Jewish education. These are part of what I feel helps sustain and develop Jewish life.

I am able to do this work thanks to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), an organization operating in 66 countries that helps ensure the continuation of the Jewish faith and the Jewish People. It provides many services in Israel and also has a non-sectarian aid program. I feel lucky to have connected with the JDC last year through the Jewish Service Corps volunteer program, through which I spent the year volunteering in Warsaw, Poland. Fortunately, an opportunity arose for me to continue to work in eastern Europe as a professional member of the JDC team.

I feel that I need to share what's going on in Estonia with not only the people on my e-mail list, but with the greater Jewish community of North America, the Baltic region, Europe and the world. I am using the experiences that I have so fortunately had in my Jewish life in Canada to try to help the Jewish community in Estonia build and develop itself. I am also learning more than I ever could have imagined. I find it empowering to know that Jewish life is thriving in communities where people have tried to wipe it out and in places where we wouldn't have ever thought that Jewish life exists. I see myself as a very lucky young woman, because I am able to learn, work and share some of the special and regular aspects of Jewish life in Tallinn.

In the time I have been here, I have continually found myself amazed at the care and dedication that community workers and members (a very small group of people) provide. The JCC, which is state funded, and the synagogue, which opened in May 2007 (until then, the synagogue was inside the JCC) are located on a small side street just outside of the Old Town of Tallinn. This is where all Jewish life takes place in this city. In this space, you can find a newly opened kosher restaurant, youth programs for all ages, a social centre for seniors, dance classes, Hebrew lessons, Shabbat services and, of course, a functioning Jewish elementary and high school.

A small team of dedicated, hardworking and intelligent individuals supports these programs. There's something for everyone, and there are many occasions where almost everyone comes together. The are about 2,500 Jews in Estonia, and some 1,500 of them live in Tallinn. There are several smaller communities, and I have had the opportunity to visit some of them and give talks there. The numbers might be small, but the warmth and energy that comes from within the community and from those who work within the community is powerful.

I experienced that kindness and vigour the first weekend after I arrived in Tallinn, when I joined 300 members of the community for a special weekend called Yachad, a celebration of 15 years of Jewish life in Estonia since the fall of Communism. Before the early 1990s, Jewish life existed here on a very minimal scale, but in the past 15 years, the community has grown and developed tremendously.

At the opening Shabbat dinner, you could just sense that people felt warmly connected to their Jewish lives. The organization and effort that was put into the weekend was tremendous. Throughout the weekend, there were different Jewish-themed lectures, concerts and fun-filled children's programming exhibiting a strong Jewish spirit and powerful connecting energy. What a way to be welcomed into a community. Their obvious valuing of Jewish life and education encourages me in what I'm here doing. Whether it's helping to develop youth programs or teaching the youngest members of the community in kindergarten, nothing is undervalued.

Jewish holidays in Estonia are about fun, spirituality and community-building. During the eight days of Chanukah, there were nine different programs offered in total by the synagogue, the rabbi, the school and the JCC. There was something for everyone, and there were many opportunities for people to celebrate in programs together. I felt empowered on a weekend that I shared with the 20 local madrichim. A seminar was created by the local youth co-ordinators and the JCC program director to provide a weekend of Jewish learning, leadership and team building for the local Estonian madrichim who work in the weekly youth programs, local spring camp and Baltic region summer camp. The energy of the group – some veteran madrichim and some recently trained madrichim – was strong, and participants were interested and involved.

These young people had questions related to rituals and their Jewish identity and the role it plays in their community. Throughout the weekend, they covered topics such as: "Jewish Leadership and Me," "The Arab-Israeli Conflict," "How to Educate About The Holocaust," "Judaism and the Environment," and "Shabbat – Many Different Elements." Members of the community joined the group for Shabbat dinner, where they enjoyed a performance of the weekly parashah created by the madrichim, and the seminar ended with a special Havdalah service. It was a small seminar that had a large impact, and it will continue to have an impact, because these young people are the Jewish future here.

I get to teach small children in kindergarten, as well as young adults, about Judaism through my work teaching English. I educate at seminars, help develop youth programs, visit with seniors, and plan local and regional camps. But most importantly, I am getting yet another view of how Jewish life continues to not only survive but thrive in places all over the world. Jews here might not have the same resources, libraries and endless Jewish "products" that I was once used to being surrounded by, but I have become creative, open and resourceful in working around this. They have different things, and through those different things, I am introduced to other ways of being Jewish.

I am learning a new language and the customs and traditions that are specific to this special community. I am welcome to bring my knowledge, ideas and enthusiasm here, too. My customs and traditions are being combined with the ones here, and each time I introduce a new treat from my kitchen, or a song, or a Jewish idea, it is examined and enjoyed.

Estonia might be a small, cold place in the Baltics that sometimes feels very far from my home and life in Canada, but the Jewish community here is filled with kindness, thoughtfulness and warmth from within, and I'm lucky to be a part of it.

Aviva Millstone is working for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, helping to build a sense of Jewish community in Estonia.

Honouring broken tablets

Funerals make me uncomfortable. Unlike most people, I attend dozens of them every year. As a rabbi, performing funerals is one of my responsibilities. Yet, despite my familiarity, each one is still a difficult rendezvous with grief and a painful reminder of my own mortality.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Remarkably, an uplifting spiritual feeling pulses underneath all the grief and pain. I was unable to put my finger on what exactly this feeling was until I went to the smallest funeral of my career. The graveside service for "Leah" was attended by five people: two cousins of the deceased, along with myself, the cantor, and the funeral director.

Leah's story was not that unusual. She and a cousin were the sole survivors of a family wiped out in the Holocaust. Leah's concentration camp experiences left her scarred and shattered. She was no longer functional, and her cousin (and her cousin's children) provided for her care. Leah lived the last 50 years of her life as a broken person, unable to fulfil the potential of her youth.

A rabbi's job at a funeral such as this is a bit complicated. Jewish law requires that a eulogy praise the deceased. That's the easy part. Jewish law also requires that the eulogy tell the truth. The problem I faced at Leah's funeral was: what sort of honest praise could I give about someone who lived most of her adult life as a broken person?

For my eulogy, I referred to a talmudic lesson. The Talmud writes that one must honour a Torah scholar who, due to infirmity, has forgotten his learning. The Talmud explains that there were two sets of tablets inscribed with the Ten Commandments. The first set was broken by Moses after the sin of The Golden Calf and later replaced by a second set.

Remarkably, both the broken and unbroken tablets were given equal honour and placed together in the Ark of the Covenant. The Talmud concludes that just like the broken tablets, a Torah scholar who has forgotten his knowledge still deserves to be honoured as a scholar.

Leah's life was a story of broken tablets. It was filled with potential until it was shattered during the Holocaust. In my eulogy, I explained that people such as Leah deserved our honour, just like the broken tablets.

At Leah's graveside, I learned what the essence of a funeral is. Beyond the grief and pain, there is something deeply spiritual as well. By showing honour and dignity to each and every person, even if their lives were only broken tablets, we declare that every person is important, every person is holy, and that every person is created in God's image.

As much as I hate funerals, I find this feeling to be uplifting.

Will they ever love their children enough?

In early February, I wandered into a coffee shop directly across from Concordia University's main building in downtown Montreal. As I entered, I saw a big poster that read "End Israeli Apartheid" which detailed all of Israel's alleged crimes from its founding to the Second Lebanon War.

As usual, the charges were distorted, hysterical, one-sided and completely wrenched out of context. Moreover, the main accusation falsely linking Israel (and Zionism) with the South African crime of apartheid not only misrepresents today's realities, it robs South Africans of their own authentic historical experience – and suffering. South Africa's apartheid system in South Africa treated blacks as biologically and legally inferior to whites. To equate the resulting South African crimes against humanity with the fallout from a nationalist clash between Jews and Palestinians turns history on its head and minimizes South Africa's real evil.

This time, I was also struck by the nihilism of Palestinian nationalism. There was nothing positive about Palestinian identity in the poster. It was only a bill of indictment against Israel. And it's not just one poster. Examine the websites promoting what I call "Let's make-a-false-equation-between-Israel-and-the-racist-South-African-Apartheid-regime Week." Program after program bashes Israel, demonizes Zionism, and bemoans Palestinian suffering.

Compare that hurricane of hate to the websites celebrating Israel's 60th anniversary. If anything, those websites could be accused of barely acknowledging the complexity in Israel's history – actually, in any country's history. But ask yourself, with which movement would you rather associate – and which has a greater chance of success?

Gil Troy in Montreal

This is the great weakness of Palestinian nationalism. Golda Meir captured it decades ago with her observation that has become a truism: there will not be peace until they love their children more than they hate our children. The weakness is also reflected in the jab that one of my peacenik friends once made at one of his Palestinian friends: "Your problem is that you say you want justice and mostly mean you want revenge. Zionism wanted to solve problems – and it did."

Palestinians and their fellow travellers will attribute this difference to the fact the Israelis won and the Arabs are oppressed. But this difference between the two movements could be found in the 1940s, after Jews lost six million people in the Holocaust, and one per cent of Israel's Jewish population during the War of Independence – more than 6,000 people.

Nationalist movements only work if they are forward-thinking, if they are building something. Becoming addicted to hatred of the other fosters a temporary state of unity, but it ultimately degenerates into violence and destructiveness. Too much of the Palestinian national movement – and far too much of it on campus and in North America – is devoted to Israel bashing. It creates a culture of martyrdom that celebrates suicide bombers rather than nation builders. It honours leaders such as the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, who preferred the purity of perpetual violence to the complexity of compromise. It results, as we now see, in a cult of violence, so that when Hamas turned on Fatah, Palestinians took the violence they directed toward Israelis and turned it on each other.

The entire Arab world seems engulfed by this irrational hatred of Israel and Zionism. Even when Arabs draft an Arab Charter On Human Rights, they include a gratuitous assault on Zionism. The fact that people such as the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Louise Arbour, failed at first to see that perversion demonstrates just how ubiquitous and automatic it has become. History will judge enablers such as Arbour harshly for failing to warn the entire Arab world of the danger of succumbing to this mass demonization.

In contrast to all this negativity, over the last 10 years, for every Israeli that was murdered by Palestinians, nearly 1,000 Israeli children were born. Nefesh B'Nefesh, the organization that has brought thousands of North American Jews to Israel over the last few years, began with the founder's desire to balance Palestinian murders by bringing more Jews to Israel.

Closer to home, Montreal's Hillel decided to respond to this year's Israel apartheid hate-fest by embracing the beleaguered citizens of Sderot.

History is clear: in the long run, bet on those who love life, not those who worship death.

Bet on the builders, not on the haters.

Playing the numbers game

A professional organization in which I am active recently surveyed its membership. For the first time in the organization's 40 years of existence, each member was given the opportunity to respond to a set of questions that would offer the organization a clear picture of the interests, needs and priorities of the constituency that it serves.

The questionnaire was developed by the organization's leadership and then fine-tuned by a professional who is experienced conducting surveys. Finally, it was made available online to all members, who were reminded several times by e-mail to submit their responses. Filling out the questionnaire took 15 minutes, tops.

Roughly 45 per cent of members filled out the surveys. The professional who helped the organization put together the survey and interpret the results noted that a response rate of almost 50 per cent is usually high. Without even examining the actual results of the poll, he said that such a figure indicates a membership that's very committed to the organization, one that cares deeply about its operation and future.

I, untutored in the ways of surveys, did not realize until then that, in the world of organizational involvement, when less than half the members of a group respond to such a poll, that represents an overwhelmingly high level of engagement.

But it makes sense. Because the truth is that far, far fewer numbers frequently determine an organization's policy and direction. Call it the numbers game – it's important that we pay attention to it.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Take, for example, the resolution brought forth (and, ultimately rejected) at the recent convention of the Modern Language Association, which I described in detail last month in this column. You may recall that the proposed resolution called for the MLA, which represents thousands of language and literature professors worldwide, to defend the academic freedom of professors to criticize Israel on university campuses.

Let's consider the MLA as representative, in many ways, of similar professionally based organizations. Any member in good standing may put forth a resolution, but few do so. Any member may attend the delegates assembly and debate the merits of a resolution, but few do so. All members are invited to vote yes or no, by mail and Internet ballot, on resolutions passed by the assembly, but very, very few do so.

These dynamics, which are typical of many organizations, permit a small group of people with strong – and one might even say extreme – views to run the show, while the rest of us sit it out.

All too often, a small, vocal and motivated group has a voice out of proportion to its numbers because most people – members of an organization, faculty at a university, members of a union, and so on – are distracted by, well, life.

Most of us have so much on our plate, professionally and personally, that we are more than happy to let an essentially well-run and productive organization or institution do its business without deeply engaging in it, at least most of the time. Often, people with more extreme positions engage more actively, because they feel more passionately about a particular set of issues, and because those issues are at the centre of their lives, rather than simply being part of a constellation of matters they think about. The rest of us would simply let things be.

If we care deeply about certain things, however, simply letting things be may be an indulgence that we need to rethink.

Reluctantly – and being mindful of the many other things that beckon to us, or of our discomfort with public speaking, or of putting ourselves visibly on the line or in the minority – we may need to weigh in and shift the numbers.

Because the numbers game can work in our favour. We can be among those few who bother themselves to move – to articulate a view, to push for or resist a change. It could be our values, our agenda or our causes that the apathetic majority will allow to move forward.

I have been sometimes surprised by how little effort it takes to shift the mood of a group, the feel of a room, the result of a vote. Other times, I have been frustrated at how intractable an issue has become. But you have to play the numbers game to know.

Olmert clings to power after final war report

Ehud Olmert, Israel's embattled prime minister, has done it again, having survived the intense scrutiny and scathing conclusions of an official inquiry charged with investigating the Second Lebanon War in the summer of 2006.

The Winograd Commission's second and final report described the war as "a serious missed opportunity" and the performance of Israel's political and military leadership as less than inspiring.

It was released on Jan. 30, exactly nine months after an interim report singled out Olmert for a "severe failure in exercising judgment, responsibility and prudence."

The first report led to the resignation of two of the principals in Israel's inconclusive 34-day war against Hezbollah – the defence minister, Amir Peretz, and the armed force's chief of staff, Gen. Dan Halutz. Citing a need to remedy failures, Olmert refused to step down, defying a demand from his deputy, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, to do so, and ignoring livid editorials in the press and a massive demonstration in Tel Aviv.

Focusing on the opening phase of the war, the preliminary report was particularly critical of Olmert. He was criticized for his haste in going to war, following a Hezbollah ambush on an Israeli army patrol inside Israeli territory, and he was reprimanded for setting "over-ambitious and unattainable goals."

The commission concluded that Olmert bore "supreme and comprehensive responsibility" for the decisions taken during the war, during which Hezbollah killed 119 Israeli soldiers and bombarded Israel with some 4,000 rockets, causing the deaths of 43 civilians.

The latest report apportioned the blame more evenly, claiming that the Israel Defence Forces, "the strongest army in the Middle East," was stymied by "a semi-military organization of a few thousand men." As the commission added, "The power and force of the IDF was not brought into play."

This time around, Olmert was not the sole fall guy, although in a speech in the Knesset last week, he accepted "full responsibility for the failures" and promised "to fix the flaws."

Clearly, the commission did not exonerate Olmert. Nonetheless, an argument can be made that he alone does not bear the full moral stigma for the outcome of the war. If nothing else, the second report may have given him a new lease on his political career, if only temporarily. The self-serving opposition leader, Benjamin Netanyahu, lambasted Olmert as unfit and incompetent. But lest it be forgotten, Netanyahu wholeheartedly backed the war, as did the vast majority of Israelis, and if Netanyahu had been in Olmert's place, it would likely have ended similarly.

In any event, Olmert won an important victory on Feb. 4 when, in reaction to his response to the commission, 59 members of the Knesset voted to support him. Fifty-three parliamentarians, however, voted against Olmert, a sign of dissatisfaction with his leadership and management style.

Better still, from Olmert's viewpoint, Livni, though having observed that the Winograd report "holds a mirror to Israel's leadership that reflects a very harsh image," is no longer calling for his head. Now she says that unity is of the utmost importance at this juncture. In addition, many key individuals in Olmert's Kadima party, notably Deputy Prime Minister Haim Ramon and Finance Minister Ronnie Bar-On, have rallied behind him. Some backbenchers, notably Marina Solodkin and Avigdor Yitzhaki, oppose him.

Best of all, perhaps, Defence Minister Ehud Barak, the Labor party leader and a pivotal member of the coalition, has rescinded a threat to leave the cabinet.

Last May, when he was a contender for the Labor party's leadership, Barak – a former IDF chief of staff and prime minister – said that he would not serve in a government headed by Olmert, whose term of office ends in November 2010. His rival, Ami Ayalon, a former commander of the navy, made a similar pledge.

Subsequently, Barak declared that he would seek to form a new government, and press for fresh elections, if Olmert had not stepped aside by the time the Winograd Commission issued its last report. Much to Olmert's relief, Barak had a change of heart, as did Ayalon. If Barak had bolted, Olmert's government would have fallen, forcing an election.

Barak cited compelling reasons for staying on. Hezbollah has rearmend since the United Nations ceasefire in August 2006, thanks in no small part to two patrons, Iran and Syria. Hamas, which won the Palestinian election in January 2006 and proceeded to take over the Gaza Strip in a violent confrontation with Fatah last June, is in firm control of Gaza.

Hamas, Islamic Jihad, the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade and the Popular Resistance Committees continue to fire Qassam rockets and mortars at Israeli settlements and towns adjacent to Gaza, and are constantly trying to send armed terrorists into Israel. Israel has retaliated by launching frequent raids into Gaza and resuming targeted assassinations.

Ehud Olmert

Last week, in an ominous development, Hamas' armed wing, the Qassam Brigades, claimed credit for a suicide bombing in Dimona, the first such attack on Israeli soil in more than a year.

Barak is also propping up Olmert due to his concern about Iran's campaign to acquire a nuclear arsenal, notwithstanding a U.S. intelligence report that claimed that Iran froze all such efforts in 2003. Another reason for Barak's reluctance to bolt is that Israel has plunged into peace negotiations with Hamas' bitter adversary, the Palestinian Authority, led by Mahmoud Abbas, a moderate.

These are certainly important calculations, but Barak's prime consideration may have been internal politics.

Judging by polls, most Labor party supporters did not want Barak to quit, though some influential figures, such as Eitan Cabal, the secretary general, and Danny Yatom, the ex-director of the Mossad, urged Barak to ditch Olmert. Lastly, Barak realizes that if new elections are called, Netanyahu may well triumph and consign the Labor party to the wilderness.

This much seems certain, as long as Olmert can rely on Barak's support, he has a good chance of remaining prime minister.

Yet no matter how you look at it, Olmert remains a deeply unpopular leader, according to newspaper surveys conducted after the Winograd report was released.

Polls commissioned by Yediot Achronot, Ma'ariv and Ha'aretz showed that 56 per cent, 65 per cent and 53 per cent of respondents, respectively, expected Olmert to resign. On the other hand, a Ma'ariv poll indicated that 42 per cent wanted him to finish his term, compared to 27 per cent who said that he should step aside immediately and call elections.

For any normal politician, these would be disheartening statistics. But for Olmert, whose popularity rating once sank to an unprecedented three per cent, they represent something of a bounce in the polls.

Olmert, who faces three criminal investigations regarding his conduct as a minister in previous cabinets, has seen worse days.

Last November, the Sderot Conference, an annual gathering of Israeli political experts, judged him to be the most corrupt member of the government for the second year in a row.

Shortly afterward, the Israeli Policy Center for Promoting Parliamentary Democracy and Jewish Values in Israeli Public Life released the results of a survey in which 55 per cent of the respondents urged the Knesset to remove Olmert.

Despite a desire by his enemies to oust him, Olmert – a smart, cunning and resourceful political operator – remains prime minister and may yet serve out his term. He should not be underestimated.

Yet Olmert should not forget that two of his predecessors, Golda Meir and Menachem Begin, resigned under duress after a war tarnished their respective reputations.

The RMIF generates and distributes income monthly and with automatic reinvestment, an investor's annualized return is even higher than 10% because it is compounded each and every month.

Consistent high returns...that's why investors have increased their investments in the RMIF to over $400 million. Want to see your money grow consistently? Start by contacting Arthur Resnick or Wes Roitman for an information package today.

Treating bipolar disorder can be tricky, advocate says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Treating bipolar disorder requires as much art as science, says Karen Liberman, executive director of the Mood Disorders Association of Ontario.

"There are no tests to diagnose bipolar, so doctors really have to understand [the symptoms]. All they have to go on is what they told," Liberman said.

She will be speaking on bipolar and anxiety disorder at a community presentation being held at the Lipa Green Building, fourth floor, on Feb. 21, sponsored by Jewish Family and Child in co-operation with the Mood Disorders Association of Ontario.

Liberman, who recovered from a decade-long battle with severe clinical depression, has been honoured by Chatelaine magazine as a health hero, was featured on the CTV documentary Fighting the Dragon, and was a 2003 recipient of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health's Courage to Come Back Award.

People diagnosed with bipolar disorder, formerly known as manic depression, are on a "roller-coaster" of wild highs and devastating lows, she said.

"Mania includes racing thoughts, extreme irritability, excessive talking and energy, poor judgement and decreased need for sleep," Liberman said.

"During the inevitable depressions, people are [among other symptoms] in sad moods with feelings of uselessness or hopelessness. [They're] lethargic, suicidal, agitated, and have a loss of interest in work, hobbies and people."

But there are so many forms of bipolar disorder that it's extremely hard to diagnose, she said. "Bipolar II, for example, is characterized by the same depression, but the mania is not quite as high, so physicians often miss it.

"Those with Bipolar II have energy, productivity, and an [outgoing nature] that is often rewarded. They are in a great state of mind. It is dangerous, though, because eventually they will crash. Physicians often don't pick up on this because patients don't report the hypomanic episodes. They're only treated for the depression, but they need to be on mood stabilizers."

It's a tricky business, she said, because even when physicians do diagnose the illness, they have to find the proper medication, and many medications have powerful side effects.

"The good news is that 80 to 90 per cent of cases can be treated, but they need to be treated early before the disease becomes too complicated."

The challenge, said Liberman, is to educate people to recognize the symptoms of bipolar disorder and get into treatment.

"If we could get people treated at the first signs it could change the course of their illness. How are we letting people get so sick they're forced to go on long-term disability?"

It's "crazy," she said, that people hesitate to get help for a mental illness. "If people have a rash that a cream doesn't cure, they go to the doctor. There is no shame. A mental illness, though, is seen as shameful."

"It always amazes me that people talk about cholesterol and diabetes openly and without shame. Depression, though, is talked about in hushed tones."

People are talking about it a little more than they used to, Liberman said, "but we have such a long way to go. Our constant imperative is to increase people's understanding and make them feel better about disclosing."

"The more you find out, the faster you can get the illness managed so you can get on with the rest of your life. Too many people are living with suffering and pain."

Ex-engineering students sings with Jewish a cappella group

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's not uncommon for students to decide to change their majors in the midst of their studies, but Jeremy Burko knew that if he was going to be happy he'd have to go from one end of the academic spectrum to the other.

"I started off in university as an engineer and did that for three years and then switched to Jewish studies and music as a double major," said 25-year-old Burko.

"Engineering was nice, but the material was getting dry," he said with a laugh.

Burko said that although music had been a part of his life since he was young — he is a pianist, a composer and even conducts — he didn't begin singing until he was in his late teens.

In 2001, during his second year at the University of Toronto, he founded the Varsity Jews, a Jewish a cappella group, and served as the director for five years.

"I found that I was spending more of my time volunteering for music-related stuff than I was spending on my school work, which was also getting to be a ridiculous load."

He said that his parents were a little hesitant to accept his decision to give up on engineering for a career in music.

"But I think they understood quickly that this is what I had to do and no matter what I went into, it had to be music related."

This fascinating work is filled with autobiographical sketches of life as seen by a young Jewish girl growing up in the Soviet Union. Rabbi Grimberg brings colour and perception to a world we often think of as grey, impersonal and foreboding. Her descriptions of life in her hometown of Kiev are by turn hilarious and heartbreaking.

Come and enjoy selected readings from this wonderful novel in Darchei Noam's beautiful new home. Our social hall will be transformed into a candle-lit Kiev Café filled with Russian music, tea, coffee and desserts.

Jewish War Veterans Memorial project still 'a go'

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

The Jewish War Veterans of Canada's Toronto post pledges that despite more than two years of inertia, its memorial in Earl Bales Park will be built as originally planned.

Ground for the Flames of Memory project was broken in October 2005 amid much fanfare, and the project was slated for completion within a year to 18 months. A sign is still up in the northern corner of the park asking for donations, but nothing has been built to date.

In December, the veterans shook up their Toronto post. A new nine-member board ousted longtime Toronto post commander Hy Shulman and executive director Lou Van Delman.

"We've had a complete sweep of the prior board," said new board member Ed Bluestein. He added that the new board is scheduled to meet with the memorial's "largest sponsors" on Feb. 21.

"The project is a go," Bluestein said.

Former Toronto municipal politician and police services board chair Norm Gardner was installed as the new Toronto post commander.

Envisioned as a sunken amphitheatre surrounded by a swooping angled wall topped by chanukiyah lights, the $7-million memorial to Jewish combatants is the design of world-renowned architect Daniel Libeskind.

It is meant to honour Canadian Jewish war veterans going back to before Confederation, those who fought for Allied countries, and resistance fighters during World War II.

It sits on two acres of land donated by the City of Toronto.

"There's some people who have contributed [to the project but] who haven't heard anything," said Toronto councillor Mike Feldman, in whose ward the park is located. "My responsibility is to make sure the city isn't left with any liability."

Feldman told The CJN the war veterans "have to come up with money before we can let them go into the ground."

"[They] have to raise all the money and produce letters of credit to make sure we aren't responsible for maintenance. All that money has to be secured for the city. That's the legal contract. So far, they haven't got enough money to build the thing, so I don't know how you can secure the rest of it."

He said he has not heard how much money has been raised to date.

"That sort of gives me concern. I hope that it goes [ahead], but it is sensitive when you're giving away city parklands."

The $7-million campaign included a $2-million endowment fund for maintenance and upkeep.

Shulman told The CJN the veterans have to date "raised enough money to keep creditors off our back."

Despite his ouster, he still feels the memorial is "very, very important. It's got to be done. If [the new board is] doing a good job, that's wonderful."

Van Delman said the veterans have raised "close to" $1 million to date, and that Libeskind has been paid $125,000 so far, with the rest of his fee due only after construction begins.

Van Delman said he has begun legal action against the veterans for unpaid salary.

Today, Burko is in his third year of the cantorial studies program at the Jewish Theological Seminary's (JTS) Miller Cantorial School in New York, and is enjoying his second year with Pizmon, a Jewish cappella group based in New York and made up of students from Bernard College, Columbia University and JTS.

And on Feb. 22 and 23, Burko and the rest of the Pizmon group will perform music that ranges from classical liturgy to modern Israeli pop in three Toronto area shuls.

Pizmon is a not-for-profit co-ed group that was founded in 1986 by four members of the Columbia Jewish community who wanted to bring Jewish music to elderly members of the community.

Today, the 13-member group performs at schools, community centres, shuls, hospitals and retirement homes.

Burko said the group travels often – about every other weekend – to perform for Jewish communities around the world.

"We do a great deal of travelling. Last year, we travelled around the United States, to Los Angeles and New Orleans," he said.

"This year we're going to Israel, and we're going to tour army bases, hospitals and schools, and we're going to perform for the Ashkelon community as well."

On Feb. 22, Pizmon will be at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue for a Shabbat family dinner, during which they will lead the group in Shabbat songs.

The following day, Pizmon will perform following Shabbat services during kiddush at Adath Israel Congregations, and later that evening, they will perform a concert at Beth Radom Congregation.

"We mostly sing Hebrew, Israeli pop music, a cappella, some more traditional pieces, some comedic pieces – it's a mix," he said, adding that they tend to focus more on Israeli pop songs by musicians, including David Broza.

Burko, who sings bass and is the only Canadian member, is excited about coming back to his hometown to perform with the group.

"I'm particularly excited about the show, because I'm excited to bring Pizmon to my home community. They are a group I'm really proud to be working with."

Premier against black-focused schools

"Josh wants [the board] to issue a trespass letter against her... but instead of heavy-handed tactics, I want to sit down with her and make it clear that [her remarks] are unacceptable," Campbell said.

"I don't think she believed or intended to hurt him. She apparently was unaware that her remarks were offensive. I'm taking this seriously and am going to ask for a letter of apology. The irony is that this lady who made the comments is often the first to claim that everybody else is a racist."

Campbell said he wouldn't rule out issuing a trespass notice – which would prevent her from entering TDSB property – if her explanation doesn't satisfy him. He didn't say when the meeting will take place.

Matlow said that even if the Africentric school idea is defeated later this year, the recent debate and willingness of the board to look at more funding for ethnic education means "that [cultural] programming doesn't look as impossible as it once did, [because it is] opening up people's minds."

Premier Dalton McGuinty has said he doesn't support the idea of a black-focused school, but he told the National Post last week that his government won't act to stop it if the TDSB goes ahead with the plan.

"I am hoping that both sides can develop an understanding of where each other is coming from," McGuinty said. "At the end of the day here, we have a conflict between two important, noble, social objectives."

Biased Israel coverage can be countered: watchdog

By RACHEL BARKSKY
Special to The CJN

Mike Fogelman recently asked a large audience at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation if they believe the Canadian media is biased against Israel.

A unanimous cry of "yes" echoed throughout the room.

Fogelman wasn't surprised by the answer. As executive director of HonestReporting's Canadian branch, he spends six hours a day reading and critiquing dozens of newspapers, watching television and searching online to put a magnifying glass on the media, "as they have been on Israel," he said.

HonestReporting, which has affiliates in the United Kingdom, the United States, Brazil and Italy, was founded in 2000 and is now the world's largest pro-Israel media watchdog.

There are problems with the Canadian media's coverage of Israel, but Fogelman believes they can be countered and wants people to know what they can do to help ensure fair and accurate reporting of the Jewish homeland.

"With the power of numbers - we have close to 18,000 members - the more changes we can effect," Fogelman told the audience at Beth Tzedec on Jan. 30.

Fogelman, a Carleton journalism graduate, showed part of a "Pallywood" video from seconddraft.org's website ("Pallywood" refers to the staging of scenes by Palestinian journalists in order to present the Palestinians as hapless victims of Israeli aggression). The scene that the Beth Tzedec audience saw was raw footage, the kind that usually doesn't make it into the news.

It depicted the "funeral" of a Palestinian man, with the "pallbearers" carrying the "dead" man wrapped in a sheath, on a stretcher. What the public wouldn't likely see is that before the funeral, the pallbearers dropped the stretcher and the "corpse" picked himself up and got back on. They then dropped the stretcher again, and the "corpse" climbed on once more.

France 2, the country's largest public television network, aired a news report that showed a Palestinian man firing a gun toward Israelis at a nearby factory. He is apparently shot in his right leg, and the ambulance magically arrives the next moment. Paramedics load the man on his injured leg. Pallywood's extended footage - which didn't air on France 2 - shows that the Palestinian man was actually firing into an empty room. The Israelis weren't in sight, and there was no blood. "It's a staged scene, but it aired as news," Fogelman said.

He does not believe that all news is staged but does believe that there are people "manufacturing" the news. "People should report this, but they take quotes on surface," Fogelman said. The Toronto Star's Oakland Ross, for instance, quoted a Hamas official on Jan. 22, who said that five Palestinians had died in a Gaza hospital because of the most recent fuel embargo. However, Ross failed to report that both Israeli and Palestinian officials denied this claim, Fogelman said.

Fogelman contacted the newspaper, and it printed a correction two days later. "This is fantastic, but how many people read the follow-up?" he said.

There are 500 news crews posted to Jerusalem, Fogelman said, the third-highest number in any place in the world. Since Israel has a free press, journalists can say anything about the Israeli government "without being murdered. Compare this to the Arab world in the rest of the Middle East," he said.

"We don't hear about the horrible oppression that Saudi Arabia is, hanging dissidents of the government about once a month."

Fogelman said reporting on the Middle East is one of the most difficult jobs today, and part of the problem is that reporters are parachuted into the region without sufficient knowledge about it and are told: "Tell us the story now." To deal with the language barrier, journalists rely on stringers or guides - people who take them to places they think are important. This does not happen only in the Middle East but also in Russia, and even in Canada.

Of the Canadian news media, Fogelman said he has the most correspondence with the CBC over the network's media coverage of Israel. "It puts out the most content and has the most reporters posted to the region," he said.

Fogelman said he has seen a change in the network's coverage since Peter Armstrong replaced Neil MacDonald (who many people said had an anti-Israel bias as its TV news correspondent) in Jerusalem.

Still, the CBC's coverage is worrisome at times. For instance, Fogelman said, the CBC continues to use reports made by Al-Jazeera, the controversial Arab satellite news service.

HonestReporting's goal is to help people become ambassadors for fair and accurate media coverage of Israel, Fogelman said.

Canadians can write letters to the editors of publications. He advises people to be quick, polite, concise and specific in their letters, and to become as informed about the issues as possible.

"Just because we aren't formal journalists, doesn't mean we don't have a voice," he said.

Ethicizing rituals, ritualizing ethics

By RABBI Yael SPLANSKY

One of the many ways we try to make sense of the mitzvot is by breaking them down into two categories. Ethical mitzvot are described as being "between one human being and another" and ritual mitzvot are described as being "between one human being and God."

Of course, there are many mitzvot that don't neatly fall into one category or the other. This is a game I like to play with our bar and bat mitzvah students. I ask them to explain why they categorize a particular mitzvah the way they do. Surprisingly, most students instinctively identify the rabbinic mitzvah of lighting Shabbat candles as ethical in nature, as they say it bonds "one human being to another."

Rabbi Arnold Jacob Wolf of Chicago complicates this conversation by challenging us to further blur the lines between the categories by "ethicizing the ritual mitzvot and ritualizing the ethical mitzvot."

What does this mean?

When Jews refrain from eating treif, they fulfil the ritual mitzvah of kashrut. But when some Jews boycotted California table grapes in the 1980s and called them "treif" because they were cultivated by mistreated migrant field workers, they ethicized the ritual of keeping kosher. They expanded the ritual of carefully inspecting the fitness of food by being just as diligent in inspecting the ethics behind it. Similarly, some Jews consider all veal to be treif, because the animal is treated with cruelty. In addition, the term "eco-kosher" has been coined so that Jews might consider the effect of food production on the environment.

Another example: the ritual of building a sukkah. On the Sunday of chol hamoad Sukkot, Jews in their 20s and 30s volunteered for Habitat for Humanity and helped to build a permanent shelter for the homeless. The ritual of the rickety sukkah became a reminder of what else the festival requires of them ethically.

Yet another example: when synagogue leadership develops a policy requiring that only Israeli wines be served in its building in order to support Israeli exports, the ritual of making Kiddush is ethicized by a love of Zion and her people.

How can the inverse also be realized? When members of my congregation, Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, turn their synagogue into a homeless shelter each Thursday, they fulfil the ethical mitzvot of "feeding the hungry" and "welcoming the stranger." The volunteers ritualize the ethical by reciting a blessing before beginning their preparations and by putting on kippot before they serve warm meals to their guests.

Similarly, when a circle of friends supports a woman through her battle with cancer, they fulfil the mitzvah of "caring for the sick." They expand and strengthen that ethical mitzvah when she completes her regimen of chemotherapy and radiation, and they accompany her to the mikvah, which spiritually cleanses the poison from her body. By showering her with prayers of hope for a healthy future, they ritualize the ethical.

Rabbi Wolf's approach expands the scope of mitzvot in practice and in purpose. Sometimes the grace of a simple ritual stands on its own. Its beauty and history can be enough to inspire. And sometimes the additional gloss of the ethical can add the depth and relevance that so many people crave in a life of mitzvot.

Sometimes the human impulse to do good is overwhelming and steers us to walk in God's ways, to fill our days with acts of kindness. And sometimes the addition of a sacred ritual helps to put doing the right thing in religious terms, to frame it as a direct response to the Source of Blessings.

This approach of ethicizing the ritual and ritualizing the ethical suggests that the fullness of each mitzvah is only waiting to be discovered.

Rabbi Splansky is associate rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

By RACHAEL TURKIEVICZ

As we read through the upcoming Torah portions, the excitement of the events of Sinai continues to speak to us, and then we encounter the betrayal of the Golden Calf.

The text tells us that Moses is late returning from the top of Sinai, and the Jewish people have suddenly become strict about keeping to a schedule.

Our solution is to build a concrete object upon which we can focus, since we relied on Moses to communicate with God, and clearly he does not seem to be returning. We are motivated by fear, and the text shows us how quickly fear can redefine the character of a people and lead us to destructive places.

The setting of the events of Sinai is depicted in very concrete ways. Moses, the mountain, the thunder and lightning – everything the Torah describes is an assault on our physical senses, and the sudden disappearance of Moses without his scheduled reappearance invokes within us the fear of the unseen. We solve it by building something we can see.

Yet, one group within the Jewish people refuses to participate in creating the Golden Calf. It appears that the women were not willing to contribute any materials to the building of the idol. According to the midrash in Pirkei deRabbi Eliezer, the women told their men: "You want to construct an idol and mask which is an abomination and has no power of redemption. We will not listen to you."

The midrash continues by saying that God rewards Jewish women by giving them the celebration of the new moon, Rosh Chodesh, more than to the men.

On the one hand, the connection of a woman and the moon is apparent on a physical level, as a woman's body will cycle in a rhythm, just as the moon cycles regularly. Yet, the text of the Golden Calf and the midrash emphasize the fact that the women were beyond needing the concrete and, therefore, rejected the building of the idol. The women did not fear or doubt what they could not see, since their cycles permit them to carry a new life within them, which they know they will not see as it grows.

Once the women show they can be trusted with a clear understanding of the place of the concrete and its limitations, God can safely place the new moon in their hands. Designating the moon as a focal point of time and blessing it once a month could easily slip over the line into an inappropriate, idolatrous understanding of the moon. Once the women show they understand the appropriate line between what is concrete and what is not – that is, once they reject the idol because they know the concrete cannot redeem – only then are they trusted with the moon.

The women will never allow the moon to be an object of worship, but will always frame it as the marker of time. Israel panicked when we believed Moses was late in returning – we misunderstood the time marker. As a result, we abandoned the abstraction of time and headed for the safety of the concrete, the idol. The time marker is safely returned to Israel through Jewish women.

According to the Jerusalem Talmud, it is acceptable that women not work on Rosh Chodesh, and the Shulchan Aruch, the Code of Jewish Law, supports this custom.

Within one of the darkest covenantal hours – Israel's betrayal of God through the Golden Calf – is a glimmer of understanding and safety that should be recognized with every Rosh Chodesh: Jewish women. The Talmud recognizes this view when it states: "Women, they are a people unto themselves."

A training ground for young Israeli archeologists

By ALEX GROPPER

Hazor is the largest archeological site in Israel. It has an extensive history, going back before the dawn of civilization.

As with many sites in Israel, Hazor was initially excavated during the British Mandate by John Garstang. But the best-known excavations of Hazor were those carried out by the famous Israeli archeologist Yigael Yadin, in the 1950s.

Yadin had already made a name for himself in a number of fields. While barely in his 30s, he had commanded the Haganah during the War of Independence in 1948. Shortly thereafter he would get his PhD and obtain an important number of Dead Sea scrolls for Israel. Yadin would go on to win even greater fame after he finished his dig at Hazor when he undertook the excavations of Masada.

But it was Hazor that first established Yadin's reputation as an archeologist. At Hazor, Yadin would put to good use the organizational skills he had developed as commander of the Haganah. The Hazor excavations were also a training ground for a new generation of young Israeli archeologists who were emerging after the founding of Israel. Among those archeologists who worked at Hazor was Yohanan Aharoni, the founder of the Institute of Archaeology at Tel Aviv University. Ruth Amiran, another Hazor alumnus, would go on to write the classic, Ancient Pottery of the Holy Land. Trude Dothan and her husband, Moshe, would establish themselves as world authorities on the enigmatic Sea Peoples, among whose number are the Philistines of the Bible. These young archeologists would go on to establish the discipline in the new country.

The Hazor excavations would also make a major contribution to one of the crucial ongoing debates in biblical archaeology – the issue of the Israelite conquest. There were two opposing opinions regarding the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites, one used the Book of Judges as its major source of evidence and espoused a gradual subjugation of the land over a long span of time. The other view took as its model the Book of Joshua, in which the conquest was presented as a quick, blitzkrieg-like event. The evidence found by Yadin appeared to support the latter view. There was a huge destruction layer uncovered by Yadin, which he dated to the second half of the 13th century BCE, the time most traditional scholars ascribe to the Israelite conquest. The current excavator of Hazor, Amnon Ben Tor, also found the same debris in his excavations, but he prefers to leave both the date and cause open for the time being.

Hazor was important enough to merit mention in the Egyptian excavation texts of the late 12th and early 13th dynasties, which are dated to the early second millennium BCE. The city is also mentioned a number of times in the Mari archives, which can be dated to no later than the 18th century BCE, since Mari was destroyed by the famous Hammurabi of Babylon circa 1750 BCE. The fact that at least 14 of the Mari documents mention Hazor attest to its importance as a major trading centre in the Near East at this time.

What is even more intriguing is that a number of inscribed clay tablets have been found on the site, teasing the excavators with the possibility that somewhere in the tell is a hitherto undiscovered archive. Yadin was so tantalized by this that he decided to go back to Hazor to search for it. He was convinced that he knew where the elusive archive was, but sadly he died before he could prove it. Ben Tor has his ideas as well, but so far Hazor has kept its ancient secret to itself. The question remains – will the Past come Forward to tantalize us again?

Past Forward

One of the organizations that has worked the hardest to raise the profile of – and money for – Jewish summer camps is the Foundation for Jewish Camping. The foundation was started in 1997 by Robert and Elisa Spungen Bildner, a New Jersey couple. In its first nine years, the "$12-million public foundation provided funding, scholarships, professional development programs and other resources to the 130 Jewish overnight summer camps and their 60,000 campers in North America." [jewishcamping.org]

The National Study of Youth and Religion in the United States found that 43 per cent of American Jewish teenagers have attended an overnight camp run by a religious organization. Surprisingly, that puts Jewish teens in fourth place. Nearly 80 per cent of Mormon teens have attended such a camp, followed by 53 per cent of conservative Protestants and 48 per cent of mainstream Protestants. [tinyurl.com/ypz4g]

For every kid who dreams year-round of being in camp, there's a parent who knows that "Even Utopia Has a Price Tag." Lea Lion wrote an article with that title for JewishJournal.com about the challenges faced by many parents already struggling to pay for Hebrew school and bar mitzvahs – along with summer camp, which can typically run between $500 to $1,000 a week. [tinyurl.com/2qlj2d]

But help is available. The Foundation for Jewish Camping has created a central directory of more than 80 scholarships offered for camps across the continent.

For families on a budget, foundation president Jerry Silverman has this advice: "Talk to the camp, talk to your rabbi and talk to your local [Jewish] federation – it is all about asking... If you don't ask, your children will suffer."

[tinyurl.com/2bnxqj] [tinyurl.com/2nnygz]

Despite the price tag – or because of it – there is fierce competition to attract campers to summer camp. That's why Jewish camps have begun to offer programs that focus on specialties such as music and arts, sports, community service, technology, and even language immersion. [tinyurl.com/26aqjc] As Chanan Tigay puts it in the New Jewish Standard, "Campfire stories and lumpy pottery are making way for Jewish specialty camps. Jewish camps have even offered basketball tips with NBA coach, swimming advice from four-time Olympic gold medalist swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg and filmmaking guidance for budding Spielbergers." [tinyurl.com/24ytzt]

Located in Glen Spey, N.Y., Chai Life-line's Camp Simcha provides an overnight camping experience for Jewish children suffering from cancer or other life-threatening illnesses. Camp Simcha Special is for children with serious chronic illnesses. The site notes that both camps are free of charge. However, there is a nominal registration fee. [tinyurl.com/yqfk3z] You can watch an inspiring video about the camp, its campers, counsellors and families on YouTube. [tinyurl.com/yvp2mq]

autism. [tinyurl.com/2bnxqj] A number of Ramah camps in Canada and the United States offer programs for campers with special needs. [campamah.org/tikvah.html] And in New York's Catskill Mountains, Camp HASC "provides over 300 mentally and physically handicapped children and adults with the opportunity to enjoy a seven-week sleep-away camp experience, just like many of their siblings and friends." [campahasc.org]

As the summers roll by, true campers know that one day they are destined to become counsellors and perhaps then unit heads. The Foundation for Jewish Camping offers job listings on its site [tinyurl.com/38szvj] as does Jewish Camp Staff. [jewishcampstaff.com]

What what happens when you're too old for those jobs? Become a camp director. But just having a pristine camping pedigree may not be enough. That's why Brandeis University and the Foundation for Jewish Camping are offering a fellowship to train directors of non-profit Jewish camps. As Silverman puts it, "a camp director is now expected to be "an educator, a construction expert, a major fundraiser, a financial genius, a health expert – as well as someone who understands the psychological growth of children, teens and the college-aged counsellors that work for them." In other words, a dream job for a very happy camper. [tinyurl.com/2bfhkf]

Who are the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades?

On Feb. 4, in Dimona, the first suicide bombers to penetrate Israel in more than a year killed one woman and wounded at least 11. Several Palestinian terrorist groups were quick to claim responsibility, including the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades.

Media reports varied widely in their description of the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, making it difficult to understand just how these "militants" (the term almost always used by the media) are related to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' ruling Fatah faction. The al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades as a group was described as being "allied with 'Fatah,'" "an offshoot of 'Fatah'" and "loosely affiliated with Fatah." While commonly used, such vague descriptions fail to convey either the nature or extent of the relationship between the al-Aqsa Martyrs'

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

In a Feb. 4 report for CBC's The National, Peter Armstrong called the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades "an offshoot of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement."

In the Toronto Star ("Bombing shocks Israel," Feb. 5), Oakland Ross noted: "Several different militant Palestinian organizations claimed responsibility for the Dimona attack, including the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade, a militia allied with Abbas' Fatah Palestinian faction, as well as Hamas, which rules the Gaza Strip."

A Calgary Herald report from McClatchy Newspapers ("Gaza border breach may have led to blast," Feb. 5) describes the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades as being "loosely affiliated with Abbas' Fatah party."

In the Globe and Mail ("Suicide bomber strikes in southern Israel," Feb. 5), Mark MacKinnon wrote: "A spokesman for the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, an offshoot of the mainstream Fatah movement of Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas, said the bombers had travelled from the Gaza Strip to Israel via Sinai after militants blew open Gaza's border with Egypt last month."

In "Fatah linked to bombing," (National Post, Feb. 5) New York Times reporter Isabel Kershner wrote: "Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a militia loosely affiliated with the mainstream Fatah movement headed by Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, claimed responsibility and said it carried out the attack with another faction, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, and another unknown group calling itself the United Popular Brigade."

Other reports said the attack was carried out by a sub-section of the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades.

In a Feb. 4 report for CTV's national news, Janice Mackey Frayer said "an offshoot of the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades loyal to Palestinian [Authority] President Mahmoud Abbas" claimed responsibility.

Similarly, in "Suicide bomber kills one in Israel," (Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, Feb. 5), Reuters reported: "A Gaza-based source in President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction said the 'Army of Palestine' wing of Fatah's al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades launched the attack along with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP)." This Reuters story directly links the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades to Fatah, while identifying the "Army of Palestine" as a "wing" of the Brigades.

Even Israeli sources can add to the confusion. In another Reuters story ("Bombing in Israel shows challenge facing Abbas," Feb. 5) Adam Entous wrote: "Mark Regev, [Israeli Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert's spokesman, said the [Dimona] bombing underscored the 'primary challenge' facing Abbas to demonstrate that he can exert full control over militant groups."

"This challenge is not only coming from forces outside their political movement," Regev said. "Within the Fatah machine, there are rogue elements."

Regev may have called the Brigades "rogue elements" in an effort to avoid embarrassing Abbas any further at a time when Olmert and Abbas are continuing to talk. But the phrase minimized the number of al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades members, the group's impact and, perhaps most important, its connection to the "mainstream" Fatah party.

It's important that the media once and for all properly identify the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades. We need to know how large the organization is, how much power it yields, and precisely what its relationship is to the Fatah party.

Israel is supposed to negotiate a peace agreement with Fatah. Fatah, in turn, may be undermining that effort by refusing to disband its own "militant" wing, the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade which has been directly involved in terrorism against Israelis.

Supreme Court asked to hear challenge of get judgment

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The constitutionality of a 1990 amendment to the Divorce Act, intended to alleviate the problem of ex-spouses refusing to give or receive a get, is being challenged in a motion to the Supreme Court of Canada to re-hear a case.

The motion has been brought by Anne-France Goldwater, lawyer for Jessel (Jason) Marcovitz, the Montreal man who in December was ordered by the Supreme Court to pay damages for withholding the get, a traditional Jewish divorce, from his former wife for 15 years, despite a written commitment to do so without delay.

Goldwater argues that the Divorce Act amendment, section 21.1, breaches the traditional boundaries separating church and state and infringes upon the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, specifically, the protection of religious conscience. She also argues that civil law can't be used to sanction someone for failing to perform a religious obligation.

Section 21.1, which does not mention Judaism or any other religion explicitly, obliges divorcing couples to remove "barriers" to the other's religious remarriage before the civil divorce can be finalized.

Goldwater said she didn't enter an argument on the constitutionality of the section when Marcovitz's ex-wife Stephanie Bruker's appeal was heard by the Supreme Court in December 2006, because Marcovitz had agreed in 2001 not to do so before Bruker's lawsuit was heard in Quebec Superior Court. Marcovitz's main argument has been that the case, because of its religious nature, was out of the bounds of Quebec civil law.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency
Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising
reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Complaint over sermon advocating jihad dismissed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A review panel has dismissed a complaint that VisionTV violated an industry code of ethics when it aired a program in which a Pakistani imam with a history of anti-Semitism gave a sermon in favour of jihad "on the battlefield."

The Canadian Broadcast Standards Council (CBSC) ruled in late November that the content of Israr Ahmad's sermon did not contain aggressive, abusive or discriminatory comments levelled at any identifiable group.

The council, established by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters (CAB), a voluntary organization of private broadcasters, also stated that Ahmad's reputation, even if true, would not oblige any broadcaster to forbid him access to the airwaves.

"Even assuming that Israr Ahmad was not a 'benign educator,' did have a 'highly controversial reputation' as a promoter of an unethical and incompatible form of Islam and had made hateful comments about identifiable groups in other fora... no broadcaster has an obligation to forbid access to its airwaves on that account," the panel ruled.

The CBSC decision came in response to a complaint from an unnamed individual about a July 14, 2007, broadcast of the TV program Dil Dil Pakistan, which was provided to VisionTV by an independent producer.

In subsequent broadcasts, VisionTV issued an apology, saying Ahmad would not appear in future programs and that the network would ensure that those appearing on Dil Dil Pakistan "share our peaceful interpretation of the message of the Qur'an."

The complainant, however, asked the CRTC, Canada's broadcasting regulatory agency, to discipline VisionTV or revoke its license for permitting Ahmad to transmit "hate messages." The CRTC referred the complaint to the CBSC.

The complainant alleged that, "VisionTV bypassed its own code of ethics and its social responsibility and has stooped to the propaganda messaging of hate and violence. How ironic that Canada has many young people in our armed forces putting their lives on the line to rid this cancer from the peoples of Afghanistan, only to have hate messaging pumped into millions of homes in our heartland under the aegis of the CRTC."

A follow-up letter from the complainant alleges Ahmad's sermon tells Muslims they have the duty to wage jihad, either financially or on the battlefield.

"This messaging is directional and vaguely threatening," the complaint alleges. "It amounts to one-sided propaganda, which is in violation of the stated codes of conduct."

The CBSC's national specialty services panel, however, rejected that contention.

It stated that "there was barely a mention anywhere in the episode of any other identifiable group that, of course, the Muslim community. Though there is a reference in the broadcast of July 14 to the 'enemies of Allah,' nowhere has the imam directly identified any group. Consequently, there was no aggressive, much less abusive or even discriminatory comments levelled at any identifiable group and no breach of the human rights clause of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters Code of Ethics on this account."

Turning to the question of jihad, the panel noted the term "has no exclusive or limited meaning as a holy war. It is at least as understandable as referring to struggle or strife, with no necessary implication of battle or hostility."

"In the view of the panel, there was no call to arms or indeed any form of incitement of violence. Indeed, the only reference to physical conflict of any kind is found in Israr Ahmad's discussion of the strand of jihad when he said 'either with your financial resources or your bodily strength when you go to fight the enemies of Allah... on the battlefield.' The entire 'lesson' was purely didactic and tonally monochromatic; Ahmad did not even raise his voice to make his point."

Bill Roberts, president and CEO of VisionTV, said he was delighted with the CBSC decision, which affirmed the broadcaster as possessing "the gold standard" in industry ethics.

Referring to Ahmad's statement on jihad, Roberts stated: "Jihad is used by Muslims in this country and around the world and it has come to be a hot-button word for very obvious reasons. That's about as far as I can go."

Roberts continued, "Notwithstanding the CBSC support, I think it still behooves us to do what we think is right and take additional steps to be sure that hate-mongers not get on our airwaves."

He said VisionTV appointed a task force which included Jews, Muslims, Hindus and Christians, to review the station's code of ethics and make recommendations. The task force has submitted its report, but its conclusions won't be revealed until the network's board meets in April, Roberts said.

Making 'em laugh in Halifax

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOFF
Staff Reporter

Evany Rosen is a funny girl. Funny ha ha, not funny strange, that is.

A native of Toronto, she's one of the founding members of emergent Halifax improvisational comedy troupe, Picnicface – an odd title for a sketch comedy group, she admits. Still, it's one that Rosen and her gang have parlayed into an increasingly successful venture since 2005.

"I always loved comedy and laughter. My family's really funny. All my father's favourite films are comedies. So I got to see a lot of Marx Brothers and Woody Allen movies while growing up," Rosen, 20, told The CJN over coffee at a midtown Second Cup while she was in visiting family over the New Year's break in late December.

No stranger to the world of yuks, at 14, she began studying improvisational comedy with Toronto's Second City theatre and knew instantly she wanted to keep at it.

"I had a lot of appreciation for what laughter could do. And I wanted to find some way to get into it. But when you're 14 or 15, improv is the only thing you can do. It's a great way to train and learn [comedy skills]," she said.

Rosen took those skills, her wit and keen mind out east – ostensibly to attend university – and used them to connect with Picnicface co-founder, Kyle Dooley, while performing together in a play in Halifax.

The rest is comedic history in the making.

Picnicface has since ramped up to an eight-member ensemble – Rosen said her role is primarily as a writer, though she's been in numerous sketches and is working on improving her standup routine – and has cultivated a rabid following on the East Coast.

Though Picnicface plays regular gigs at a local Halifax tavern, Rosen said the focus of the group has shifted toward a more video-oriented, Internet-based philosophy.

"Andrew Bush, the newest member of the troupe, is responsible for that. He has a lot of video skills and has made a lot of short films. And now that has become what we do. We started as a live sketch troupe, and now that's secondary to the video aspect," she said. And they're getting noticed. Big time.

The troupe was recently commissioned by Sony Entertainment to create a series of Internet-based comedy sketches for the company to showcase on its website.

The Internet is "kind of like the Wild West right now," Rosen said. "By virtue of our presence on YouTube and our website, we've been contacted by Sony and [Hollywood movie giant] the Weinstein Company and others to work for their Internet divisions. As much as we'd love to perform and build up our audience base in Atlantic Canada, if Sony wants something from us, it's more important than making Moncton laugh. No disrespect to Moncton, it's just the nature of the beast. Plus, Sony's got more money than Moncton."

What's more, Rosen and the Picnicface gang have even been praised by some of Hollywood's biggest comedy stars for their unique comedic stylings.

For instance, ex-Saturday Night Live alumnus Will Ferrell flagged the group's videos on his comedy video website, Fun nyordie.com, where they've garnered some of the best ratings.

"He actually picked some of our videos as funniest... twice!" Rosen enthused.

It's all part of Picnicface's master plan, which is to redefine Canadian sketch comedy by moving away from the traditional lampooning of stagnant topics and focusing on the irreverent, she suggests.

"We're trying to do something different. Sketch comedy has been going on in Canada for some time," she said, citing the long-running shows such as The Royal Canadian Air Farce, This Hour Has 22 Minutes and Comedy Inc.

"They all come from that politically based area, which is an important staple of Canadian comedy. But we like to... try for a different brand of comedy, which is lacking at the moment, it seems to me," Rosen said.

That brand is about being cheeky and trying to ruffle some feathers, although to date, the group hasn't managed to spark too much outrage.

Still, they've mocked, ridiculed and satirized a wealth of subjects considered sacrosanct and they're proud of it.

"We haven't had [negative] feedback. Probably because the people who would get up in arms over our sketches aren't surfing the Internet all that much," Rosen said.

"But if you go through some of the comments [on the Picnicface message board] you have writers with screen names like 'Jesus is my homeboy' and they have all kinds of unhappy things to say about how I'm gonna burn in hell for my [comedic] irreverence."

Rosen is referring to one specific video sketch in which, speaking as a Jew, she turns to look at a crucifix, then looks back at the camera after pondering for a second, before uttering, "You know what? I'd do it again."

"So far no one has come after me. But that's my goal. To have the Catholic Church come after me with torches," she quipped.

When she's not on stage or on a video shoot with Picnicface, Rosen is busy with her education, studying at Dalhousie University and its affiliate institution, the University of King's College, in a combined honours degree in history and early modern studies.

"It's kinda ridiculous," Rosen said, alluding to the usefulness of her degree. "But my family all agreed that whatever course my life may take, this bachelor's degree will be completed before anything else happens."

Rosen's family back in Toronto attend the Beth Hahonim synagogue, where she was bat mitzvah.

"I was raised kind of in a traditional Reform family," she said, then paused before quipping, "I don't know if traditional Reform Judaism even exists, but it does in Toronto, I guess. Yes, Toronto makes room for us."

So what makes her laugh?

"All kinds of things. I really enjoy comedy that redefines something I already know or points something out to me that should have been obvious," she answered. "Finding the absurdity in everyday things is a wonderful function of comedy. I think there's some salvation to be found in that. And that all sounds very lofty."

Outside of comedy, Rosen said she'd love to continue on in academia or in journalism if her improv career doesn't pan out.

Man's condition improves as court battle continues

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — The family of an 84-year-old Orthodox Jew who is on life support says his condition has improved substantially after hospital doctors unsuccessfully tried to pull the plug on him more than two months ago because they said there was no hope for his recovery.

Family was able to get an ex parte injunction to prevent hospital from removing life support

Miriam Geller said that her father, Sam Golubchuk, who is unwittingly at the centre of a precedent-setting court case, is now "being weaned off life support" and "is awake and holding our hands."

"The nurses have him up in a cardiac chair every day a couple of times a day for two to three hours" and "a physio-therapist comes in regularly to do arm and leg exercises," she added.

Golubchuk is alive today because his family was able to get an ex parte injunction (without notice to the hospital) from Justice Perry Schulman of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench that prevented doctors at Winnipeg's Grace Hospital from removing his life support, which would have violated the family's wishes and religious beliefs.

At a hearing on Dec. 11, the hospital and doctors maintained that Golubchuk had minimal brain function.

Following that hearing, the family's lawyer, Neil Kravetsky, sought to file affidavits by Dr. Daniel Rosenblatt, a critical care physician in New Jersey, and Dr. Leon Zacharowicz, a neurologist from New York, that disputed the hospital's position.

After a Jan. 11 hearing, Schulman allowed Kravetsky to refile edited versions of these affidavits as evidence.

In his refiled affidavit, Zacharowicz said that even according to entries in Golubchuk's medical chart made before Dec. 11, there "is no evidence whatsoever that he is brain dead, close to brain dead, or dying, from a neurological point of view."

Zacharowicz concludes: "The decision of any medical professional to disconnect this clearly alive patient... whom medical records indicate is returning neurologically to his baseline, pre-admission clinical condition, is incomprehensible to me."

Schulman is allowing lawyers for the hospital to cross-examine Rosenblatt and Zacharowicz on their affidavits and to file additional affidavits in response. The judge has not made a final ruling in the case.

Lawyers for the hospital and doctors maintain that the decision to withdraw a patient from life support ought to be made by treating physicians and should not be put in the hands of the courts.

On Jan. 30, Manitoba's College of Physicians and Surgeons released new guidelines, effective Feb. 1, that say the final decision to pull the plug on a patient lies with his or her physician.

The guidelines say the minimum goal of life-sustaining treatment is for patients to recover to a level where they can be aware of themselves, their environment and their existence.

In the event a physician and a family don't agree as to whether the minimum goal has been met, the guidelines say the decision ultimately rests with the physician, who must consult with one other physician and then communicate the decision to the family.

In the event a patient could achieve the "minimum goal" but his or her physician concludes treatment should be withdrawn, the doctor must give the patient's family written or verbal notice 96 hours before life support is stopped.

Dr. Bill Pope, the college's registrar, said the guidelines are not a response to the Golubchuk case and added that 100 stakeholders have been working to draft the new guidelines over the past three years.

He would not comment on the Golubchuk case, but he said the college would review its statement if Schulman rules in favour of Golubchuk's family.

Kravetsky called the new guidelines "terrible," adding that it's "extremely suspicious that after taking three years to prepare these guidelines, the college would release them now and direct doctors to follow them immediately when the court is ruling on this very issue."

Medical ethicist Pat Murphy, of St. Boniface General Hospital in Winnipeg, said the college has put patients and their families at a clear disadvantage.

"You and I didn't elect the college," she said. "Discussions around withholding or withdrawing life-sustaining treatment aren't solely medical decisions. In Ontario, for example, where a physician and a family disagree, there is consent legislation providing a remedy to a third party that will hear both sides to the conflict."

Murphy also said she considers the guidelines' 96-hour-notice provision to be unreasonable, because it does not give sufficient time to allow a patient's family to get legal advice and make an application to a court to issue an emergency injunction, as occurred in the Golubchuk case.

In response, Pope said some of the stakeholders consulted in drafting the guidelines felt "that the notice provision could be less than 96 hours."

Jewish groups work to counter Israeli Apartheid Week

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Organizers of Israeli Apartheid Week have concluded their fourth year of anti-Israel programming on university campuses worldwide, but members of the Jewish community were intent on ensuring that their side of the story would also be heard.

Last week at the University of Ottawa, during a lecture titled "Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East," Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, denounced Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) as "crude propaganda, pure hypocrisy and cynical manipulation of the student body," the Ottawa Citizen reported.

He called the event, organized by groups such as the Arab Students' Collective, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid, a "celebration of ignorance, both of the meaning of apartheid and a complete and utter lack of awareness of the state of Israel and what it means."

In the Feb. 5 issue of the National Post, in an open letter written to David Naylor, president of the University of Toronto, where IAW was first launched in 2004, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies expressed disappointment that the week-long event was allowed to occur on campus.

"Israel is a pluralistic democracy where Christians, Bahai, Jews, Muslims, Druze and others have freedoms and rights that are utterly lacking in neighboring Arab countries," the advertisement said.

"Denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination by claiming that the existence of Israel is a racist endeavour is anti-Semitic. Applying a double standard by requiring of Israel behaviour not demanded of any of its neighbours is anti-Semitic."

Two days later, U of T ran an ad in the Post in response that defended the president's decision to allow IAW programming to take place at his school.

"Cancelling events because of anticipated controversy rapidly changes the nature of the debate. Instead of public attention focusing on the actual positions of the speaker or sponsoring group (sometimes extreme and therefore lacking broad appeal), the focus shifts to the abrogated free speech rights of the affected groups and can create publicity and even sympathy for an extreme view."

But Betar Canada's executive director Orna Hollander said she's worried about the fact that a full generation of students have been educated by IAW events.

"The rule of marketing is that if you say something between seven and 10 times, even if you don't believe it or accept the philosophy, it is part of their knowledge bank now that Israel is an apartheid state. Even if they have no feelings about it, even if they are not angry about it," she said.

IAW has been spreading to more and more campuses every year, and this year, organizers even managed to take their cause to the airwaves.

On Feb. 6, York University's non-profit campus radio station, CHRY 105.5 FM, produced a full day of IAW programming, called Anti-Apartheid Frequencies, that ran from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Some of the segments in the eight-hour event included "Israeli Apartheid Week: Students Strike Back," which focused on the role of "student-based resistance movements and the ways in which campuses can fight back," and "Amandla Intifada," which focused on similarities between the Palestinians and black South Africans.

CHRY, which is partly funded by a levy on York students, posted a blurb about the day's program on its website that said the objectives of Anti-Apartheid Frequencies "are to contribute to the chorus of international opposition to Israeli apartheid and to bolster support for the Boycott/Divestment/Sanctions campaign," which calls for an "end to the occupation and colonization of all Arab lands."

A day before the IAW programming aired, the station's website said that staff at CHRY "support these aims and are using this space to explore the importance and role of independent community media in this and other liberation struggles."

Two days later, that statement was removed and replaced by: "CHRY is a community-based campus station. Our mandate is to provide alternative programming."

Speaking with The C/N a day before Anti-Apartheid Frequencies aired, Robin Alam, CHRY's program co-ordinator, said the programming committee made sure it would be balanced and fair.

"We've been sure to invite different perspectives to the conversation so it isn't one-sided. Mind you, we are an organization whose mandate does dictate that we can look at things from alternative perspectives or things that aren't covered by the mainstream," Alam said.

Hillel of Greater Toronto's associate director, Tilly Shames, said she was contacted by the CHRY to take part in the programming, but she said she was reluctant, because it was clear that CHRY supports IAW.

"What we wanted to do was ensure that [IAW's] message didn't dominate the entire day and that every hour, there was a positive message about Israel or a message that contradicted the statements that were being made... We asked students to call in at different times."

Hollander and Hasbara Fellowships campus co-ordinator Ben Feferman said they were not approached about being on any of the programming, nor was anyone from their organizations.

"They didn't contact me," Hollander said. "The campus knows exactly who Ben and I are and exactly what our organizations do. They might have given you a song and dance about balance."

David Ashwal, program associate at Hillel at York, did take the opportunity to speak. He faced off against Daniel Freeman-Maloy, who has clashed with York's administration over his part in two noisy protests on campus regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Ashwal said he took part in the station's "Israeli Apartheid Week: Students Strike Back" segment, but when Hillel offered

CHRY the opportunity to interview Benjamin Pogrud, who is on the editorial board of the Palestine-Israel Journal and writes about the Middle East and South Africa for Ha'aretz, the station refused to include him in the day's programming.

Omme-Salma Rahemtulla, CHRY's spoken word co-ordinator, confirmed that Hillel was the only pro-Israel voice represented during the eight-hour event.

But Shames said she was encouraged by the positive student response to the pro-Israel programming that Hillel provided at York.

About 20 students from York's international relations, political science and peace and conflict studies programs attended a lecture by Yuriv Oppenheimer, general director of Peace Now.

"It was clear that the students from those departments are looking for dialogue and that they're not looking for polarized messages on campus."

Hillel also ran a series of ads, titled "This is Israel," to promote the diversity of Israeli society in Excalibur, the Ryersonian and the Varsity, three campus newspapers at York, Ryerson University and U of T, respectively.

Rebecca Woods Baum, Hillel's Israel affairs director, said that students were thanking her for bringing the Peacemaker video game – which simulates the challenges of solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – to York, Ryerson and U of T, because it provided students with a positive message.

"A lot of people were put off by the other stuff that was going on, and they were happy to come and see the game and talk about it," Woods Baum said.

She said that some people were confrontational at Ryerson during the Peacemaker tabling session, but she said it gave Hillel an opening to talk about the issues.

"They come in with their biases, but we have a discussion. It never ends up in a yelling match. I think we're able to get our message out there in a calm environment, and I had some really great conversations with people."

Meanwhile, Betar and Hasbara went ahead with Islamic State Apartheid programming at York last week and set up a table to present images and videos that depicted human rights abuses in Islamic states, including stoning, honour killings, and executions of homosexuals.

"Essentially our goal and message was there are major human rights violations taking place in Islamic states... Minority groups in these countries are in a really subordinate position and their rights are not being recognized and reinforced by the judicial systems in those countries," said Anna Neuman, a Hasbara board member and York student.

"There were a few people who were screaming, but overall, the people I was speaking to were pretty open and trying to understand what we were trying to convey."

Hollander said that while some students were upset by the material, they also received a lot of support from others who agreed with their broader message.

"We were even approached by the head of the [York campus group] Iranian Students for Human Rights, in terms of joining us next time. It was really encouraging at times."

'UN tilted against Israel'

suggestions that would help in organizing the event.

Participants and observers at the original Durban conference, known officially as the 2001 World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance, were shocked at the extreme anti-Semitic rhetoric and propaganda that circulated at the event.

The followup conference, dubbed Durban II, is being organized by a committee established by the UN Human Rights Council, which itself has been accused of focusing almost exclusively on Israel while ignoring human rights abuses around the world. The UN body has appointed Libya to chair the preparatory committee organizing Durban II, and the committee includes such anti-Israel advocates as Iran and Cuba.

Canada has announced it would not take part in Durban II. Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier, and Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity, issued a statement last month that said: "Canada has a long and proud history of fighting racism, discrimination and intolerance in all its forms. It was for this reason, and its promise of concerted global action against racism, that we participated in [Durban I]. Unfortunately, that conference degenerated into open and divisive expressions of intolerance and anti-Semitism that undermined the principles of the United Nations and the very goals the conference sought to achieve."

"Secretary of State Kenney and I had hoped that the preparatory process for the 2009 Durban Review Conference would remedy the mistakes of the past," Bernier said. "We have concluded that, despite our efforts, it will not. Canada will, therefore, not participate in the 2009 conference."

Grafstein noted that Liberal leader Stephane Dion has backed the official Canadian position. Grafstein said that the government's refusal to attend "is a major step forward from the last time."

Louise Arbour, the UN's High Commissioner for Human Rights, at first supported an Arab League human rights charter that equated Zionism with racism. Arbour reversed herself and criticized that aspect of the charter only after she was pressured to moderate her position, he said.

In proposing an alternative conference, Grafstein said he was inspired by the 1936 "People's Olympiad," which was organized as a protest to the official Olympic Games being in Nazi Germany.

That alternative competition, which was to have been held in Barcelona, was cancelled after Spain plunged into civil war.

Grafstein said an alternative to the Durban II conference would permit human rights advocates to meet at a "balanced conference" and take advantage of the media presence and "so we can act as a restraint on UN officials. This time, they won't get a free ride."

A special event for Friends of the Faculty of Law, Hebrew University of Jerusalem

אחיוּבִּיטוּסֵיפֵי הַחֵבְרֵי הַיְּבִרֵי

In a 7-2 ruling, the Supreme Court of Canada found that a civil divorce agreement signed by Jessel Marcovitz in which he agreed to grant Stephanie Bruker a get (Jewish divorce) created a valid civil obligation notwithstanding Mr. Marcovitz's claim of freedom of religion. The court rejected the argument that it had no jurisdiction in the matter because it involved a religious obligation.

"I believe a combination of steps against Hamas in Gaza will bring an end to the Hamas regime in Gaza," Ramon told reporters. "They will not last. It will take a few months, maybe it will take a year."

Ramon said he was recommending to the cabinet that it step up its campaign against Hamas by targeting all group leaders "directly or indirectly" involved in attacks against Israelis.

He also said Israel should respond to cross-border attacks by immediately attacking areas from which rockets are launched, and by tightening restrictions on supplies of electricity and fuel to Gaza.

Ramon's comments came after Defence Minister Ehud Barak said earlier Monday that Israel would intensify its military campaign to curb Palestinian rocket fire from the Gaza Strip and was preparing for a possible broader offensive in the territory.

Hamas dismissed Ramon's comments as "wishful thinking" and said Israel was working with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who wants to oust Hamas from the Gaza Strip. "Betting on siege and aggression to topple Hamas would prove to be a complete failure," Hamas official Abu Zuhri said.

Also Monday, Infrastructure Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer urged stepping up targeted assassinations of Hamas leaders, as well as of Qassam rocket crews and their commanders.

"They don't know when the missile is going to reach them, and that is the [point of] the focused prevention [assassinations]," he told Army Radio.

"We needn't have mercy – rather to go with all our might," he said. "The IDF is ready to perform if called upon."

During a meeting on security developments

Sunday and at the weekly cabinet meeting, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Barak said Israel needs to continue its preparations for a large-scale military operation in the Gaza Strip, but there is no point in rushing into one.

Olmert was steadfast against pressure from cabinet ministers to change Israel's response to the Qassam attacks from the Gaza Strip.

"There are many operations against the Qassam attacks, but there is no way to put an absolute end to the terrorism in a single blow or a single air attack," Olmert later told reporters on his plane, on the way to a visit to Germany.

"Even after Defensive Shield [the operation against militants in the West Bank in 2002] terrorism continued, it took a long time to curtail it," Olmert added.

During the cabinet meeting, Olmert answered calls for retaliation for the injury of two brothers in Sderot. Rami Twito, 19, and his brother Osher, 8, were seriously injured by Qassam rockets. Both were treated in Barzilai Hospital, where Osher had to have a leg amputated.

Olmert responded by saying that "rage is not a plan."

Many ministers were critical of the situation in Sderot and the other communities bordering the Gaza Strip.

Interior Minister Meir Sheetrit was vociferous in his demands for action. "We are trying to talk in English to a population that only understands Arabic," he said.

"We need to target all those responsible for terrorism without asking who they are. It is not acceptable that we do not respond when we are being attacked. The IDF needs to wipe out a neighbourhood in Gaza – warn the residents and then go into the neighbourhood."

But on the plane, Olmert responded differently to the cabinet's criticism of the Gaza operations. "There has been fighting in the Gaza Strip for many months. We are holding regular talks on the Gaza Strip and we will have more talks. In 2007, we killed 500 militants in Gaza. So saying that we are doing nothing ignores reality."

For its part, the IDF is stepping up its preparations for the possibility of a large-scale ground operation in Gaza.

Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi recently gave orders for such preparations, but army sources insist that they have not received any order to initiate an operation. Military sources said such an operation is not likely to begin for several more weeks.

Barak has reiterated that Israel will not embark on a military operation unless Israel defines its goals, "has a [political] exit plan" and prepares the ground for broad international support for its action.

For now, the IDF has been ordered to continue its current operations, but step up the intensity of activity. This will include more intensive air strikes against Hamas targets, assassinations and limited ground operations with forces not penetrating beyond the three-kilometre mark from the border fence into the Gaza Strip.

Security sources also said there is solid information that the terrorist organizations in the West Bank are preparing to dispatch suicide bombers inside Israel.

Meanwhile, Hamas and other Palestinian groups in the Gaza Strip did not carry out any Qassam rocket attacks against Israel on Sunday. Israel Radio reported late Sunday night that one rocket landed in an open field near the coast north of the Gaza Strip. No injuries or damage was reported.

Nonetheless, a member of the Popular Front for Liberation of Palestine was killed Sunday afternoon in a firefight between a group of Palestinian gunmen and an IDF patrol, near the border fence in the northern Strip.

Also Sunday, a leading Hamas militant was killed in an air strike on Rafah.

In another air strike on an installation of the military wing of Hamas near Khan Yunis, 10 Palestinians were injured.

Hamas' new policy of deterrence

By AMOS HAREL and AVI ISSACHAROFF

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The injuries suffered by brothers Rami and Osher Twito in Saturday night's Qassam rocket strike on Sderot have still not sent the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) into the Gaza Strip on a major ground offensive. Israel's political leadership remains unconvinced that the military plan will necessarily bring about a positive change in the situation along the border with Gaza.

In spite of the political pressure to take action, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Ehud Barak would like to maximize the room they have to manoeuvre before they order a large-scale military operation.

Analysis

However, the direction of developments in recent weeks is clear. They are moving more and more toward a direct confrontation, in the near future, between Hamas and the IDF. One of the main reasons for the escalation stems from the attempt by Hamas to establish a new deterrent against Israel.

Since mid-January, Hamas has operated differently in the Gaza Strip. It no longer uses short-term and irrational responses to IDF ground raids or air attacks. For each Israeli operation, especially if it involves a large number of casualties in the ranks of the organization, Hamas responds with a drawn-out rocket barrage of three to four days. At its completion, Hamas lowers the intensity until the next round of violence.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2008 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 29, 2008. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 2008.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 20, 2008. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

CEMETERY DESECRATED

Two teenage boys, 15 and 16, were arrested by police in the Hungarian town of Kaposvár, 190 kilometres southwest of Budapest, last week after they admitted to defacing some two dozen graves with swastikas and anti-Semitic slogans in the town's Jewish cemetery. It was the fourth time in the past 12 months the cemetery has been vandalized.

American says he was expelled from Belgian cafe for wearing kippah

ANTWERP — A U.S. professor who was born in Auschwitz just before the concentration camp's liberation in 1945 said he was kicked out of a restaurant in the Belgian city of Bruges two weeks ago because he was a Jew, according to European news reports.

Marcel Kalmann said that a waiter at the Le Panier d'Or, a renowned café-restaurant located on the main city square, saw his skullcap under his hat and shouted at him "We are not serving Jews! Out of here," according to the reports.

Kalmann told the Antwerp Jewish magazine Joods Actueel that when he went down to the police station to file a report, the officers did not believe him at first and heckled him throughout the complaint.

An officer told him that the complaint had to be filed in Flemish, not English, and then told him that the incident would not be considered an anti-Semitic offence, according to a report in the European Jewish Press (EJP).

The owner of the restaurant told Joods Actueel that Kalmann was indeed kicked out of the restaurant due to "strange behaviour." He said he was ready to apologize for the incident, according to the report.

Kalmann said he would file a complaint against both the police and the restaurant, according to the magazine.

Kalmann was born in Auschwitz three days before the liberation of the Nazi camp by the Russian army, according to the EJP.

There are about 40,000 Jews living in Belgium today, most of them in Antwerp or Brussels.

Last year saw a substantial rise in the number of anti-Semitic incidents in Germany, Austria and the Scandinavian countries, according to the Global Forum Against Anti-Semitism.

The Global Forum — a joint effort of the Jewish Agency, the Israeli Foreign Ministry and the Israeli Prime Minister's Office — counted 360 anti-Semitic incidents in France in 2006, compared to 300 in 2005. In the United Kingdom, the report listed a yearly decrease from 321 incidents in 2005 to 312 incidents in 2006.

Russia recorded 300 incidents in 2006, compared to 250 the preceding year, and Austria saw a jump from 50 incidents to 83 last year.

The Scandinavian countries saw 53 incidents in 2006, substantially more than the previous year's 35.

The report cited a 60 per cent rise in incidents in the Berlin area, although it did not include figures for all of Germany.

Hamas worried about possible assassinations

The latest example of this occurred last week. On Tuesday, nine members of Hamas were killed in an IDF operation. Two days later, seven more Palestinians were killed, six gunmen and a civilian. Hamas fired, according to its press release, no fewer than 135 Qassam rockets and mortars between Tuesday and Saturday night, and there was shooting from various smaller groups. Yesterday, Hamas stopped shooting.

The message: henceforth, every Israeli operation will result in a similar response. Hamas is hoping that Israel will agree, after repeated bombing of Sderot, to a period of calm in the territories, and even believes it can bring about an end to the arrests that the IDF is making in the West Bank.

Behind the Hamas decision lies the assumption that the Israeli leadership is wary of a large-scale ground operation. This is based on the traumatic experience of the Second Lebanon War and Israeli concern that it may suffer heavy casualties. Senior officials in the Islamic organization believe Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is too concerned with his political future to risk initiating a broad IDF operation in Gaza.

The heated statements of Israeli ministers during Sunday's cabinet meeting were seen in Gaza as empty threats. Hamas' main concern is that Israel will now choose a campaign of assassinations of senior figures in the military wing of the group, but perhaps also political leaders. This explains the Hamas threats that they will react with attacks of an unprecedented nature if their leaders are targeted.

The IDF's relative failure is evident in its dealing with the main Hamas weapon — the Qassam. Since the disengagement, a great deal of money and effort have been invested in the development of a way to quickly identify the launch of missiles and then strike at the crews launching them from the air and the ground. The results to date have been minimal, even in conditions of good visibility.

The operation by the IDF in the northern Gaza Strip last week offered a glimpse into the reasons for these poor results. Hamas has begun using timers to launch rockets from crude underground silos — a method also used by Hezbollah in Lebanon.

But when Hamas conducts its own internal assessment, it knows that its achievement have also been limited. Indeed, it has managed to terrorize an entire city, but it is not claiming the same kind of casualties that it did during the first three years of the intifadah. And unlike in those years, the threat is not felt in the centre of the country, nor has the Israeli economy suffered any significant consequences.

The main difference between the two sides now is the ability of their societies to absorb punishment and the different way they respond to casualties: the Palestinians are almost resigned to their enormous losses, while in Israel, even wounded children are a strategic problem.

At this stage, while the IDF is completing its preparations for a much more extensive operation, it seems that Israel will not divert significantly from its current approach: ground operations near the border fence, air strikes and assassinations (these will likely increase).

Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi shares Barak's view that there are still parts of the plan that are not complete, and only when they are, will he be ready to give his full support to a broad offensive.

Iran helps Syria develop missile to target Israel

By BARAK RAVID

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syria has successfully developed a new surface-to-surface missile that would enable it to target Israeli installations such as airports, ports and factories with greater accuracy, according to briefings recently presented to senior ministers.

According to the information, Syria developed the new missile with Iranian support, which is a further indication of the tight strategic bonds between the two countries. Much of these strategic ties revolve around military and intelligence co-operation.

Israeli defence officials said they thought Damascus and Tehran shared technical know-how that has allowed Syria to upgrade the Iranian-made Zelzal surface-to-surface missile. The missile has an operational range of approximately 250 kilometers and is capable of carrying an especially large warhead. It is believed that the missile is more accurate than other similar surface-to-surface weapons in the Syrian arsenal.

This comes at a time when Israeli defense sources have expressed growing concern at the rearmament program of the Syrian armed forces, which is mostly being supplied by arms transfers from Russia.

Among other weapons, Syria has recently acquired the Pantsyr air defence missile system, a self-propelled system that is capable of firing from eight to 12 missiles and can pose a substantial threat to Israeli air force aircraft.

Damascus has also procured modern anti-tank missiles with alleged capabilities of neutralizing the most advanced main battle tank of the IDF, the Merkava Mark IV.

However, Mossad chief Meir Dagen told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee that at this stage the Syrian defence acquisitions appear to be defensive and that there are no indications that Damascus has any plans to initiate a military action against Israel.

Meanwhile, a political source has noted that there is a discernible effort on the part of Syria to improve its missile arsenal — both in terms of range and accuracy.

"The problem is that their missiles are being transformed from less-effective weapons into precision weapons that will enable their use against military bases, airports and military depots, which is a very worrying development," the source said.

There is growing concern in Israel that the missile arsenal of Syria will be transformed from being a "blind" strategic weapon into a precision-strike weapon.

Syria has a significant missile arsenal. During the Second Lebanon War Hezbollah fired many volleys of 220-millimetre rockets of Syrian make against Israel, causing significant casualties in Israel.

According to Israeli estimates, Syria has tens of thousands of rockets of this type, as well as smaller-calibre and shorter-range missiles. In addition, they have Scud-C and Scud-D ballistic missiles with ranges of 500 to 800 kilometers, which can effectively strike every part of Israeli territory.

In related developments, Tehran's ambassador to Russia, Gholamreza Ansari, was quoted on Friday by Itar-Tass news agency as saying Iran has started building a second atomic power plant.

"Now we need to think about the fuel for it," the news agency quoted him as saying.

Iran has been building its first nuclear power plant near the southern city of Bushehr, where Tehran says test operations could start later this year after final deliveries by Russia of nuclear fuel arrived at the plant last month.

Western countries suspect Iran's nuclear activities are aimed at weapon building. Iran, the world's fourth-largest crude oil producer, says it only wants to generate electricity so that it can export more of its oil and gas.

New immigrants meet tragedy in Dimona

By DINA KRAFT

JTA

TEL AVIV — Lyubov Razdolakaya and Eduard Gedalin, world-class theoretical physicists, immigrated to Israel from Georgia seeking a better future.

Any future the husband and wife of nearly 50 years had left together came to a halt on Feb. 4 in the desert town of Dimona.

Razdolakaya, 73, was killed when a suicide bomber exploded near her. Gedalin, 74, was wounded critically and is in grave condition in Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva, not far from the lab at the university where they worked together.

Razdolakaya was buried Feb. 5.

When the bomber struck, the couple were on their way to the bank, pausing outside one of the shops in the town's centre to take in the warm sun.

Despite their contributions to the field of particle physics, they were relatively anonymous in their transplanted home.

In the Georgian capital of Tbilisi, Razdolakaya and Gedalin worked in collaboration at the Institute for Theoretical Physics co-authoring important articles.

"He developed the formulas, she coded, entered the input into the computer and got the output," said Amnon Moalem, a physics professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev who hired the couple to work at his lab.

At Ben-Gurion, they studied subatomic particles known as mesons. "Their contribution to research was very significant," Moalem was quoted as saying in Israeli newspapers.

Of Gedalin he said, "Eduard was one of the greatest physicists I had the honour of working with." Moalem said Gedalin "could feel abstract things with his fingers."

The couple came to Israel as part of the major wave of immigration from the former Soviet Union in the 1990s.

After arriving, they joined the Ben-Gurion University program for immigrant scientists, but few knew of the pair's significant achievements in their field.

One son, Michael Gedalin, is a professor of physics at Ben-Gurion University. Another, Konstantin Gedalin, is a physicist who works in high tech.

Moalem wished the couple had found a softer landing in Israel.

"A scientist of Eduard's stature could have been a very prominent researcher," Moalem said, "but he came to a barren place that didn't meet the standards of the research institutions he came from."

More Qassams fired

Palestinians launched at least 22 Qassam rockets at the Negev last Friday, a day after Israel began cutting electricity to the Gaza Strip in an attempt to halt the barrages.

Palestinians in Gaza also fired a mortar into southern Israel.

Four Sderot residents were treated for shock and a warehouse was damaged.

In the early afternoon, five rockets were reported to have landed near the coast south of Ashkelon, one of which struck the grounds of Kibbutz Zikim. Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Popular Resistance Committees claimed responsibility for the Qassam fire. Palestinians fired a dozen rockets and eight mortar shells the previous day.

Barak: rockets will stop

Israel's counter-measures eventually will succeed in stopping Palestinian rocket attacks from the Gaza Strip, Ehud Barak said. The defence minister voiced confidence in the military and diplomatic pressure being brought to bear on Hamas-ruled Gaza, as well as efforts to fortify outlying Israeli communities against rocket salvos. "If rocket fire from Gaza continues, we will step up our operations until a solution to the Qassam fire is achieved," Barak told Army Radio. "This will not end today or tomorrow, but the combination of operations on the one hand and sanctions on the other, as well as fortifications in some communities, will bring an end to Qassam fire."

Sarkozy stands by Israel

France stands by Israel in its fight against Palestinian terrorism, Nicolas Sarkozy said. The French president sent Israel a letter of support after last week's suicide bombing in Dimona. "On my behalf, and on behalf of the French nation, I would like to send you my sincere condolences after the horrible terrorist attack which was once again aimed at the Israeli people," read the letter, a copy of which was released by Israeli President Shimon Peres' office. "My thoughts are with the victim's families and with the wounded. "I would like to assure you that France remains on your side and will continue to do so in the battle against terror. My country will provide Israel with every support necessary to assist with your efforts to make the peace process succeed," Sarkozy said.

Broken border, broken legs?

The Egyptian foreign ministry warned Palestinians against attempts to breach the Gaza Strip border, saying, "whoever breaks the border line will have his legs broken." The ministry issued this warning two weeks after Palestinian militants blew holes in a section of the barrier wall separating Gaza from Egypt prompting hundreds of thousands of Gazans to pour across the frontier. Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said Egyptian efforts were continuing with Israel and the European Union to re-open the Rafah border crossing "in a legal way." Aboul Gheit also repeated his warning to Palestinians not to provoke the Egyptian soldiers positioned on the Gaza border.

Jewish displaced persons era in postwar Germany

Jews, Germans, And Allies: Close Encounters in Occupied Germany by Atina Grossmann, Princeton University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Germany, occupied by the Allies after World War II, was home to some 250,000 Jews by 1946. The vast majority were displaced eastern European Jews who had managed to scrape through the Holocaust. The remainder, German Jews, had either gone into hiding or had been protected by Christian spouses.

Atina Grossmann

Nazi regime that had pulled Germany into a disastrous war, and then of Allied bombings, Soviet expulsions and mass rapes and a de-Nazification process.

Both Jews and Germans competed for Allied favour, benefits and victim status in a scramble that often caused mutual friction.

• Atina Grossmann, in Jews, Germans, And Allies: Close En- counters in Occupied Germany, examines these dynamics in a fine social history that focuses on the period from 1945 to 1947.

Ninety thousand Jews in German concentration camps were liberated by Allied armies. Tens of thousands died within weeks of attaining their freedom, leaving 60,000 to 70,000 survivors.

This remnant was augmented by predominantly Polish Jews who poured into the American zone. They had survived death camps and labour camps. They had been partisans. They had passed as Aryans. They had been hidden. The largest segment, however, had found a wartime haven in the Soviet Union.

Grossmann, a professor of history at Cooper Union, describes their lives and the relationships they formed against the backdrop of the Allied occupation.

She sets the stage by painting a graphic picture of Germany in the immediate aftermath of the Nazi defeat. Berlin, the focus of her investigation, was like an "archaeological excavation," having been bombed into a smouldering ruin.

For Germans, the mass rapes perpetrated by Red Army soldiers signalled the end of the war. According to a conservative estimate, 110,000 German women were raped. But others have suggested that the real number may have been 1.5 million. Whatever the case, the sexual violence was a blot on the Allied victory.

German Jewish women who lived through the Nazi interregnum may have been rape victims as well. Six to seven thousand Jews in Berlin survived underground as "illegals" and "submarines."

Still other German Jews, categorized as mixed race Mischlinge or partners in "privileged" mixed marriages, were exempted from deportations.

Such Jews comprised the bulk of Berlin's postwar Jewish community. Of 8,000 registered members, 5,600 had Christian spouses. Vying for better ratios and material conditions, Jews who had left the community altogether after the Nazi rise to power reapplied for membership, Grossmann notes.

In general, German Jews who had survived the Holocaust in Germany were far more hopeful than non-German Jews about the possibilities of reconciliation and co-operation in building a new, democratic Germany.

The latter, harbouring animosity against Germany and unwilling to return to their respective hometowns, were usually intent on settling elsewhere, particularly Israel and the United States.

Citing the Landsberg camp as an example, Grossmann says that 62 per cent wanted to make aliyah, while 17 per cent looked to the United States as a preferred destination.

To many survivors, Zionism worked as a kind of "therapeutic ideology," offering a sense of a collective identity, hope and future.

Interestingly enough, the Jewish DP birth rate was astronomical, higher than any other population in the world. In 1946, it was 29 per 1,000 versus 7.35 per 1,000 for Germans.

Survivors were so anxious to marry and procreate that many of the newlyweds hardly knew each other. Marriages that would have never occurred before the war took place.

Having dipped into DP camp medical records, Grossmann says that virtually all young Jewish mothers, bereft of a support system traditionally provided by mothers or sisters, were assigned a German baby nurse or maid.

In an intriguing sub-chapter, Grossman discusses romantic liaisons between Jewish men and German women.

Young, inexperienced male survivors gravitated to German women, and by 1950, they had married 1,000 such women. Often, the women were refugees, lonely and eager for a little bit of fun.

On the flip side, embittered survivors picked fights with Germans and sought vengeance by trying to assassinate former SS men.

Abba Kovner, the Vilna partisan and poet, was implicated in an aborted plot to poison the bread supply of SS and Gestapo prisoners, she adds.

Believing that the Allies were favourably disposed toward Jews, Germans sunk into sullen resentment and displayed occasional outbursts of rage, Grossmann writes.

And in certain areas, like Bavaria, Hesse and Wurttemberg, where Jewish DPs were concentrated, Germans complained about their presence, fearing they would be swamped by Jews.

Although their encounters were often mutually useful and relatively harmonious, both groups grated on each other's nerves.

The Jews were infuriated by German self-pity and unwillingness to acknowledge responsibility for Nazi crimes. The Germans increasingly saw Jews not as victims but as privileged foreigners either unwilling to blend in or leave.

Ultimately, the DPs left, and in droves. By 1952, 400,000 to 450,000 DPs, of whom about 100,000 were Jews, had immigrated to the United States.

Of 250,000 Jewish DPs, 100,000 to 120,000 settled in Israel. Sixteen thousand to 20,000 went to Canada; 8,000 to Belgium; 2,000 to France; and 5,000 to a variety of destinations from Australia to South Africa.

As a result, the DP camps, including Feldafing and Landsberg, had all but been emptied by 1951. Föhrenwald, the last DP camp, closed in 1957, as the final batch of German prisoners of war returned from the Soviet Union.

The Jewish "DP era," as Grossmann succinctly says it, faded into history.

A hip-hoppy trip from the land of milk and honey

By ADAM MENCELES
Special to The CJN

Squeeze some mustard on your pastrami, clip your kippot on tight and fasten your seatbelts. Kosha Dillz is here to take you on a hip-hoppy trip from the land of milk and honey to the streets of New York City.

Sure his name is a play on words – and that may sound a little hokey to you, but his subject matter is quite serious. Kosha Dillz is the hip-hop persona of Israeli-American Rami Even-Esh.

Now living in Brooklyn, N.Y., Kosha has a plethora of subject matters to pull from. He touches on political situations in the Middle East and the United States as well as the day-to-day life of making music as a hip-hop artist.

He simply wants to speak his mind. Although he may sound like an acquired taste, the media and fellow musical artists alike have really taken a shine to him.

Kosha Dillz

He has appeared on BET's famed 106 & Park and has recorded with chassidic reggae superstar Matisyahu. The most intriguing notion is that Kosha bends borders and genres; he takes Israeli-Jewish ethics and blends them into songs complete with hip-hop beats and sabra attitude.

He is currently headlining The Spare Change Tour, which will house clothing drives at every venue – all of the proceeds supporting various charities around the United States and Israel. Although the tour doesn't touch down anywhere on Canadian soil, Kosha will undoubtedly make his way across the border as his popularity skyrockets within the Jewish community as well as the hip-hop community at large.

His new album Freestyle vs. Written is a fitting collaboration with hip-hop artist C Rayz Walz. The pair seems to mesh flawlessly on all of the tracks. You'll hear tunes sung in both English and Hebrew, adding to the diverse quality of the record. The title track is expertly produced and flawlessly emceed. This rap-duet hits you with turntable scratches from the left, unique melody samples from the right and superior battle lyrics from every other angle.

Holiday is Kosha's commentary and recitation about our leisure time – listing his past experiences and memories of celebrations from Labour Day to Valentines Day and everything in between.

Rap music may not be your cup of tea or it may be your passion – either way, just listen to Kosha Dillz for more than one minute and you'll hear someone who's got something relevant to say.

His method of delivery may be a tad unorthodox, but his message hits home in the same manner as your rabbi's sermon might.

While touring in and around New York and the rest of the United States, Rami does his rounds at every Jewish institution that'll take him. He rocks the mic at local shuls and fundraisers. He raps awareness and politics at music festivals and university shindigs.

If he happens by your neck of the woods, be sure to catch his show. If you can't manage to see him live, order a copy of his album and imagine yourself easing back into the new wave of conscious Israeli hip hop – become part of the Kosha Dillz posse.

NEW HAROLD GREEN JEWISH THEATRE COMPANY PRESENTS MARTIN SHERMAN'S ROSE

The Harold Green Jewish Theatre opens its inaugural season with Rose, Martin Sherman's story of an elderly Jewish woman's experiences in the Russian shtetl, the Warsaw Ghetto, the doomed refugee ship Exodus and the fading glitz of postwar Atlantic City.

Directed by Diana Leblanc and starring Lally Cadeau, Rose is a sharply drawn portrait of a feisty octogenarian and a moving reminder of some of the tumultuous events of the 20th century. $41.50 to $69. St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, Jane Mallett Theatre, 27 Front St. E. Feb. 29 to March 29. 416-366-7723, www.hgjewishtheatre.com

Names in the News: Toronto actor Irving Dobbs recently returned from the Sundance Film Festival, where a short movie in which he appears was honoured. Rock Garden: A Love Story, by Toronto writer-director Gloria Kim, received the Global Audience Award in the short-film category. Dobbs is currently rehearsing for his lead role in Chaim's Love Song, a dramatic comedy that runs at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Feb. 27 to March 9.

New York Choir Sings Here: Pizmon, a 20-year-old Jewish cappella choir consisting of students from New York's Columbia University, Barnard College and Jewish Theological Seminary, is performing at three local synagogues.

A Shabbat Family Dinner, featuring Zmirrot with Pizmon, is scheduled at Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah, 100 Elder St., 416-633-3838. Friday, Feb. 22, 7 p.m. Adults $35, children 13 and under, $15.

The choir sings at Shabbat services at Adath Israel, 37 Southbourne Ave., 416-635-5340, on Saturday, Feb. 23, from 9 a.m., and after services during Kiddush.

Pizmon performs a community concert at Beth Radom Congregation, 18 Reiner Rd., 416-636-3451. Saturday, Feb. 23, 8 p.m. Reserved $50, general admission $18, students $10. Combination package available. www.pizmon.org

Chai Tea & Movie: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival presents The Counterfeiters, by Austrian director Stefan Ruzowitzky. The film recounts a diabolical Nazi plot in which imprisoned Jews were recruited to counterfeit hoards of British pounds and U.S. dollars in a bid to collapse these nations' economies. $15 in advance or at the door. Sheppard Grande Cinema, Yonge & Sheppard. Sunday, Feb. 24, chai tea 4 p.m., film 5 p.m. 416-324-9121, www.tjff.com

Names in the News II: Toronto poet Rafi Aaron has won third prize in the Toronto Fringe Festival's 2008 New Play Contest. The play, Mandelstam, is based on Aaron's book of prose poetry, Surviving the Censor - The Unspoken Words of Osip Mandelstam, which won the poetry award at the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards last year.

While both focus on Stalin's persecution of poet Osip Mandelstam, the play takes a new perspective. "It's a completely new piece of art that focuses on Mandelstam's relationship with his wife," he said. Two characters from the book were dropped and Russian poet Anna Akhmatova was added to the play.

This is the third artistic life for Surviving the Censor, which has been put to music by Daniel Domb, one of Canada's finest cellists, and performed at the Leah Posluns Theatre, as the closing event of the 2006 Toronto Jewish Book Fair.

Bewitching new fiction from former Montrealer

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Sarah Mlynowski wants to be a writer when she grows up – oh, wait: she is grown-up. At 31, this nice Jewish girl from Montreal is living and loving the big-city writer's life.

It almost sounds like something out of one of the chick lit novels she writes. After earning her English literature degree from McGill, Mlynowski (it's pronounced Mlin-OV-ski) moved to Toronto to work for Harlequin Enterprises, the romance publishers. There, in 2001, her talent was discovered with Milkrun, her first novel, which has now sold over 600,000 copies worldwide.

Since then, she's written or co-written more than 10 books, including the Magic in Manhattan series, set in her new home of New York. It's about ordinary teen sisters who just happen to have "Glinda" – their special code word for witching power.

For a hard-working writer, Mlynowski sounds suspiciously like she's having fun. In her first blog post of 2008, she bubbled that her newest Magic in Manhattan book, Parties and Potions, was finally complete: "Yay! There's magic! Boys! A witch debutante ball!"

A debutante ball closely based on her own group Bat Mitzvah. ("But I obviously changed it to be witch-friendly.") Growing up in Montreal's Jewish community – she attended JPPS-Bialik High School – Judaism was a big part of her life.

Mlynowski's spiritual roots are still proudly Canadian. "My husband's family is still in Montreal, and my dad lives in Oakville now... I go home for Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, Passover." She also has family in Israel, where she's been three times, once with March of the Living.

Mlynowski says her many strong, vocal female characters may stem from Jewish influences. Plus, "there's so much humour in Judaism; more than anything I write hoping to entertain, make people laugh." Finding the lighter side of disaster – perhaps revolving around a roommate situation or love interest – is "definitely a Jewish value," she says.

"Almost all of my books have a Jewish character," says Mlynowski, including Magic in Manhattan's main character, 14-year-old Rachel Weinstein.

Although Parties and Potions won't be out for a while, fans can look forward to the upcoming release of the paperback edition of Spells and Sleeping Bags (April, Random House). For the grown-ups, there's also How to be Bad (May, HarperCollins), written with two other authors. "It's about three girls on a road trip through Florida trying to find themselves."

Sarah Mlynowski

Each of the three authors (Mlynowski, E. Lockhart and Lauren Myracle) chose a character and took turns writing a chapter in their character's voice. Early collaboration happened online, but "once we sold the novel, we met in Florida and plotted out the rest of the book." Even editing was "a blast." Once we were finished, then we could dig in and edit each other's work... We just had so much fun."

Naturally, Mlynowski's character is a Jewish girl from Montreal. But that's where most similarity ends. "I never take anything true and put it in a book," she says.

And contrary to what you might think, friends don't hide details of their romantic lives from her: "People love being in books... a friend will call and say, 'I have a crazy dating story for you.'" She laughs. "The only people territorial about anecdotes are other writers."

Still, Mlynowski loves spending time with colleagues. "There's such a fantastic community of writers here" in New York. Her social circle reads like an Amazon.com bestseller list: lunch with The Nanny Diaries' Emma McLaughlin, parties and readings with teen writers Scott Westerfeld and even her one-time idol, former Montrealer Gordon Korman. "When I was at JPPS, he came to our class and talked to us about becoming a writer... it was so inspiring to me."

She's also thrilled to collaborate, as she did on How to be Bad, or with editor Farrin Jacobs on See Jane Write: A Girl's Guide to Writing Chick Lit. "As a writer, you're isolated, spend all your time by yourself, stuck in your own head."

For someone who reads everything from John Grisham thrillers to literary fiction, she doesn't feel at all constrained by the light romance genre.

"People make assumptions – that the book's about shopping, [or] it's about getting dumped."

Actually, chick lit is "more about being fun and entertaining and uplifting... female characters and their everyday lives." As one Amazon.com review says, Mlynowski's writing "goes beyond your usual, 'I need a boyfriend to make me happy,' genre and into the unlikely friendships between women."

Although the dust jacket of her older books still refers to her as "an irrepressibly optimistic twenty-something," Mlynowski reached a milestone last year: her 30th birthday. She doubts it will affect her writing, though: "Angst is angst no matter what your age."

And if staying current means being where the teens are, Mlynowski has nothing to worry about. She's apparently both busy and popular on the MySpace social-networking website, sharing ideas and insights with 4,662 "friends" and over 12,000 fans and colleagues on the "Teen Lit" authors' and readers' group she started.

Mlynowski may not have a broomstick of her own, but online and in real life she's irrepressibly spreading her own special "Glinda" over the world of contemporary fiction, bewitching readers of all ages along the way.

An afternoon of music and culture

The Koffler Centre of the Arts presents An Afternoon of Music and Culture at Temple Emanu-El in Toronto on Sunday, March 2, 2008 at 2:00 p.m.

The event includes a performance by the Koffler Chamber Orchestra, directed by renowned violinist Jacques Israelievitch, concertmaster for the TSO. The program will open with a work by W. A. Mozart, followed by music by Canadian composers Srul Irving Glick, Marjan Mozetich, Walter Buczinsky, Gilles Leclerc, and Alexander Levkovich. Walter Buczinsky's Fantasy on Themes of the Past will feature Canadian soloist Joseph Macerollo on accordion.

The afternoon kicks off with a pre-concert talk by renowned American culture and literary historian Sander L. Gilman. A distinguished professor at Emory University, Gilman will delve into how and why Jews were believed to be unable to create or perform Western music and what this meant for Jewish composers, performers, and thinkers.

This question was a burning one a hundred years ago when Jews (and non-Jews) thought about what "Jewish music" really could be. This question shaped early Zionism and the very idea of the future State of Israel. An engaging, illustrated talk that answers the question: "Who were the three best violinists of the 20th century and why were they all Jews? And today?"

The Koffler Chamber Orchestra is comprised of some of Toronto's most well-regarded professional musicians performing with non-professionals pursuing music study and performance. The Koffler Chamber Orchestra performs publicly three times a year and attracts a vibrant audience and the praise of music critics.

The concert and talk are part of the Koffler Centre of the Arts' new initiative for programs at venues throughout the GTA, and are in celebration of Temple Emanu-El's 50th anniversary. (120 Old Colony Rd.)

Tickets are $20, $18 seniors/students (free parking). For information call 416-636-1880 ext. 222.

Jazzing It Up With 13 year-old Nikki Yanofsky

By RENA GODFREY
Special to The CJN

I couldn't wipe the smile off my face as I listened in awe to Nikki Yanofsky's powerful performance at the Isabel Bader in Toronto on February 5, and I was not alone. This 13-year-old jazz sensation brought the house down for two consecutive solo debut concerts, presented by Luminato and TD Canada Trust Toronto Jazz Festival.

With the maturity of a seasoned jazz vocalist, well beyond her years, Nikki belted out tunes sung by Ella Fitzgerald, such as I Ain't Got Nothing But The Blues, to an amazing rendition of Stevie Wonder's Love's In Need of Love Today and Seasons Of Love from the musical, Rent.

Dressed in a midnight blue sequin dress, and backed by a 12-piece band, Nikki grooved to the music, snapping her fingers and moving her hips to the beat. Even the band members were smiling throughout the performance. When Nikki sang, we were all mesmerized by her talent and stage presence, and when she kibitzed with the audience, Nikki was just herself, a witty and charming, adorable teenage girl.

Before the concert, I caught up with Nikki on the telephone, after she had just returned home from St. George's School of Montreal. By the time I had spoken with her, Nikki had already checked her homework, walked her standard poodle, watched some TV and played on the computer.

In addition to her daily routine, Nikki also sings for 1 1/2 hours a day, is trained by two vocal coaches, and studies theory. She even has a music studio in her home.

Despite all the attention that is given to this young lady, Nikki seems quite grounded. She was a delight to speak with, extremely mature, very polite, and most excited about her recent trip to Jamaica, where she performed at the Air Jamaica Jazz & Blues Festival.

"It was a taste of what my career will hopefully be like for me in the near future. It was pleasurable, even though I was working. I love the feel of all my hard work paying off."

Nikki has performed at many charity events and has helped raise $6 million for various charities over the past two years. In fact, Nikki got her first big break, at age 11, performing with her father's band at a fundraiser for the Maimonides Geriatric Centre in Montreal. Nikki was then invited to play with another band at the Club Soda, where coincidentally, Andre Menard, co-founder of the Montreal International Jazz Festival, was in the audience. Taken with Nikki, Menard invited her to sing at the Montreal International Jazz Festival.

Nikki claims that since she was 2 years old, her father Richard knew that something was unusual about his little girl. "I had a weird sense of timing and I was able to sing perfectly on tune".

Guided by her parents, and managed by her father's production company A440 Entertainment, Inc., Nikki's career has really taken off in the last year. She feels grateful for having such a supportive family. "This past year has been like a big burst. I'm so lucky that I don't have pushy parents because they didn't push me into this. I pulled them, they didn't push me."

Nikki Yanofsky

Nikki's voice can be heard on We all Love Ella, Celebrating the First Lady of Song alongside internationally acclaimed artists, Michael Buble, K.D. Lang, Diana Krall and Nathalie Cole. Nikki also sings Gotta Go My Way in English and French on Disney's High School Musical 2, CD.

Without a doubt, Nikki is a force to be reckoned with, loaded with confidence and clear in her personal vision.

"There was never ever a doubt in my mind that I wouldn't be a singer. I love to sing and I just want to focus on my art, and I don't want to be too commercial. I will do this for eternity, for my whole life."

Nikki's inner strength and incredible talent have undoubtedly propelled her into the spotlight within a very short time. Nikki will be performing at Carnegie Hall with the New York Pops on February 8, which coincidentally, also happens to be her 14th birthday, and one that she will never forget.

You can hear and see Nikki online at www.nikkionline.ca.

Former Iranian political prisoner shares her story

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For Marina Nemat, "life was good" as a young teenager growing up in Tehran.

But that was before the 1979 Iranian Revolution, after which she was thrown in jail and tortured for taking part in protests against the new Islamic regime.

Nemat, author of a memoir called Prisoner of Tehran, spoke to about 20 staff and volunteers earlier this month at the Toronto offices of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) about growing up in Iran before the revolution, and she shared painful memories of the torture she suffered as a political prisoner in the infamous Evin prison for two years starting when she was only 16.

She was attending a campaign committee meeting to promote the FSWC's Spirit of Hope Benefit in May.

"It may surprise you, but life in Tehran in 1965 was normal, and by normal, I mean, it was comparable to what you see here in Toronto today... People's religion was never an issue," Nemat began, adding that she was brought up in a Christian Russian Orthodox home in downtown Tehran.

"Life was good. My parents owned a cottage by the Caspian Sea. That was where I spent all my summers. I partied with boys and I listened to music and I was just having fun."

But all of that quickly changed in 1978, when people began to protest against Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi.

"Bearded men and women wearing the hijab were walking down the streets, yelling slogans against the United States, against Israel, against this person and that person and against the Shah. I remember looking out my bedroom window and looking out into this crowd... and thinking, 'What is going on?' I couldn't understand... Within three or four months, a very normal life turned into this nightmare of soldiers and tanks and shooting," she said.

When the Shah was sent into exile and the new government took over in 1979, there was anarchy, said Nemat, who was born in Tehran in 1965.

"There is always anarchy after a revolution. Anything goes. All these ideas were just floating around... I started to think, you know, maybe revolution wasn't such a bad idea. But then, things began to change. Being in school, the first thing I noticed was that one by one, very good teachers were being replaced by members of the revolutionary cause."

She said that rather than history, calculus and biology, high school students were being taught about Islam.

Nemat said she grew tired of the propaganda and challenged her teacher to teach calculus instead of preach about Islam.

"She said, 'If you don't like what I teach, leave.'"

Nemat did leave, but she had no idea that this act of defiance would lead her to the most excruciatingly painful and terrifying episode of her life.

When her classmates followed her out of the classroom, it was the beginning of a three-day strike. When the school principal approached Nemat, she told her that the students didn't want to hear any more propaganda.

After numerous discussions, the principal called Nemat's house and said, "You either go back to class, or I call the revolutionary guards and they're going to shoot you all." When she said the words, "shoot you all," it suddenly clicked. We realized that this woman was not kidding."

They went back to school, but nothing changed. Throughout the next year or two, she said, she took part in almost every rally she could against the Islamic regime.

"When you are 14 and 15, you think you are immune. You think you're invincible. You see people getting shot, but you get home and you think, 'I'm OK.' Every time you make it home you have a rush of adrenaline."

Then, in 1981, when Nemat was 16, the government began to arrest thousands of young people between the ages 15 and 20. Nemat said she wasn't the first person in her class to be arrested.

"But there was a sense of denial. Somehow, it just didn't click. We all thought, you know, it happened to her, it's not going to happen to us... I have talked to many Holocaust survivors and they all told me the same thing. When it starts happening, you don't get it until they come for you."

Two armed guards came for her in the middle of the night. She said she was blindfolded, taken to the prison, and dragged down hallway after hallway until she lost all concept of time and space.

Her interrogators wanted to know the whereabouts of a girl she had met once before. They tied her to a wooden bed, took off her blindfold and her interrogator showed her a thick black cable that he said he would beat her with if she didn't tell him what he wanted to know. But Nemat didn't have the information he wanted.

"He started lashing the soles of my feet... He was a grown man. He wasn't being kind. He put his full force into it. And he looked happy about it at the time. There was so much pain, I couldn't think."

She said she slept that night in a dirty, cold, smelly room and woke up the next day to someone kicking her. She was then blindfolded and she and four others were taken to "the middle of nowhere. They took off the blindfolds... They tied us to wooden poles and... then we saw the guard's gun," Nemat said.

"That's when it dawned on us, that they were going to shoot us. There was one girl who panicked and she ran and they shot her. All of this was happening, they were tying us up and none of us reacted."

Nemat said that soon after, a car pulled up with her interrogator inside. He untied her and told her to look away and then she heard gunfire. She had been spared by the man who tortured her.

"All of these years, I have refused to believe that the people who were with me that night are dead."

She was sent back to prison and didn't hear from her interrogators for five months. She was eventually called back to see her interrogator, who told her that if she didn't marry him, he would arrest her parents and her boyfriend.

"I entered this nightmare of being raped over and over under the title of marriage."

She said that after more than two years in prison, she was released after her torturer-husband was assassinated by a rival faction of the government.

Nemat later married her childhood sweetheart, and, after bribing officials to get a passport, she moved to Canada with him and a son in 1991. She said it took her 20 years to break the silence and face the reality of what she went through.

Nemat said that the situation in Iran today isn't much different than it was in 1979.

"Iran is a very well-educated country... But being educated has nothing to do with freedom or democracy, because the government of Iran is a terrible, horrible dictatorship and it has injected a population with sheer fear... When you know that if you speak up against the government, even in the mildest way, you're going to be arrested and tortured, you're not going to do it."

After Nemat's captivating address, Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the FSWC, announced the speakers for the organization's Spirit of Hope Benefit on May 29.

The annual event, which raises money to fund FSWC projects throughout the year, will be held at the Sony Centre and will feature Glenn Beck, a host on CNN's Headline News and author of An Inconvenient Book - Real Solutions to the World's Biggest Problems; Richard Gephardt, a former Democratic member of the U.S. Congress and an economic adviser and co-chair with Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign; and Newt Gingrich, the former speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Winning NFL coach Trestman takes helm of Alouettes

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Marc Trestman, the new head coach of the Montreal Alouettes, was an outstanding high school athlete and scholar growing up in a Minneapolis, Minn. suburb.

In his senior year he won the Mercury Award, presented to the area Jewish student who has excelled in both sports and academics.

He grew up in St. Louis Park, a suburb with a significant Jewish community, which has produced a number of famous sons, among them Trestman's near contemporaries New York Times writer Thomas Friedman and the movie-making brothers Joel and Ethan Coen.

Trestman, 52, who had an impressive career coaching in the National Football League for 17 years, shies away from making much of his being Jewish.

"In my 30 years around the game, or even in childhood, my religious background has never been broached by owners, coaches or other players," he said in a telephone interview from his home in Raleigh, N.C.

After high school, he was the quarterback of the University of Minnesota Golden Gophers football team for three seasons, while earning a degree in political science, and was good enough that he thought of playing professionally.

But when he failed to make the cut in two tryouts with the NFL Minnesota Vikings, he packed up his car and headed south to Florida to pursue a law degree at the University of Miami. After his NFL ambitions didn't pan out, he never thought of coaching, he said until he was asked to be a volunteer quarterbacks coach of the Hurricanes.

In 1983, Miami won the national college championship Orange Bowl.

Trestman passed the Florida bar that year and was clerking in Miami, but his success in college football caught the attention of the NFL, in particular Hall of Fame coach Bud Grant, who hired him.

Between 1985 and 2005, Trestman worked with eight different NFL teams mainly as quarterbacks coach or offensive co-ordinator. He was with the Cleveland Browns when they made it to the AFC championship game; the San Francisco 49ers when they led the league in points scored, pass attempts and passing yards; the Arizona Cardinals when they reached the playoffs for the first time in 16 years; and the Oakland Raiders when they were 2002 Super Bowl contenders. That year he was named NFL offensive co-ordinator of the year by American Football Monthly.

Overall in those 17 seasons, his teams made 15 playoff appearances. Among the outstanding quarterbacks he's coached are Heisman Trophy winner Vinny Testaverde and finalist Bernie Kosar, with whom he goes back to his University of Miami coaching days, as well as superstar wide receivers like Jerry Rice and Terrell Owens.

Trestman, who has a low-key personality, was regarded as one of the most intelligent coaches in the NFL, with an in-depth knowledge of the game.

To those who are not football fans and see the game as a bunch of brutes piling into one another, Trestman says they are missing a lot. "Football is a very cerebral game. That goes for playing and coaching. Physical skills are not enough without character and intelligence. I've seen many with abilities but were just not smart enough to play well," he said.

"Millions of variables come into play in each game," not the least of which is the weather, which will be more of a factor in Canada's colder climate.

Trestman finds tremendous satisfaction in melding men from diverse economic, cultural and religious backgrounds into a team. "The beauty of the game is seeing people from all walks of life come together as one. If the team does not come before the individual, you will not succeed," he said.

Trestman spent his last season in the NFL with the Miami Dolphins before returning to college football as the North Carolina State Wolfpack's offensive coordinator in 2005.

He never thought he would work in the Canadian Football League, he said, and, in fact, had never been to Montreal until he came up to guest coach for at the Als' summer camp. He replaces Jim Popp, who remains as the team's general manager and vice-president.

Trestman is remaining in North Carolina until the start of the season, with periodic trips to Montreal. His two daughters are in high school, and he and his wife felt it best that the family stay in Raleigh until they graduate. The girls, he feels, need a little stability at this age, after growing up all over the United States.

Trestman is now getting up to speed on the Canadian game, with its 12 rather than 11 players, larger field, and different rules. "I'm learning from scratch," he admits.

The pressure's on to see the Alouettes, who made it to the semi-finals last season, through to the Grey Cup. The Grey Cup game is hosted by Montreal this year.

Among those he's consulted is the legendary Marv Levy, who was head coach of the Als in the 1970s when the team won two Grey Cups. At 82, Levy just retired as GM of the NFL Buffalo Bills.

Trestman's philosophy for success is to be "hardworking, humble and disciplined on and off the field, with a common respect for everyone in the program, our opponents, and the game of football."

He is also trying to learn some French, and wants to speak the language as Quebecers do, rather than like a Parisian. During the interview, he tried out his new phrases: "Comment allez-vous?" And its response: "Très bien."

He is taking that initiative with little knowledge that language is a touchy issue in Quebec, and that professional sports is by no means free of the controversy. He appreciated learning that Finnish-born captain Saku Koivu has been taken over the coals by the French media for not speaking French in public.

Trestman is eager to be respectful of francophones, and its cultural diversity is one of the things he likes about Montreal so far.

Last season, the only Jewish player in the CFL was an Alouette. Laval native Shaun Diner, a special-teams member and backup receiver, however, saw little playing time last year.

Trestman was chosen by the Als from about 10 potential candidates. "We believe he will be able to bring great leadership skills and knowledge to our league and take the Alouettes back to the standard to which our fans are accustomed, and to our ultimate objective, which is the Grey Cup," said team chief executive officer Larry Smith.

Don't forget: WOLFPACK

Red carpet, red sea

It's 1:15 pm on Tuesday. Our world premiere is in hours. The theatre is selling out. The buzz is growing. The posters are glossy.

And we have no film to show.

Technicolor says it's been shipped. FedEx says it's cleared customs. The filling theatre is without a print, but somehow I'm still not worried.

In my mind, I begin to feel like my father has flown 10 hours to scrutinize the performance, in his pocket a list of mistakes that I repeatedly make. I see my mother there, to pick up the pieces and arrange nourishment for the after-party. A dozen childhood friends arrive, treating the event like a bachelor party. And the press community is shaving their pencils to stab at us with review arrows.

And that's when I realize: this is my bar mitzvah all over again, my professional coming of age.

An odd familiarity comes over me. Without a print to show, I'm still calm. I've been here before. I visualize my parents sitting up front, lip-synching the dialogue they've seen in editing. I imagine people throwing candy at the screen when it's done, or simply dumping popcorn onto the floor. Today I will become a man. (I hope our Dolby 5.1 sound mix is loud enough for the elderly people sitting in the back.)

Of course, I'm still hoping our print shows up. Where is it already?

I'm dressed in a suit. There's a community to impress, and a threshold to cross. This is Minchah-Ma'ariv in glorious Technicolor. (Thank God it's not another bris – but we'll see.)

I think about what's happening, about how lucky I am to be here and the liberties we're afforded. I remember when dad and the rabbi were arrested for sneaking Torah scrolls into Russia. I think about the Dubai film festival and wonder how can they have a film festival in Dubai when they can't invite the Jews who made the films?

By stroke of destiny, the print arrives. The screening is a huge success. I feel like Judah the Maccabee. We scoured the postal routes for the film, to light up the coliseum theatre, and when it finally arrived, the programmers would only schedule us for two showings. Our entertainment was not expected to last. But then a miracle occurred. After three years of creative battles, financial depletion, and angry criticism, the large crowd was engaged. Entertainment filled their hearts. Additional screenings were quickly added, until six nights of celebration were shared.

It's our festival of projected light.

My reward for this exhilarating endeavor has been a tremendous sinus cold – and I navigate my way across laptop keys, blind, to type this account of the miracle.

Six Canadians over eight nights.

There's more to be proud of here than just our ability to entertain. My Big Fat Greek Wedding was written by, starred in, and assembled by Canadians for $5 million, but because Canadians couldn't pay for it, the $365 million in profits the film generated went to Americans.

It's my ambition that we fortify our domestic temple. We're a lauded nation of artists and entrepreneurs. Borrowing from Jewish historical experience, I don't believe that fleeing the land or scrounging for oil to light our hearts will sustain us in the future. We should establish a holy city around our national entertainment gems and invest in the rewards that we too easily give away, robbing ourselves.

You'll have to Google Summerhood to read our reviews and decide if you want to eat the fruit of this particular entertainment kibbutz – and with some luck, help to establish a snowy land of Milk Duds and honey for your artistic children to succeed in, and still live nearby.

Key advice for designing a workout room

You want to work out at home, and you have to space and the desire to do it. What do you need? Great question.

I always tell my clients that they should keep two things in mind when designing a workout room.

First, decide on a piece of cardio equipment, and make sure it's safe and sturdy. Pick something you are going to enjoy using and, most importantly, is appropriate to your ability. Make sure you check with your doctor as to what type of cardio is best for you.

If you like walking outside and you have no joint issues, a treadmill will keep you walking all year round, no matter what the weather. If you have multiple joint issues or lower back issues, an elliptical or stationary bike maybe a better choice.

If your knees are the main problem, then a recumbent bike (one with a chair-like seat) is your only option.

Indoor or stationary bikes are great and can give an amazing cardio workout, strengthening not only the heart but the legs, butt and the lower stomach. You have two choices in indoor bikes: an upright, which looks a lot like an outdoor bike, or a recumbent bike, which you sit back in. Both can give you the same workout, but if you have lower back issues, you may want a recumbent because of the back support.

A great option for a low-impact, high-intensity cardio workout is an elliptical trainer. They, too, come in all sorts of shapes and sizes. I strongly suggest that you try different kinds of cardio equipment and decide which one is best for you based on ability, use and size.

The second thing to remember is that weight training is very important, not only for fitness but for weight loss as well. This part is a lot easier: all you need are three-to-five-pound weights and an exercise ball. I strongly suggest at any fitness level that you hire a personal trainer to teach you and guide you in how to get fit safely.

FITNESS CORNER

By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Few of us will ever run a full or half marathon. Not because we are unable to do so with enough training but more so because the idea of putting one foot in front of another for miles seems extraordinary, and appears to be undoable. It is a full-size venture.

My nephew Yechiel Rosenszweig, however, saw past the bigness of a marathon, and on Jan. 27 ran the Miami half marathon (13.1 miles).

It all started a few years ago, when Yechiel would join his eldest brother, Mayer, who jogged in the mornings. But he could only keep up with Mayer on his bike.

Soon enough, the running bug hit Yechiel (otherwise known as "Bud"), and he began training on an elliptical machine. Then he started running through the streets in the Clanton Park area of Toronto. Two miles led to three, and then to four and eventually to 10.

As time passed, Bud's mentor and chavrutta (Torah learning partner), Udi, "a friend who is like family," and a runner, told him about the Miami marathon and challenged him to run it with him. Yechiel accepted. "If not for Udi, I would never have done this," he said.

So on the morning of Jan. 27, Yechiel joined 10,000 other runners at the starting line – the American Airlines Arena, home of the Miami Heat basketball team.

For those few ever-so-long seconds before the gun went off, Yechiel took in the excitement. He was nervous but pumped. "I love it all. The streets were blocked. So many people were cheering me on – I just wanted to run. I had lots of energy," he said.

Bang! The gun went off. Yechiel and Udi took off. They ran through Biscayne Bay, returning to Venetian Causeway, across a series of artificially made islands and then back on the Miami side of the bay. I saw the pictures of Yechiel running. He was smiling. I know him. I bet you he smiled the whole time.

"I loved it," he said. "The whole thing was amazing."

Yechiel ran to raise money for a non-profit organization called Chai Lifeline (chailife line.org), an organization that helps children suffering from cancer and other illnesses, as well as offering support to the children's families. He raised the $3,600 required, and more, and was one of the youngest runners in this group.

Yechiel's family is tight. Encouraging and loving. Both bubblies supported him throughout his training and the run. Yechiel told me one of the greatest things about the marathon was working with his brother, Mayer, to get ready for the run and then seeing him and his fiancée, Sarah, on the sidelines.

"Mayer came down on the Thursday night. It was unbelievable. Without him, it wouldn't have been nearly as good. Mayer told me what to eat and to drink a lot. He said not to worry, that everything would be great."

Throughout the 13.1 miles, Yechiel felt strong. Like a young warrior with one singular thought in mind – he knew he would finish the race. After two hours, 14 minutes and 39 seconds, Yechiel and Udi did. Pretty good, eh? A 10-minute mile! The young runner, together with his Torah learning partner, did it!

Mayer and Sarah were at the line to congratulate Bud. Soon enough Chavie, his mom, called and said, "Are you okay?" She was in tears when she told me, "I was just so proud of Yechiel, his determination, commitment and ambition."

"Yechiel is the youngest in the family, and we learn so much from him. I have a lot of admiration for my son," she said.

"I felt accomplished," Yechiel said. My next goal is to run the same marathon but in a better time."

Yechiel Rosenszweig, 14 years old, a successful half marathon runner, and my nephew. What a nachas, eh!

The News in Brief

CANADA

Museum Bill Tabled

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress last week praised Ottawa for tabling a bill to establish the Canadian Museum for Human Rights (CMHR) in Winnipeg. The $126-million museum will "enhance the public's understanding of human rights... promote respect for others and... encourage reflection and dialogue," the bill says.

The museum, which is being funded by three levels of government and donations, was the brainchild of the late media mogul Izzy Asper and is being spearheaded by the Asper Foundation.

Tom Lantos Dies

WASHINGTON — Tom Lantos, the only Holocaust survivor ever elected to the U.S. Congress, died Feb. 11 at age 80. Lantos, a California Democrat known as a strident defender of human rights, died at Bethesda Naval Hospital in suburban Washington, D.C. He had been diagnosed with cancer of the esophagus.

Le Pen Sentenced

PARIS — A French court gave Jean-Marie Le Pen a three-month suspended sentence for saying the Nazi occupation of France was not inhumane. The Feb. 8 sentence was the latest given to the far-right leader of the National Front for diminishing the significance of the Shoah. He also was fined $14,500 (US). Le Pen told a far-right magazine in 2005 that "in France, at least, the German occupation was not especially inhumane, even if there were a number of excesses." At least 70,000 Jews were deported to death camps during the war.

Man Assaulted

MELBOURNE — An Orthodox Jewish man was attacked in an apparent anti-Semitic incident in Melbourne, Australia. The B'nai Brith Anti-Defamation Commission said the man was verbally assaulted Feb. 11 by three people who called him a "f---ing Jew" before physically attacking him in East St. Kilda, a popular Jewish area. The man was,

High Court Won't Hear Passport Appeal

OTTAWA — The Supreme Court said last week it won't hear an appeal by a Toronto man who wants Jerusalem, Israel, to be listed as his birthplace on his passport.

Eliyahu Joshua Veffler, who was born in Jerusalem but moved to Canada with his family in 1998, has fought the federal government since 2004 to have his passport reflect his belief that the city belongs to Israel. He has argued that the government's policy that Jerusalem's final status will be determined in peace talks violates his Charter rights, since seeing Jerusalem as the capital of Israel is "an integral part of my religious belief and my personal identity."

Last year, the Federal Court of Appeal upheld an earlier ruling affirming the policy.

Veffler's Winnipeg lawyer, David Matas, said the decision — for which, as per custom, it gave no reason — means Veffler is out of legal options.

In a statement, B'nai Brith Canada said it will "ask for the [passport] policy to be changed by elected officials."

lightly injured. Between 2006 and 2007, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry logged 638 anti-Semitic incidents. That was twice the previous annual average and eight per cent higher than the old record, set five years ago.

Violence Up In U.K.

LONDON — Violent attacks on Jews in Britain have risen to new heights, a new report says. Attacks on individual Jews in 2007 reached the highest level ever in the 23 years records have been kept, the Community Security Trust, a Jewish defence organization, said. But "anti-Semitic race-hate incidents" against the community as a whole fell eight per cent from 2006, when

Knife Used In Attack

ZURICH — A Jewish man was attacked Feb. 12 in Zurich for what seemed to be anti-Semitic motives. The victim, 60, was lightly wounded in the neck in the daytime attack. The knife-wielding attacker, described as a young man with a foreign accent, fled when the victim fought back. Police say anti-Semitism may be involved, since the man addressed the victim as a Jew.

Rabbis lobby Ottawa on Israel issues

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A group of 13 rabbis from across Canada were on Parliament Hill last week to urge the Conservative government and the opposition parties not to forsake the Holy Land.

The Canadian Rabbinic Caucus – a coalition of rabbis representing the interests of the main Jewish religious streams, from Orthodox to Reconstructionist – met with officials and parliamentarians to convey three messages from their communities and congregations.

The first was a proclamation of support for Canada's withdrawal from "Durban II," the 2009 followup to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, which was widely criticized as a forum for anti-Semitism and Israel-bashing.

The second message was to reassert the Jewish community's firm position that Arab nations must formally recognize Israel as a Jewish state as a precondition to any Mideast peace talks.

Lastly, the caucus raised the issue of the threat that Iran poses to Israel, as well as to the world at large.

The day-long visit, brokered by the Canada-Israel Committee – which also shepherded the rabbis to their meetings around town – saw the rabbis meet with multiple senators, MPs and with Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker, among others.

Caucus co-chair Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz told The CJN he considered this year's visit a success.

"One of our most important achievements is having expressed our gratitude on [Canada's] withdrawal from the Durban II conference," he said. "We told [Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and Canadian Identity Jason] Kenney that it was a principled and courageous stand... and I think that was something appreciated by the government."

Rabbi Steinmetz added that it was "critical" for his caucus to reiterate to federal politicians that despite the recent National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) report in the United States – which said Iran had stopped its drive to develop nuclear weapons in 2003 – the Islamic Republic "is an ongoing threat. It is still an exceptionally troublesome nation... and one of the greatest threats to security in the entire region."

Of particular import to the caucus was a meeting with the Palestinian Authority's official representative to Ottawa, Amin Abou Hassira.

Rabbi Steinmetz called the meeting with Abou Hassira "historic."

"I don't think the chief authority of the Palestinian government [in Canada] has done this before," he said, adding that the rabbis wanted to make it clear that a "fundamental departure point for peace" with the Palestinians is the recognition of Israel as a Jewish state.

"[Abou Hassira] heard us, but felt it was not his place to address that issue," Rabbi Steinmetz said. "Our conversation was polite. But we did agree to the possibility for future meetings and on the importance of ongoing dialogue."

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, the caucus' other co-chair, was less conciliatory about the meeting.

"It was a painful encounter in many ways," he said. "It's as if there was no recognition of the past, lessons learned or prior peace agreements. [Abou Hassira] dismissed out of hand the idea of recognizing Israel as a Jewish state."

Time running out for two-state solution, Peace Now head says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

If there is ever going to be peace in Israel, and if Israel is going to remain a Jewish democratic state, it must be willing to share Jerusalem with the Palestinians, says Yairiv Oppenheimer, director general of Peace Now.

He believes a peace treaty that's acceptable to both sides will have to compromise on the issue of Jerusalem.

"It is not a zero-sum game... It's not simple, it's compromising. We are going to pay a huge price for it, and the Palestinians as well, but in order to survive as a Jewish democratic state... it's going to be a struggle," Oppenheimer told more than 100 people last week at Temple Sinai.

He was speaking at a panel discussion on the Middle East with Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto.

The program was organized by Canadian Friends of Peace Now, a left-wing NGO that calls for the establishment of a Palestinian state on land occupied by Israel in 1967, and National Jewish Campus Life. It was moderated by Myer Siemiatycki, a professor in the politics and public administration department at Ryerson University.

Oppenheimer said the Israeli government must try to reach a two-state solution.

"It's not only the Palestinians who will gain. It is in the Israeli and Zionist interest... Without it, either we are not going to be a democratic state, or we're not going to be Israel."

While much of the discussion focused on the challenges of achieving peace in the Middle East, Gissin said it frustrates him that Israel doesn't speak to the rest of the world in a unified voice.

"There isn't any one major effort... to present Israel to the world, and we pay the price for it every day," he said.

Speaking from his experience as the former head of the Israeli government's hasbarah department, Gissin added that Israel doesn't make its image a priority, as evidenced by its communications budget, which is smaller than those of some major corporations.

He said the challenges Israel must deal with today are new, such as the Iranian nuclear threat and the international community's inability to put effective pressure on Iran, as well as ongoing rocket attacks from Gaza.

"But what is becoming more and more critical is the effort by our opposers and adversaries... to present Israel or brand Israel as the new South Africa... to brand Israel as an apartheid state."

He said that anti-Israel groups have shifted the focus from depicting Israel as occupiers of the territories to "an entity called 'Palestine,'" and they call for a one-state solution rather than a two-state solution.

"This is a new phenomenon," he said. Gissin stressed the importance of changing Israel's image on the world stage.

"You all know the visual of the Israeli tanks and the Palestinian boy who is throwing stones at the tank. It is a very frustrating visual. It is very difficult for us to cope with as Israelis. But this visual is very unique, because it encapsulates the conflict and it encapsulates our mistake," he said.

"Our mistake is that for the last 30 years, we were trying to convince the world that the tank is the victim. Don't get me wrong, the tank is the victim — historically, politically, in almost every aspect, the Jews are the victims... [but] what we have to do... is try to develop other ways for people to look at the conflict."

But Oppenheimer said he doesn't think Israel's problems have anything to do with hasbarah. He said that if the conditions on the ground don't change, the world will continue to see the Palestinians as the underdog.

When Israel shut the electricity in Gaza in response to Hamas' rocket attacks, "in one hour, the whole world was against Israel, and no one remembered the Qassam missiles that were coming into Israel," he said.

"The thinking of the Israeli government is that in order to take down the government of Hamas, we need to make life in Gaza so miserable that they will not be in favour of Hamas and say that we cannot handle it. But the exact opposite happened."

He said this tactic only creates a breeding ground for more radical voices, more anger toward Israel, and more empathy for the extremists.

"Israel's image will get worse, people in Israel will become more extreme — either more right wing or left wing — and the Palestinians will also become more extreme."

He said that Hamas is taking over the agenda in the Middle East by creating a violent and miserable existence for both sides, which takes the focus away from a peace treaty.

"Who cares about a peace treaty — about splitting Jerusalem, about helping to solve other problems concerning settlements — who wants to talk about it when you have Qassams flying from Gaza into Israel?" Oppenheimer asked. "This is what Hamas wants to achieve... They want to make it impossible to reach an agreement."

He said the fact that Hamas is a religious group rather than a political one makes the situation much more complicated.

"It is easy to say, 'Let's talk to Hamas. Let's try to make peace with them.' I don't know if there is a part of Hamas that is ready to talk to Israelis. I doubt it... But I do know that next to Hamas, there is Fatah. They are not part of the Jewish Zionist movement, but they are ready to talk to Israelis."

But Oppenheimer warned that time is not working in favour of those who support a two-state solution.

"It is becoming more of a religious conflict than a political conflict, and I am afraid of the day when in Israeli society, it will be religious conflict, and in the Palestinian society it will be a religious conflict, and then it will be very hard to solve... I do believe that this is the time to do it."

Religious pluralism key issue for all Israelis: prof

By FRANCES KRAFT

Staff Reporter

Religious pluralism in Israel is an issue that is important not only for Conservative, Reform and secular Jewish Israelis, but also for their Orthodox counterparts, according to a Bar-Ilan University professor who was in Toronto recently.

Gerald Cromer, who teaches criminology, said in a Feb. 4 lecture at Beth Torah Congregation that all four groups are suffering for its lack.

His presentation was co-sponsored by Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and the New Israel Fund of Canada. Cromer is a member of board of directors of the NIF (a social justice organization in Israel), and a founder of a modern Orthodox congregation in Israel. He is also involved in a number of liberal Orthodox groups.

Drawing on his lay experience rather than his academic expertise, Cromer – a 63-year-old native of London, England who has been teaching at Bar-Ilan since 1972 – said that Orthodox Jews should be against “the doctrine of [religious] coercion,” under which the Orthodox rabbinate in Israel has sole authority over key Jewish religious rites including birth, marriage, divorce and burial.

Such coercion is “more and more moving into the hands of the ultra-Orthodox,” and modern Orthodox Jews are suffering from it in many ways, he said.

As evidence, Cromer cited nascent talks about the need to set up alternative Orthodox rabbinical courts to deal with the issue of Jewish divorce, because of “tremendous difficulties that ultra-Orthodox rabbis are putting in front of people.”

Gerald Cromer

As well, he said, this year for the first time the haredim have spoken out against a ruling of Israel's first chief rabbi, Rabbi Abraham Isaac HaCohen Kook, regarding the shmittah year (every seventh year, including the current one, during which observant Jews let their land lie fallow). This has resulted in conflict between haredim and modern Orthodox Jews, Cromer said.

Rabbi Kook's ruling, known as cheter mechirah, allows Jews to sell their land to non-Jews during the shmittah year so that they can still cultivate it.

The second reason for Orthodox Jews to be against religious coercion, Cromer said, is that it “gives Orthodoxy a very bad name.” It leads to animosity and a feeling of not wanting “anything to do with any of it” among non-Orthodox Jews who find it hard to distinguish between religion and religious coercion, he added.

Pluralism is not the same thing as tolerance, Cromer stressed. Tolerance implies a willingness to put up with the other side, but pluralism suggests that everyone has something to offer, he explained.

The good news, he said, is that “after a long period of time when things Jewish were not attractive to people, there is in Israel in many ways an important, interesting, spiritual search going on.”

In Israel today, there are many organizations and movements trying to create non-Orthodox options for being Jewish, Cromer said. People are searching for meaning, and in many cases are looking for it “in a Jewish spiritual direction,” he added.

In addition to Jewish themes that are beginning to emerge in film, art and pop music, secular Jewish activity – including study of Jewish texts, secular prayer meetings and a secular yeshiva – is growing, he noted.

Also, the Reform and Conservative movements, which used to be regarded as being from outside of Israel, are becoming “more Israeli” in their membership and their leadership. “As they do so, the likelihood of their success and the likelihood of them having an influence on society will grow.”

Although some of his fellow Orthodox Jews may not welcome the trends, Cromer said they have to see them as an opportunity instead of a threat. “What I'm talking about is a basic change in mindset.”

The worst thing that can happen to Judaism in Israel “is not that people are against it, but that people are indifferent to it,” he said.

A spiritual search among non-Orthodox Israelis can help Orthodoxy in two ways, he said.

“Certain people will search and find that Orthodoxy is the right way for them.” Also, he added, other alternatives, aside from having value in their own right, will “give Orthodox Jews the kind of learning from the other that American Jews so excel at.”

'In finding Israel, we find ourselves'

David Bercuson tells the stirring story of how a handful of volunteers from overseas – Jews and non-Jews – helped establish the State of Israel, many, alas, at the cost of their own lives.

And there is much more in the supplement to help us take up the chief rabbi's call to challenge the blatant falsehoods about the Jewish state.

Forty years ago, from the bimah of Holy Blossom Temple during the High Holy Days, Rabbi Gunther Plaut, our former columnist and the venerated sage of the Jews of Canada, uttered a different, but related, challenge to Canadian Jewry: "If you want to be a Jew," he exhorted, "then you must do something about it. Somewhere in your existence, you must become a partner in the enterprise of Jewish history."

For every Jew who witnessed the founding of the State of Israel or who was born in the past 60 years, the "enterprise of Jewish history" must, perforce, include, in some significant way, the only Jewish state on earth.

One need only read or hear the news of this day to know that there are many people and some states committed to harming Israel, and indeed, Jews around the world.

Our contrary commitment – to the permanence and well-being of the Jewish state – must always be stronger than theirs.

"It is time to say clearly to ourselves and to the world," as Rabbi Plaut did, "we want to protect Israel not only because she is attacked and surrounded and isolated. Yes, that, too, of course. We want it above all, as a force for compassion and humanity, as a future seedbed of culture, religion, the arts and music... For the sake of man as well as for the sake of the Jews, Israel is necessary."

In his typically insightful and incisive manner, Rabbi Plaut added: "In finding Israel, we find ourselves and, finding ourselves, we are also serving mankind."

Rabbi Plaut's voice is quiet now, alas. But his words ring as true to us as they did to our parents.

Israel is very young. Its institutions are still evolving. Indeed, it is still only at the early beginnings of its possibilities. Yet, its achievements soar in every sphere of human endeavour with magisterial innovation and excellence. The achievements are ever more marvellous considering the fact that the Jewish state is not known a single day of peace since it was born. It remains the only country at the United Nations that must still defend its very existence.

That is why we must teach Rabbi Plaut's words to our young. Israel is necessary. For our sake and for the sake of the world.

Knowing this, they will also know, as Wiesel has so elegantly noted for us, that Israel is an ever-renewing miracle.

It is not too early to begin the celebration of the 60th anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel.

25 years ago in The CJN

Noted Israeli Canadian architect Moshe Safdie was chosen to design the new National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa. Among his previous projects were the Habitat apartment complex in Montreal that was built for Expo 67 and the revitalization of the Western Wall precinct after the Six Day War.

Israel performed well in Lebanon war

I don't understand all the talk about how Israel performed badly in the war in Lebanon ("The Second Lebanon War: 'A serious missed opportunity,'" CJN, Feb. 7). That is not the case at all. The speed with which the Israeli forces mobilized totally surprised the enemy. The ferocity of Israel's attack stunned the world. With pinpoint artillery, air and naval barrages, they were able to systematically wipe out targets in the middle of Beirut. Ground troops braved uncharted hostile enemy territory and cleared out all of southern Lebanon. Israel took the fight to Hezbollah and had them on the run.

The Israelis may have encountered some surprises that weren't accounted for, but what do you expect? It was a fight. The only reason the job didn't get finished was the international community made the Israelis back off because they were hitting too hard. Things were going Israel's way until then. There is too much Jewish guilt and not enough credit where credit is due. I don't imagine the neighbouring Arab leaders who saw what happened to Lebanon are nearly as dismissive of what Israel is capable of.

Response to Held

I agree with Daniel Held's sentiment that all Jews should find a shul where we feel comfortable ("We need to create our own shuls," CJN, Feb. 7). In Toronto, we are fortunate that there are shuls for everyone. These shuls offer early-morning simple services, services for youth and services for women. There are also many branches of Judaism in our Toronto shuls, including humanistic shuls and Orthodox, Conservative and Reform shuls.

However, I object to Held's suggestion that building stronger congregations entails segregation. Held's vision of services held without old people is lacking in humanity. We need everyone who is committed to shul involvement. There are valuable lessons that seniors can impart to youth, so why shun this segment of our population?

Response to Mintz

Regarding Jesse Mintz's column "Israel should re-think policy in Gaza" (CJN, Feb. 7), Israel fulfilled all its obligations in regards to its disengagement from Gaza. What has it received in return? In the past two years, more than 2,500 Qassam rockets have landed in Sderot.

An election brought Hamas, an Iranian-backed terror organization, to power in the Gaza Strip. Hamas' charter calls for the destruction of Israel. If the Hamas-backed population put down its weapons today for true peace, there would be peace tomorrow. If Israel put down its weapons today, in the current situation, there would be no Israel tomorrow.

Short-term Israel Bonds

While it may make good economic sense for Israel Bonds to no longer offer bonds with a maturity exceeding five years, there is one sense in which it doesn't ("Israel seeks early bonds redemption," CJN, Jan. 31).

When my children were young, my parents bought long-term Israel Bonds in their names. Their intention was to provide funds for a future time when the children were older. It was also a way to help Israel, help their grandchildren and connect their grandchildren to Israel. Physically, the bonds consisted of handsome documentation that could be stored away in a safety deposit box.

Now that we have grandchildren of our own, my wife and I have started to buy them Israel Bonds. In the recent past, we purchased 10-year bonds, the longest maturity period possible. Now, the documentation provided is a simple letter. And now the longest maturity date is being reduced to five years? Too bad.

Irving Donsky memorial book

Plans are underway to publish a memorial book in the name of Yitzchak HaCohen (Irving) Donsky, who passed away recently in Toronto. Yitzchak was a brilliant scholar who delighted everyone with his beautiful and unique divrei Torah at Ner Israel Yeshiva College in Toronto in the 1960s and '70s. We would be interested in hearing from those with any material to contribute. This includes Yitzchak's original Torah ideas or anecdotes and reflections on his life.

Imad Mughniyah:

a symbol of the 'axis of evil'

By AMIR OREN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The killing of a Hezbollah top-operative, Imad Fayeze Mughniyah, last Tuesday night was a source of concern in several corners of the Middle East, but Damascus, Beirut, Gaza, Tehran and Jerusalem all have different reasons to be alarmed about it.

Syria's president, Bashar Assad, must be wondering what's going on inside his security apparatus, which is headed by his brother-in-law, Assef Shawkat. If they had no knowledge that Mughniyah was under surveillance by foreign elements who had outwitted the Syrian systems of compartmentalization and security and were able to blow him up in the middle of Damascus, then maybe Assad's enemies in Syria might successfully plot against him as well.

As for Israel, its people and officials know that revenge could be taken at any place and at any time, especially after the 40 days of mourning, which will end on

However, this scheme of action and reaction would be too simplistic when applied to the man who symbolized the "axis of evil" in its most basic sense. Mughniyah was the embodiment of the link between Iran and Hezbollah, between the fundamentalist ideology of the ayatollah regime and the Shiite terrorist group in Lebanon.

The titles of "head of the security organization" or "operations officer," which have been applied to Mughniyah, pertained to only a small portion of the roles he played. In the cat-and-mouse game of intelligence and terrorism, Mughniyah played the cat—that is, until he became a kill.

Mughniyah was at the very top of the FBI's Most Wanted list, almost as high up as Al Qaeda's founding father, Osama bin Laden. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, by contrast, is not on the list. Without explicitly saying so, the Americans view Nas-rallah as the semi-political leader of a terrorist organization. Their attitude toward Mughniyah was less ambivalent: they had put a $5-million prize on his head.

If the suspicions that the Arab media has tended to spread turn out to be true, that prize should go to Mossad head Meir Dagan and the men and women of his organization.

Of course, they have no intention of collecting. Israel had enough reasons of its own to wish for Mughniyah's death, even without the added American incentive.

Imad Mughniyah

Whoever tracked down Mughniyah in Damascus demonstrated the sort of intelligence capabilities and excellent operational skills that Israel lacked in Lebanon in the summer of 2006.

In its brief chapter on special operations during the Second Lebanon War, the Winograd Committee said that the expectation for such a successful operation affected Israel's hesitant performance along the front.

If Israel's "long arm" is involved, then it can be seen as a warning aimed at Nasrallah and Hamas leaders in Gaza and Damascus of what will happen if they open a second front against Israel while it tends to Gaza.

Killed under the noses of Iran and Syria

By ZVI BAR'EL

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A nasty surprise awaited Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, who was scheduled to arrive in Damascus last Wednesday to discuss the Lebanese crisis with Syrian President Bashar Assad.

Syria, the Iranian minister found out, is no longer a secure state, its intelligence is penetrable, and Iran's emissaries and friends – whether the leaders of Islamic Jihad or Hamas – are now, with the assassination of Hezbollah's deputy secretary general Imad Mughniyah, in the front line of fire. Mottaki could have surmised that in Damascus, he too could be an easy target.

If Mottaki got a surprise, Assad was hit with the full blow, learning that such a complex operation could have been planned and carried out under his own nose, not in a fragmented Lebanon "full of traitors," as Hezbollah describes it.

But the greatest shake-up will certainly be felt by Hezbollah, whose intelligence structure, security capabilities and assault architecture were built by Mughniyah himself.

This is, therefore, a strategic assassination because of its potential repercussions beyond the removal of Hezbollah's supreme planner and operative.

The important question now is how the Tehran-Damascus-Hezbollah axis will respond in unison, and how each component will respond individually.

The prime target from now on will be Israel itself, Israeli and Jewish institutions around the world, and even Israeli airliners and airports frequented by many Israelis. These are considered security weak points, because Hezbollah has undercover cells worldwide, which Mughniyah himself set up and activated on several occasions.

American targets might also be deemed "suitable" objects for vengeance in an attempt to parlay Mughniyah's slaying into political leverage. If American targets or civilians in the Middle East or middle America are harmed as a result of an Israeli assassination, Nasrallah can hope for answering pressure from the American public against Israel, which has officially denied involvement in the killing.

The question is what Israeli target would count as sufficient to meet Hezbollah's need for vengeance and prestige.

The other roiling front was Lebanon itself, where a mass rally was held Feb. 14 to mark the third anniversary of the late prime minister Rafiq Hariri's murder.

Thousands filled Beirut's plazas, and in view of the violent rhetoric heard in Lebanon last week, and Mughniyah's assassination and his burial the same day as the rally, it was feared that the public display could spill over into mass clashes that the Lebanese army would be unable to stop.

Fears of a violent, even armed, outbreak were fed by accusations from Hezbollah Secretary General Hassan Nasrallah that the Lebanese government collaborated with Israel during the Second Lebanon War.

Anger at the Lebanese government had grown last Wednesday when it failed to react by the evening to Mughniyah's assassination, and did not join those condemning the killing or express sorrow over it.

If the Mughniyah assassination generates a mass outbreak in Lebanon, it might develop into a new civil war and create a tough front for Israel, since Lebanese chaos would likely spell the end of agreements reached following the Second Lebanon War.

In the most dangerous scenario, Hezbollah will respond to the assassination by deciding to go to war with Israel, and thus place the Lebanese government in an impossible situation.

The hit – not merely revenge

By AMOS HAREL and
AVI ISSACHAROFF

The Israeli establishment had discussed the possibility of killing Hamas leaders in the Gaza Strip, but when the first lethal blow fell, it was in Damascus. The victim of last Tuesday night's assassination was Hezbollah's deputy secretary general, Imad Mughniyah. Despite Hamas' recent successes, Mughniyah is a considerably more deadly and sophisticated terrorist than anyone Hezbollah's Palestinian sister movement has ever produced.

Like numerous assassinations of Lebanon- and Syria-based terrorists, from Islamic Jihad leader Fathi Shikaki (who was killed in Malta) to Hamas and Hezbollah members, Mughniyah's killing will remain, officially at least, a mystery.

This is not the kind of operation for which states tend to take public credit.

What matters more is what Hezbollah believes. The organization accused Israel of being responsible for the assassination, and threatened immediate revenge. The Israeli leadership – prime minister, defence minister and chief of staff – kept mum in front of the cameras.

The foreign reports also gave credit to the Mossad. If that is true, it further corroborates the high regard Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has for Mossad chief Meir Dagan.

In his life, Mughniyah spilled no less American blood than Israeli and Jewish blood. The George W. Bush administration commended the assassination, but as far as the United States was concerned, Mughniyah was more a terror celebrity than a real threat.

For Israel, he was a different story. Such an assassination, it may be assumed, is not merely a matter of revenge but also an attempt to foil future attacks.

Mughniyah, who was involved in a long list of terror attacks, has most certainly been working on other plans. He died on Syrian land, contradicting Syria's denials of being in contact with him. Syria still has an open account with Israel over the attack on its nuclear facility last September, which it claims Israel carried out.

Mughniyah's assassination – if it was carried out by Israel – strengthens the impression that Olmert is not afraid of making complex defence decisions that involve considerable risks.

The decision to enter the Second Lebanon War turned out to be a mistake that Israel is continuing to pay for. But the decisions that followed it appear balanced and justified. In view of Mughniyah's status and the future risk he posed, the attack on him was absolutely justified. The failure of Israel to strike at Hezbollah leaders had been seen as one of the war's greatest failures.

A previous assassination – of Hezbollah secretary general Abbas Musawi in February 1992 – was labelled in retrospect as a mistake, because it led to Hassan Nasrallah's rise to power. But Mughniyah is better compared to Shikaki, whose assassination paralyzed Islamic Jihad for several years.

The killing should worry Nasrallah himself because Mughniyah helped maintain his personal security. He must be asking himself whether his enemies could reach him, too. But no such success is possible unless the target becomes negligent or complacent or falls into a routine.

The black flags hoisted last week in Beirut's Shiite neighbourhoods and in some southern Lebanon villages also reflect a severe blow to Hezbollah's prestige. One Lebanese commentator described Mughniyah's assassination as the harshest blow in the organization's history.

This is precisely why Hezbollah is expected to seek vengeance as soon as possible. Hezbollah yesterday pledged "an eye for an eye, a man for a man, a leader for a leader." Such operations take time. Until then, Hezbollah may pressure its proteges – Palestinian groups in the territories – to carry out swift suicide bombings in Israel, as a prelude to revenge.

Opinions

Has multiculturalism run its course?

With a reputation for speaking his mind and often ignoring the niceties of political correctness, Britain's chief rabbi, Sir Jonathan Sacks, has waded into yet more choppy waters with his controversial views on multiculturalism.

In the very first paragraph of his recently published book, The Home We Build Together: Recreating Society (Continuum Books, 2007), he unhesitatingly sets the stage for what's to come, by stating: "Multiculturalism has run its course, and it is time to move on. It was a fine, even noble idea in its time. It was designed to make ethnic and religious minorities feel more at home in society, more appreciated and respected, better equipped with self-esteem and therefore better able to mesh with the larger society as a whole. It affirmed their culture. It gave dignity to difference. And in many ways it achieved its aims."

He then goes on to write: "But there has been a price to pay, and it grows year by year. Multiculturalism has led not to integration but to segregation. It has allowed groups to live separately, with no incentive to integrate and every incentive not to. It was intended to promote tolerance. Instead the result has been, in countries where it has been tried, societies more abrasive, fractured and intolerant than they once were."

Though at times a bit difficult to follow, Rabbi Sacks' arguments are, for the most part, cogent and thought-provoking. Not surprisingly, many of the reviewers of his book have been noncommittal, carefully avoiding overt endorsements of his position, while at the same time steering clear of actually criticizing him for opening this sort of discourse in the first place.

However, I did come across one rather extreme reaction that, precisely by way of its ugly diatribe, reaffirmed the very essence of what Rabbi Sacks has been concerned about. Writing in a blog called Jumah Pulse on Oct. 2, one Husain Al-Qadi called his treatise a "stealth attack on [the] Muslim community."

"It is no secret," he comments, "that when people shout about the failure of multiculturalism today, what they actually mean is the perceived failure of the Muslim community to integrate into wider society."

He ends by warning the Jewish community that "there are thousands of Muslims who are keeping records of every statement of venom and every publication that contributes to the unfolding crime upon crime against the whole Muslim community."

Rabbi Sacks' book is provocative, and so it should be. But regardless of whether one regards him as courageous or reckless for drawing attention to the blemishes of multiculturalism, he demands of us no less than an open and honest reappraisal of a construct that may well be obsolete as we move toward a civil society for the future.

A quandary with no easy answers

Cpl. Gilad Shalit was captured by Hamas operatives on June 25, 2006, at a military outpost near the Kerem Shalom crossing with Gaza, after the tank he was in was attacked with bombs and rockets.

Aside from Shalit, two other soldiers were killed in the assault, and a fourth, the tank's driver, was seriously wounded.

Since his capture, several signs of life have been received from Shalit, mostly through Egyptian intermediaries: a letter to his parents in September 2006; a request for new glasses at the beginning of 2007; a recording of him speaking, released by Hamas on the first anniversary of his abduction; and another letter received recently.

These signs have brought negotiations for Shalit's release into the public eye. They, in turn, have rekindled an ongoing debate about the price to be paid for our soldiers' freedom, the understanding being that it will be in the form of a major Palestinian prisoner release.

The prospective deal for Shalit's release will reportedly include 450 Palestinian prisoners. Because of Hamas' demands, these will include some with "blood on their hands," terrorists who have killed or injured innocent Israelis. The exact scope of this new flexibility will be discussed by a special inter-ministerial committee appointed to approve the exchange.

The dilemma is Solomonic.

The obligation to free prisoners is grounded on universal moral standards, military ethics and Halachah. The Israel Defence Forces' code of ethics states that "IDF servicemen... will always go to their [comrades'] assistance when they need their help or depend on them, despite any danger or difficulty, even to the point of risking their lives".

In the past, Israel has released numerous prisoners in return for just a few Israeli captives. For instance, in 1985, Israel freed 1,150 prisoners in exchange for three Israeli soldiers kidnapped in Lebanon, and in 2004, more than 430 prisoners and the bodies of 60 terrorists were exchanged for a disreputable Israeli businessman being held in Lebanon and the bodies of three Israeli soldiers.

Opponents of exchanges – including many from rabbinic or security circles, as well as Almagor, the terror victims' association, which is particularly vocal – claim that after their release, many prisoners return to terrorist activities. The latest example is the suicide bomber who blew himself up in Dimona on Feb. 4, killing a woman and maiming several others. He was released from prison only months earlier.

Prof. David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies, notes that "the public takes precedence over the individual, even if this endangers the individual. Exchanging hundreds or thousands of terrorists for one Israeli encourages kidnapping of Israelis and frees hundreds or thousands of terrorists who will pick up their weapons and attack Israel. In other words, it endangers the public and should not be done."

A further claim is that releasing serious terrorists will strengthen Hamas and weaken

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

While few Israelis want prisoners released, especially those who've committed heinous crimes, supporters of an exchange assert that IDF ethics oblige Israel to bring home all captives. They add that a prisoner release, linked to a broader agreement with Hamas, might end ongoing rocket attacks from Gaza on parts of the Negev. Moreover, there are currently some 10,000 Palestinians in Israeli jails, many of whom do not have "blood on their hands," and some of those who do have become moderate during their years of incarceration. Finally, they believe an exchange will lower tensions between Israel and Palestinians, and that, in turn, will lessen terrorist activities.

There's no textbook answer to the quandary. Both sides have valid arguments. However, if I had to decide, I'd join those calling for concessions to bring Shalit home – not in the vain hope that it would advance understanding between Israel and Hamas, or because Palestinian prisoners have become more restrained while in prison. Rather, I'd argue that a nation who sends its soldiers to fight and defend its borders in dangerous places must provide them and their families with the foreknowledge that anything and everything will be done to return them if they fall into harm's way.

We may eventually pay dearly for such a deal, but the soldier in me can't forget Ben-Gurion's words, literally etched in steel on the walls of the IDF's chief-of-staff's boardroom: "Every Hebrew mother must know she has delivered her sons into the hands of worthy commanders."

Re-occupying Gaza is Israel's only viable option

Gaza has never been a good neighbour – not during the time of the Philistines, and not under the Palestinians.

After the 1948 war, Egypt used the territory as a base for terror attacks, and after the Israeli take-over in the 1967 war, waves of violence continued. Israel pulled out in August 2005. The withdrawal was followed by the Hamas takeover, and the attacks increased. Since then, Gaza has become the launching pad for hundreds of missiles and mortars directed at Sderot, Ashkelon and other Israeli towns. And none of the generals, diplomats and pundits have come up with a successful response.

The military solution is to return to Gaza, reimposing tight Israeli control, including on the border with Egypt, but without the civilian settlements that complicated the situation after 1967. But after having occupied this narrow and highly overpopulated strip for almost 40 years, the Israel Defence Forces is in no hurry to go back in. No one wants to again be responsible for the lives of more than one million poverty-stricken and hostile Palestinians.

When former prime minister Ariel Sharon decided on the Israeli withdrawal a little more than two years ago, the hope was that Egypt would prevent the transfer of weapons, with a symbolic European presence at the Rafah border crossing.

Predictably, the Europeans ran away at the first sign of tension, and Cairo never made a serious effort, either because the Egyptians didn't have the capability or they didn't want to help prevent attacks on Israel. And when Sharon left the scene, the Olmert government responded with hesitation, still hoping that Hamas could be restrained.

But as rocket attacks expanded, and as residents fled Sderot, the government tried a policy based on pressure and isolation of Gaza, in the hope that ordinary Palestinians would force their leaders to stop. Israel first threatened to stop the supply of fuel and other supplies, and then, when the threats had no impact, the policy was implemented for a few days.

Having been warned well in advance, Hamas leaders were well prepared and orchestrated an artificial "humanitarian crisis" that was quickly accepted as real by the media. In the United Nations, the Human Rights Council issued the expected condemnations of Israel, and organizations such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch wheeled out the double standards again to declare Israel guilty of "collective punishment" and other imagined crimes.

With this wave of media and political support, Hamas blew up part of the concrete barrier along the border between Gaza and Egypt, and the Palestinian victims of the "humanitarian crisis" rushed across to buy televisions and other luxury goods. They were also able to bring in many more weapons for use in terror attacks, and to smuggle terrorists into Egypt. As a result, instead of being forced to rein in the rocket attacks, Hamas gained a propaganda victory while also being able to expand its terrorist infrastructure in Egypt.

In response, some pundits and arm-chair strategists are calling for talks with Hamas, in the hope of discovering a magic diplomatic solution. But talking by itself is just that and nothing more – to be effective, talks must lead to useful action. And since Hamas, like Hezbollah, is fixated on the goal of destroying Israel as part of a wider jihad, the best that negotiations on a temporary truce can do is give Hamas leaders in Gaza time to build up their terror capabilities for a wider assault against Israel.

For the same reason, the talk of placing international forces in Gaza is empty. If such forces (Canadian? European? Asian?) were effective in preventing Hamas from attacking Israel, they would become targets, as has happened in a few cases in Lebanon. If such forces fail to act, they would be caught in the middle of Israeli anti-terror operations, and Israel would be blamed again.

Which leaves a full scale military operation – with all the costs involved, including casualties – as the least bad option for Israel. This will also lead to a different relationship with Egypt, more of the standard "war crimes" propaganda from so-called human rights groups, and other complications. But Israel cannot simply allow the attacks on Sderot to continue, and every other option has failed.

Israel's ties with Iran have been mercurial

For the past few years in particular, Israel and Iran have been on a dangerous collision course, in an ominous replay of Israel's bitter battles with the Arab world from 1948 onward. Yet until the Islamic revolution of Feb. 11, 1979, Israel had reasonably cordial, even close relations with Iran, a country whose rivalry with its Arab neighbours is rooted in a historic scramble for regional dominance.

Even at the height of Israel's honeymoon with Iran, however, Iran treaded carefully, preferring to keep its ties with Israel out of public view, in a calculated policy that gave new meaning to the word realpolitik. Israel's relationship with Iran was sensitive and complicated, a fact that shines through Trita Parsi's finely nuanced Treacherous Alliance: The Secret Dealings of Israel, Iran, and the U.S. (Yale University Press). In this fascinating but heavy-going book, Parsi – the president of the National Iranian American Council and an adjunct professor of international relations at Johns Hopkins University – focuses largely on Israel and Iran, placing their marriage of convenience within the wider context of American interests in the Middle East.

What quickly becomes apparent is that all three countries used each other to attain strategic advantage. Israel, surrounded by hostile Arab states, needed to build alliances with non-Arab nations, primarily Iran, Turkey and Ethiopia, on the periphery of the Mideast. As well, Israel sought to encourage aliyah from Iran's sizable Jewish community. Iran, ruled imperiously by Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi until his ouster in 1979, regarded Israel as a balancing force against the Soviet Union and radical Arab states. The United States viewed Iran and Israel as bulwarks blocking Soviet expansionism and Arab extremism.

Being a Muslim state, Iran was one of 13 states that cast a dissenting vote on partitioning Palestine under the 1947 United Nations plan. For the first two years of Israel's existence, Iran declined to recognize Israel either on a de facto or de jure basis. But once Iran was convinced that Israel was in the western camp, it extended de facto recognition.

In the wake of the 1956 Suez war, Iran cooperated with Israel in the building of an oil pipeline from Eilat to Ashkelon so that Iranian oil exports would bypass Egypt's Suez Canal. By the same token, Tehran shied away from overt relations with Israel, realizing that it would fuel Arab opposition to Iran's policies in the Persian Gulf.

Given these calculations, Parsi observes, the Shah delegated Iran's secret police to handle relations with Israel through the Mossad, Israel's external intelligence service. Usually, the ministry of foreign affairs – which was critical of Iran's ties with Israel – was kept out of the loop. Iranian police, army and air force personnel were secretly trained in Israel, and Israel sold high-tech military equipment to Iran. In this clandestine spirit, he adds, Iranian diplomats who manned Iran's unobtrusive mission in Tel Aviv in the 1970s were, for the official record, posted to Switzerland. Iranian officials who visited Israel travelled through Turkey and never had their passports stamped. Israeli visits to Iran, including then-prime minister David Ben-Gurion's first trip in 1961, were not publicized.

The Six Day War marked a major shift in the Shah's attitude toward Israel. He now considered Israel as an aggressive rather than as an embattled state, fearing that it might challenge Iran's quest for regional preeminence and its strategic significance in Washington. He also feared that a resurgent Israel would compromise his high wire act of maintaining strong relations with the Jewish state without angering his Arab neighbours.

The Shah, therefore, froze all joint projects with Israel, stepped up criticism of Israel's occupation of the territories and asked the United States to apply pressure on Israel to adopt a more flexible position toward the Arabs. In 1971, in accordance with this tough approach, Iran refused to invite Israel's president to attend celebrations marking 2,500 years of the Persian empire.

During the Yom Kippur War, Iran lent Arab armies medical and logistical assistance, but sold Israel heavy mortars and refrained from joining the Arab oil embargo.

Viewing Iraq as a common enemy and hoping to weaken it, Israel and Iran jointly supported Iraqi Kurds from the mid-1960s onward. In 1975, the Shah betrayed the Kurds and pulled the rug from under Israel by signing an agreement with Iraq. Iran doubly incensed Israel by voting for a United Nations resolution equating Zionism with racism.

After Menachem Begin became Israeli prime minister, Iran threatened to curtail military co-operation with Israel. Despite Iran's bluster, the Shah signed a $1 billion oil-for-arms contract, and agreed to develop a long-range missile, with Israel.

In the wake of the Islamic revolution, Iran severed diplomatic relations with, and ended all oil exports to, Israel. In a humiliating way for Israeli arms sales to Iran during the initial phases of the Iran-Iraq War. From 1980 to 1983, Iran purchased more than $500-million worth of Israeli weaponry and spare parts. In a reflection of Israeli attitudes, no less a person than former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin declared that Iran was Israel's "natural ally." Under American pressure, Israel grudgingly cut off the flow of weapons in 1984, but contacts between Israel and Iran continued throughout the 1980s.

According to Parsi, Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon enabled Iran to export its theocratic revolution to that nation. Iranian Revolutionary Guards, having established a beachhead in the Bekaa Valley, forged a mutually beneficial relationship with Hezbollah, one of Israel's deadliest foes, then and now.

Parsi writes that Iraq's defeat in the first Gulf War, combined with the dissolution of the Soviet Union only months later, significantly changed the way Israel and Iran perceived each other: "The common threats that for decades had prompted the two states to co-operate and find common geostrategic interests – in spite of Iran's transformation into an Islamic anti-Zionist state – would no longer exist."

Shifting course, Israel adopted an anti-Iran policy after the mullahs restarted the Shah's nuclear program. Iran reached out, for the first time, to rejectionist Palestinian groups and took the lead in attacking the Madrid peace process.

By the early 1990s, Iran was Israel's chief adversary. With the Karine-A arms shipment incident in 2002, the fall of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein in 2003 and the election of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as Iranian president in 2005, Iran's status as Israel's most intractable enemy was reinforced.

Parsi, who describes the Iranian regime as radical but rational, believes that the United States can contain Iran through dialogue and engagement. In exchange, Iran would accept a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict and reduce its regional ambitions.

This, clearly, is easier said than done.

insult, Israel's mission in Tehran was handed to the PLO. Islamists considered Israel an illegitimate state and an enemy of Islam, while leftists perceived Israel as an outpost of U.S. imperialism.

Nevertheless, Israel continued to regard Iraq as the greatest threat to its security and tried to woo the new Khomeini regime.

In 1979, Israel returned to Iran tanks that it had upgraded during the Shah's regime. Then, in 1980, much to Washington's annoyance, an Iranian official arrived in Israel to discuss arms sales. Iran reciprocated by permitting large number of Iranian Jews to leave. Iran's duplicity was dizzying. As Parsi puts it, "On the one hand, Iran collaborated secretly with Israel on security matters, and, on the other, [Iran] took its rhetorical excesses against Israel to even higher levels to cover up its Israeli dealings."

Jews, Hindus face similar problems, say speakers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It took until nearly the end of the program for someone to finally mention "the elephant in the room." But in a question-and-answer period, the two speakers, one a Jew, the other a Hindu, were asked to comment on the dangers both groups faced from radical Islam.

Until then, Ramesh Rao, a spokesman for the Hindu American Foundation (HAF) and Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation, had largely — though not entirely — skirted the topic, focusing instead on community continuity strategies, discrimination (in particular on university campuses) and media distortions of their communities.

Rabbi Tanenbaum and Rao were the featured speakers at a business lunch lecture at the law offices of Minden Gross. The night before the two addressed another group at the York Woods Library Theatre. They were sponsored by the Speakers Action Group, an organization pledged to promoting tolerance and knowledge of issues that span communities.

Speaking on "Hinduphobia and Anti-Semitism: common issues," Rao said Israel and India are criticized when they defend themselves from radical Islamic aggression. Hindus ought to support Israel when it defends itself and Jews should support India when it fights back, he said.

Rao, a professor of communication studies at Longwood University in Virginia, referred to India's long-standing "effort to make Muslims and Islam part of its composite culture."

Despite that, he continued, India had fought three wars with Muslim Pakistan, and Pakistan-trained terrorists have attacked India on repeated occasions.

"India is seeking to be a progressive, democratic nation that is struggling to deal with this without demonizing a very large group," he said.

Muslim extremism is a threat not only to India and Israel, but "around the world," he added.

Rabbi Tanenbaum agreed with that latter contention, saying "radical Islam poses threats to the world and to Israel and India in particular."

That goes some way to explaining Israel's and India's recent co-operation in launching an Israeli surveillance satellite atop an Indian rocket to gather intelligence over Pakistan and China, he said.

Rabbi Tanenbaum said the Jewish and Hindu communities face challenges that can bring them together.

Rao began his presentation by noting similarities in the Jewish and Hindu traditions. Both are spiritual, faith communities that have faced "challenges throughout history."

The Hindu American Foundation was created five years ago and has had to face misconceptions about Hindus in academe, the press and among lawmakers. One U.S. congressman, introduced to a HAF group, asked if they were Sunni or Shia (Muslims), he said.

Hindus have been saddled with three stereotypes: cows, caste and curry. Those have even been found in school texts in California, he said.

In universities, academics treat Hindu traditions and religious beliefs in a way that "pathologizes and anthropologizes Hindus as aberrant faith followers."

Rabbi Tanenbaum began by pointing out that Jews had lived peacefully in India for millennia and that 1948 was momentous for both as India and Israel achieved independence that year.

He reviewed aspects of modern Jewish history, and noted that Jews as a minority have historically been out of sync with mainstream society. To conform better to the mainstream, Jews have assimilated but as a result, have lost many of the distinctive features of earlier Jewish life. He referred to 18th-century Enlightenment philosopher Moses Mendelssohn's advice that a Jew should be a mensch in the street and a Jew at home, saying that approach helped Jews integrate but it cost them some of their identity.

Hindus had told him their community had experienced much the same thing, Rabbi Tanenbaum added.

During the question period, one member of the audience suggested Mendelssohn's advice was in concert with Jewish law, which required Jews to conform to local laws, and might be applicable to Muslims and other immigrants to better integrate them into host societies.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency
Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising
reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

"Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Three contractors were touring the White House on the same day.

One was from New York, another from Missouri and the third from Florida. At the end of the tour, a guard asked them what they did for a living. When they each replied that they were contractors, the guard said, "Hey, we need one of the rear fences redone. Why don't you guys take a look at it and give me your bids?"

First, the Florida contractor took out his tape measure and pencils, did some measuring and said, "I figure the job will run about $900 - $400 for materials, $400 for my crew, and $100 profit for me."

Next was the Missouri contractor. He also took out his tape measure and pencil, did some quick calculations and said, "I can do this job for $700 - $300 for materials, $300 for my crew, and $100 profit for me."

Finally, the guard asks the New York contractor for his bid. Without batting an eye, the contractor says, "I'd charge $2,700."

The guard, incredulous, looks at him and says, "You didn't even measure like the other guys! How did you come up with such a high figure?"

"Easy," said the contractor from New York. "One thousand dollars for me, $1,000 for you, and we hire the guy from Missouri to do the work."

Jokes aside, there is something to be said about an honest day's work. There is a wonderful feeling we experience when we've accomplished something by our own hand. This sense of satisfaction can't be duplicated if we're merely handed success on a golden platter.

This idea is represented in a fascinating way in the Torah's narrative of how the two sets of tablets containing the 10 Commandments were produced.

The first set of tablets was fashioned by God Himself. Moses wasn't required to actively participate in their formation. These tablets were destroyed when Moses discovered the Jewish People worshipping the Golden Calf.

God instructed Moses to replace the first tablets that he had shattered.

Moses did not receive this second set of tablets as a completed work. In contrast to the first set of tablets, Moses was required to climb Mount Sinai and hew the second set himself. With his own hands, he had to carve, chisel and shape the hard rock from the top of the mountain.

When Moses was done and he came down the mountain with the second set of tablets in his hand, the Torah tells us that rays of light emanated from his face. His face shone with the radiance that comes only to those who achieve a lofty goal after great trial and toil.

There was a time when conditions were favourable to Jewish observance - when it was normal and natural to be a believing and pious Jew.

Those times can be compared to the first set of tablets. Without much work, we were handed a great religion.

Things have changed since then. Today, the world, its media and its ethics don't favour Jewish piety and observance. In times like these, it takes great effort to stand up for what's right and true.

But the difficulty of incorporating Jewish values into our daily lives shouldn't discourage us from trying to be more observant. Rather, we should realize that it's specifically through overcoming challenges that we find the shining rays of true happiness.

Acting according to God's will may not be the easiest or most popular life choice, but it's through the hard work of developing our character that we will bring forth the great light that lies within each of us.

Rabbinic Reflections

Bad acts must have consequences

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In light of the war on terror, which for most people is nothing more than whiling away additional time at the airport, perennial questions emerge that education should take an interest in and desire to confront. What kind of price is a society willing to pay to stop people from committing acts of violence? How does one repay murder?

A thought experiment by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant puts the issue into sharp relief.

Kant asks what would happen if we took a convicted murderer and placed him on a presumably unpleasant island that had long since been abandoned, with no chance of escape?

Would we still feel the need to kill him? Kant understood that such a proposition would test out our motives in contemplating execution. If the purpose is to prevent any future harmful acts, then it would seem that execution would be redundant, as the goal of deterrence would already have been achieved. To execute at this point would imply that we feel a need to redress the past - to punish regardless of any future threat or lack of it.

Kant himself argues that even if everyone was long gone from the island, "the last murderer lying in the prison ought to be executed... This ought to be done that everyone may realize the desert of his deeds."

At the other end of the spectrum is George Orwell, who in his 1931 essay A Hanging leaves behind all thoughts of deterrence or punishment and focuses only on the humanity of all, regardless of anyone's moral credentials: "I had never realized what it means to destroy a healthy, conscious man. When I saw the prisoner step aside... I saw the mystery, the unspeakable wrongness, of cutting a life short when it is in full tide."

Both Kant and Orwell stand on principle, though radically different ones: either the imperative to punish, or the hideousness of prematurely ending any life with deliberation.

Punishment is popularly associated with Judaism, as opposed to Christianity, but even Christianity posits some kind of hell.

Indeed, the very suggestion that compassionate forgiveness is not the only possible solution for Hitler's eternal soul has been a thorn in the side of some of the 20th century's most renowned thinkers.

For Bertrand Russell, this fact was what convinced him that he was not a Christian, nor did he want to be.

"There is one very serious defect to my mind in Christ's moral character, and that is that He believed in hell. I do not believe myself that any person who is really profoundly humane can believe in everlasting punishment," Russell wrote.

And C.S. Lewis - who was, unlike Russell, a deeply committed Christian - writes with reticence and regret about hell in The Problem of Pain: "There is no doctrine that I would more willingly remove from Christianity than this, if it lay in my power. But it has the full support of Scripture... and it has the full support of reason."

Clearly, neither man would have been laudatory about the Jewish perspective, for Judaism views consequences for bad actions not as the antithesis of compassion, but as its very essence.

Or, as the Talmud reminds us, "those that are kind to the cruel will end up being cruel to the kind."

Unlikely Utopia: The Surprising Triumph of Canadian Pluralism by Michael Adams, Viking Canada.

This informative slender volume brings good news about Canadian multiculturalism. It is current, optimistic, sensible and forward-looking. Its author is a well-known Canadian pollster and social analyst.

It is often overlooked that Canada has the highest immigration rate on the planet. However, it was only in the 1960s that Canada abandoned its racist immigration policies and began admitting newcomers according to their skills and qualifications, rather than their nations of origin.

About 100 years ago, J. S. Woodsworth, the first leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, argued that it wasn't a good idea to import Chinese labourers to work on the Canadian Pacific Railway. They were unworthy and would not make good citizens. Actually, work on the railway was not only back-breaking, but also deadly. The Chinese labourers who were hired were engaged in perilous work, and nearly one in 10 was killed on the job.

Despite numerous obstacles, some Chinese workers still wished to remain in Canada. But the federal government at the time imposed a cruel head tax, for which Canada has only recently apologized.

Sallah Shabbati (Israel's Oscar nominee in 1964): Chaim Topol played Sallah in Ephraim Kishon's satire of Israeli society. Sallah, a North African Jew and his family of eight arrive in the new State of Israel in 1949 and find themselves settled in a Maabara, a settlement camp full of one-room huts. While watching him confront the bureaucracy for permanent housing, the movie manages to skewer life in the young country. Here's how Jewlicious.com describes Sallah: "[He's] lazy, he's a drunk, he's a gambler who brings his sheshbesh [backgammon] board to the synagogue... he on principle refuses to talk to women, and he's perfectly willing to sell off his eldest daughter to the highest bidder. And yet, he may be the most lovable character in Israeli cinematic history." [tinyurl.com/23bhaq] The New York Times also had praise for the movie. [tinyurl.com/3d4pr3]

Hashoter Azulai (The Policeman) (1972): Kishon was also behind Israel's next nomination, as writer and director of Hashoter Azulai. Shaike Ofir plays Avraham Azulai, the not-too-bright officer of the Jaffa police department. As one reviewer points out, "Azulai's incompetence is not a result of lack of skill, but rather that of a soft heart and kindness." Immigration wasn't the only arena in which bigotry was displayed in Canada. In 1933, at the notorious Christie Pits Riot, Toronto residents, displaying swastika banners, tried to ban Jews from the city's beaches. Japanese Canadians were interned during World War II.

Much has been achieved over time. Once it seemed likely that Canada could never aspire to genuine equality for newcomers, let alone achieve it. How things have changed.

It is noteworthy that 80 per cent of recent immigrants after four years in the country say that if they had to do it again they would make the same decision and come to Canada.

What about Muslims as immigrants? Today, they are about 2.5 per cent of the total population, numbering about 850,000. Islam is, surprisingly, the fastest growing religion in the country. The median age of Canadian Muslims is about a decade younger than the median age of the population at large.

Among foreign-born Muslims, about half have come to Canada in the last 10 years. Thirty per cent have been in Canada from 11 to 19 years, and 17 per cent have been in this country for two decades or longer. About 60 per cent of them live in Ontario, and 20 per cent reside in Quebec.

Despite widespread unfavourable comment and some irresponsible alarm, it is clear, says the author, according to his research, that Muslims tend to share important traits with other newcomers to Canada: optimism, enthusiasm for their adopted country, a desire to improve their lives and the wish to be treated fairly.

In Adams' discussion of the Quebec "Quiet Revolution," readers are reminded that Quebecers not only rejected traditional religious ritual and conviction but also many conventions associated with the Catholic Church, such as marriage and a wife's taking her husband's surname. Quebec has come to have the highest proportion of common-law unions in Canada.

Immigrants to Quebec face a unique experience in this province's distinct society. But like all of us, they live in accord with our country's Charter, its laws, its health care, its passport and its people.

Finally, Adams salutes Canada for its success in showing a restless world how newcomers of diverse backgrounds can live together in relative unity, mutual tolerance and understanding.

nomination, critics weren't kind, calling the screenplay cliché-ridden and lacking nuance. [tinyurl.com/mpwd5] You can get a taste of the movie from several lengthy excerpts on YouTube. [tinyurl.com/yw2fql]

Me Ahorei Hasoragim (Beyond the Walls) (1985): The site Rotten Tomatoes gives this summary of the film: "The jailers of an overcrowded prison conspire to keep Israeli and Arab inmates at odds. When the prisoners come to the realization that their racist attitudes are self-destructive, they unite in a daring escape plan." [tinyurl.com/29kdhe] Although it may sound like a highly charged political drama, the New York Times likened it to "melodrama behind bars." [tinyurl.com/2ba4pn] YouTube has the Hebrew-language trailer. [tinyurl.com/yog8ga]

Beaufort (2008): Israel had to wait almost a quarter century for its next foreign language nomination. Beaufort tells the story of an Israel Defence Forces unit stationed at a Crusader castle toward the end of Israel's 18-year occupation of southern Lebanon. [tinyurl.com/3d5ojb] Beaufort is now available in English. [tinyurl.com/2hysef] The movie has its own bilingual site with trailers and reviews. [www.bufo.co.il]

The Jerusalem Post called Beaufort "Israel's first great war movie." On Sunday, we'll find out if the members of the academy agree and make it the country's first Oscar winner.

Organization for special needs adults gets new home

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Almost two years after its inception, DANI, an organization that serves young adults with special needs, has rented a 3,000-square-foot house as its home base.

DANI's Place, at 12 McAllister Rd. in the Sheppard Avenue and Bathurst Street area, hosts an opening celebration on Sunday, Feb. 24, from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Known by its acronym, DANI, "Developing and Nurturing Independence" was co-founded by two mothers of young adults with special needs, Kathy Laszlo and Susie Sokol.

For children like Laszlo and Sokol's, who are no longer in school, it is important to continue learning and practising life skills and religious studies, Laszlo said.

Among the planned activities at the new house, which DANI is leasing from Magen David Sephardic Congregation, is a cooking and baking program that will involve seniors who live nearby.

DANI has received a New Horizons for Seniors grant from the federal government for the program. "Whatever we do is very community oriented," Laszlo said.

A related goal, further down the road, is the establishment of a kosher café.

More imminently, the organization is planning to bring in work for some of the clients, either light assembly or piecework, as well as vocational training.

"We want to change the environment so they can do as much as possible independently," Laszlo said. "I really believe everybody can have a place."

Last year, in addition to regular Jewish holiday programs, DANI ran its second annual one-week summer camp. But even in a recreational program, organizers built in life skills education for participants, who had to buy their own TTC tickets for outings and had a bank tour to complement their training in how to use money.

New this year is a basketball program being run out of Yeshivat Or Chaim by Daniel Moshe Johnson, a former professional basketball player who was contacted by DANI after he was featured in a CJN article last year. He is the director of sports mentoring for the International Charity Association Network (ICAN). Or Chaim students help in the DANI basketball program as volunteers.

"Everybody's having so much fun, and [the participants] are so accepted for who they are," Laszlo said. "You would not necessarily know which ones have special needs."

DANI has a mailing list of 65 families and is assessing needs to determine future programming directions.

Its activities have been funded in part with the proceeds from last year's fundraising dinner attended by 750 people, which raised more than $60,000.

This year's gala fundraiser will be held March 27 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. The event, Broadway North, will be hosted by Diane Dupuy of Famous People Players. It will honour Batya Feigenbaum, a physically handicapped teacher at Tiferes Bais Yaakov High School who serves on DANI's board, and Esther Wachsmann of Shalva, the Association for Mentally and Physically Challenged Children, based in Jerusalem.

For further information about DANI or its upcoming events, call 905-731-6606 or e-mail dani.toronto@yahoo.com.

Gala evening will benefit Chezi's Corner

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Regesh Family & Child Services' gala, Sparkle, Sizzle and Song, a musical tribute to Rabbi Yitzchak Witty, is being held March 1 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Proceeds from the social service agency's annual fundraiser — which is one of the organization's main sources of revenue, and which this year includes an auction and "savory delights" — will benefit the young people of Chezi's Corner, a residential safe house for up to four Jewish boys. It's named in memory of Yechezkel Scotty Goldberg, a Toronto native and therapist for at-risk Israeli youth who was killed in a bus bombing in Israel in January 2004.

The strictly kosher house, for youths between the ages of 15 and 24, gives residents the opportunity to live in a safe, caring, learning environment when living at home is not an option for them.

Edwin Schild, Regesh's executive director, said the boys live in the house because of mental health or family problems, or because they need to acquire independent living skills.

The original mandate was for them to stay for six months, he said, but some have stayed as little as three months, while others have lived there for up to two years.

House parents Shlomo and Sharon Surkis, shlichim who teach at the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and who have four children of their own, said the boys — there are now three living in the house — are treated like adults, and must be in school, at a job, or doing volunteer work.

"We all get up in the morning and leave for the day. No one stays home and sleeps," Sharon Surkis said.

The boys can visit friends after school, she said, but they must be home for dinner three nights a week and must have Shabbat dinner with the family.

"The boys come from all backgrounds, and some know little about Judaism. They must respect our Shabbat, but after dinner, they can go out or go to their rooms and do what they want. Our only strong rule is that the house is kept strictly kosher."

She said that some of the boys have lived without rules for many years. "We want them to live in a loving, caring family where everyone respects each other."

One 15-year-old boy who has lived in the house for one year, said he used to take drugs, get to school late and skip curfew. "[The Surkis] have helped me a lot. I care about myself now. I take the bus to school on time, and have worked hard enough in school to get out of the alternative education classes and into the regular stream. I feel proud of myself. I feel like I have a family here."

Sharon Surkis said she and her husband spend a lot of time doing informal counselling. "If someone does something wrong, we try to teach them better behaviour. We don't punish."

Schild said that Regesh relies on money from the fundraiser to run the house — the agency provides everything for the boys from clothing to transportation — because it receives no government funding.

He said that Regesh did receive $150,000 in funding from the federal Department of Justice's youth justice fund to implement a community-based program called Reconnection Youth.

As a pilot, Regesh will work with its local community partners, including the Toronto District School Board, to implement a peer group approach to work with at-risk youth.

Schild said that currently the agency is working with 12 youths on such issues as anger management, conflict resolution, self-esteem enhancement and decision making.

"As kids begin to feel better about themselves, they get in less trouble. We have found a reduction in drug usage, and an increase in their grades," said Schild.

CJC praises call for more inclusive prayer

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress praised Premier Dalton McGuinty's call last week for an all-party review of the daily practice of reciting the Lord's Prayer in the provincial legislature.

Premier Dalton McGuinty

"The CJC has had a longstanding position that the exclusive use of the Lord's Prayer reflects back to a time when Ontario society was much more homogenous," said Len Rudner, Congress' Ontario regional director. "We always felt that other options were available.

"I think it's very positive that the premier is embracing the rich multicultural diversity of Ontario. We hope that the legislative committee... will consult with the Jewish community for our input," Rudner added. "We're proud to be a part of Ontario."

McGuinty announced his plan to review the prayer in a surprise letter to provincial opposition leaders.

"I believe it is time for Ontario's Legislature to better reflect Ontario's reality and celebrate our diversity," McGuinty wrote. "The members of the Ontario Legislature reflect the diversity of Ontario – be it Christian, Jewish, Hindu, Muslim, Sikh or agnostic. It is time for our practices to do the same. That is the Ontario way."

McGuinty said he will seek input from the province's various ethnic communities on alternatives or additions to the Christian prayer, which has been used to open legislative sessions at Queen's Park for generations and was last updated in 1969.

The premier said that most other provincial legislatures, as well as the federal Senate and House of Commons, have modernized their procedures to reflect changing times.

In response to McGuinty's letter, provincial Conservative leader John Tory – who ran his unsuccessful 2007 election campaign on a platform of incorporating faith-based schools into the public school system – said the Tories would take part in the all-party committee, but not if the plan is to scrap the prayer.

"Part of respecting the tradition of the Legislature is keeping the Lord's Prayer. That doesn't mean we wouldn't be open to other prayers being added, but a starting assumption that we would eliminate the Lord's Prayer would not be acceptable to us," Tory wrote back to McGuinty.

Message heard on Parliament Hill

Rabbi Poupko continued: "The only reason for [the caucus] to better reflect Ontario's reality and celebrate our diversity... is to make clear that Jews are skeptical of [the Palestinians'] ability to make peace and... that the continued provocation [against Israel] in the Palestinian media doesn't augur well for the future."

The Rabbinic Caucus' message seemed to be heard on Parliament Hill.

James Lunney, the Conservative MP for Nanaimo, B.C., welcomed the rabbis as guests in the House of Commons last Tuesday. It was the caucus' second such visit since it was formed in 2006.

"Noting that terrorism is rampant in the world, the rabbis will repeat their call to the leaders of all faith groups to denounce the killing of innocents in the name of God or of religion," Lunney told the House. "[They carry] the message once more to all Canadians that overseas conflicts and the resultant passionately held views should not be allowed to degenerate into uncivil discourse and antagonisms here at home."

Anita Neville, Liberal MP for Winnipeg South Centre, also acknowledged the rabbis' visit to Ottawa and called on the Conservatives to "take the lead" in the international community by using Canada's Special Economic Measures Act to impose sanctions on Iran for its ongoing nuclear enrichment program.

The act, as described on the Departments of Foreign Affairs' website, allows the government to "impose sanctions measures in relation to a foreign state" if it believes that "a grave breach of international peace and security has occurred that has resulted, or is likely to result in, a serious international crisis."

The act also gives Ottawa powers to seize the Canadian property of the offending state or the Canadian property of that state's citizens, as well as to stop the trade of goods and prevent travel to and from that country.

"Iran poses [a threat] to Israel, to Middle East stability and to world security," Neville said. "The Liberal Party believes that the international community has an obligation to exhaust all appropriate means of solving the Iranian nuclear crisis."

The guided trip takes place from June 16 to 27. Air, room and board are provided.

Candidates must file applications by March 1.

Participants will be able to explore all facets of Israeli society, and will be hosted by Israeli academics.

They will visit Jerusalem in order to appreciate its importance to Israel and the Jewish people.

They will visit Yad Vashem, the Holocaust museum in the foothills of Jerusalem.

They will tour two of Tel Aviv's historic neighbourhoods, Florentine and Neve Tzedek.

Participants will also meet Russian immigrants, Israeli Arabs and religious Jews, and tour historic sites in the Galilee.

To better understand Israel's economy, they will be given a tour of the Tefen Industrial Park, which is renowned for its high quality high-tech products.

They will also meet with leaders of renewable energy companies.

The politics of the Middle East will figure heavily in the program.

Participants will be taken to settlements that have been bombed by Palestinian Qassam rockets for the past seven years.

They will meet some of Israel's leading Arab affairs writers and visit an air force base, the security barrier and northern Israel.

They will learn about Israeli culture by talking to filmmakers, visiting the Suzanne Dalal Center in Tel Aviv and spending an evening listening to Israeli music with Middle Eastern roots.

To gain an insight into Israel's advancements in science and its commitment to democracy, they will meet scientists, engineers, technologists, government officials, parliamentarians, political activists and commentators representing different points of view.

Program helps girls become modern Jewish women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

Staff Reporter

Tom Girls, a new program for Jewish girls who are coming of age, addresses "the day after the bat mitzvah," not the event itself, says Rachael Turkienicz, director of the Learning Centre.

The mother-daughter program – "Tom" stands for "Torah of our Mothers" – is set to begin Feb. 24 for eight weeks.

Rather than focus on the actual bat mitzvah day, it will look at what it means to be a Jewish woman, Turkienicz said.

The Sunday-morning program covers a range of Jewish texts, guest speakers and trips downtown that bring out questions of being a Jewish woman in today's world, she said.

"The program includes top-notch guest speakers such as chefs, designers and musicians, as well as field trips which include a partnered program with the Toronto Humane Society," Turkienicz said. "A formal ceremony with family and guests takes place on the last day at Baycrest, in which residents take part."

Areas to be covered by the program include body image and holiness, Jewish ethics and values, and self-knowledge, interpersonal skills, Jewish activism and tikkun olam.

Group marks 20 years of promoting 'kosher speech'

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Gossip and character assassination are not recent phenomena — human tongues have always been loose and hard to control.

As the Talmud says, "Most people are slightly guilty of dishonesty, few of vice, but all of lashon hara."

In Toronto, the Shmiras Haloshon Organization tries to make more people aware of the laws of "kosher speech" — and the damage that "unkosher speech" can cause.

The group celebrated its 20th anniversary this year with a special lecture in memory of its founder earlier this month and with the release of a new book of her writings.

Lashon hara, say the Jewish sages, is defined as any language that could be hurtful to someone, causing either embarrassment, fear, offence, discomfort, abuse or insult. Even if a statement is true, or purposeless, it still falls into the category of forbidden speech.

Motzi shem ra (literally "spreading a bad name") is speech about someone that is true, but is filtered so that it's interpreted differently than it should be, according to Devorah Shmulevitz, whose late mother, Rebbeztin Phyllis Weinberg, created the Shmiras Haloshon organization.

Inappropriate speech has the potential to cause physical, financial and emotional pain, Shmulevitz said. The intricacies of the laws of lashon hara are many and nuanced, and they need to be studied in detail, as they're not always intuitive, she added.

"It's hard to understand for some people in a society that adores free speech. Yet, the Torah says that lashon hara cannot be said even if someone were to say, 'I'd say it to their face anyway.' Imagine the destructive power when people decide to smear someone's character," Shmulevitz said. "Hurtful speech can ruin relationships."

It also has the potential to ruin reputations, as Shmulevitz's mother found out.

Just prior to founding Shmiras Haloshon, Weinberg ran unsuccessfully for school trustee in Ward 6 of the old City of North York.

In the weeks leading up to the vote, Shmulevitz said, there was "much gossiping" from those who opposed her, and she learned about its negative power.

"She then set out to bring the positive out of the negative. People coming together to do good has tremendous power."

Weinberg, who died in 2001 at age 73, held a PhD in psychology, ran counselling services and helped families work through difficult issues. She received a Canada 125 medal from the governor general for her community service.

She called gossip one of the deadliest weapons in modern society.

She once wrote that she dealt with many young adults who were "traumatized by deceitful, hurting, deliberately destructive and embarrassing words."

She also spoke and wrote often of the healing aspects of positive speech.

In commemoration of Weinberg's seventh yaahrzeit, Toronto's Bais Yaakov High School hosted a lecture on Feb. 11 by Rabbi Yechiel Spero, best-selling author of the "Touched By a Story" series.

Additionally, Reaching Beyond Yourself, a compilation of Weinberg's writings on lashon hara, will be published posthumously.

The organization has registered many accomplishments since its founding, such as "NLH" (short for "No Lashon Hara") clubs in schools, as well as home study programs for adults.

More than 150 volunteers contribute their time and resources to the organization, Shmulevitz said, and branches have also opened in Hamilton, Ottawa and Edmonton.

Eight years ago, the organization created the "Place Card Project," which offers wedding table place cards containing an inspirational poem that reminds guests to refrain from speaking ill of another person.

By popular demand, the program has spread to many parts of the United States and overseas.

Still others take part in learning groups guided by the writings of Rabbi Yisroel Meir Kagan (1838-1933), author of the definitive compendium on the topic of lashon hara. He eventually became known as the Chofetz Chaim, the name of his book.

He said the consequences of transgressing the laws of lashon hara are equivalent to the consequences for idolatry, murder and adultery combined.

The sages say that the Jewish people have been exiled for 2,000 years because of the sin of lashon hara.

"Imagine the power when people choose to speak about others," Shmulevitz said. "And then imagine the power when people work together to focus on more positive speech."

Volunteering in an Israeli African refugee centre

By TILLY SHAMES

Special to The CJN

"It is not incumbent upon you to finish the task. Yet, you are not free to desist from it." – Rabbi Tarfon, Ethics of the Fathers.

These were the parting words of encouragement from Michelle Lackie, Tzedek Hillel director, as 130 Hillel students from around the world (South America, North America, Russia and Moldova) dispersed throughout Israel to embark upon a very "alternative" experience.

Hillel's Alternative Break in Israel, funded by the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation, furthers Tzedek Hillel's goals to pursue justice and transform communities.

Little did we know just how often Rabbi Tarfon's words would comfort us as our group of 21 Hillel students began to transform ourselves as we volunteered with African refugees and children of migrant workers in southern Tel Aviv.

Nothing could have prepared us for walking into one of the shelters facilitated by the African Refugee Development Center, where we would spend the three days meeting and working alongside dozens of African refugees trying to get their bearings in Israel.

We expected poor conditions, but could not have imagined the scene we found. More than 150 men slept on mattresses on the floor in a room where stench seeped from two toilets. There was one sink for all these men, and plastic bags filled with their meagre belongings hung from the ceiling.

We expected to meet refugees from Darfur because their entry into Israel had made international headlines, but we didn't think that the majority of refugees would have fled from conflicts in the Ivory Coast and Eritrea.

We expected to communicate in broken Hebrew, yet our limited French served us better. Some had arrived just days before, while others still struggled to find out about their working status after several months. Many were happy to be in Israel, some praising their new home that welcomed them after a long journey of oppression and rejection, yet all were uncertain about their future.

We immediately began to paint the dreary shelter, once known as the Bulldog Nightclub. It was illuminated by only one light bulb and a beam of light coming through the doorway.

Working alongside our new African friends, we heard stories about their journeys to Israel, discussed our favourite soccer teams and life back home.

Within minutes, no one noticed the dark or the smell. We painted with the refugees who had just arrived, but also with those who had established themselves in Israel. They worked in kitchens overnight and joined us to volunteer during the day.

For the African volunteers, it wasn't about painting the site for themselves; it was about making the shelter a better place for more refugees who would sadly follow. Within three days, the entire shelter would be covered in bright yellow paint, bringing a little light into these difficult times for the refugees.

What made our work truly meaningful was the opportunity to reflect on our experience together as a group. Today, students can volunteer anywhere with anyone, but as a Hillel trip, it was crucial that we provided a Jewish foundation to our work by focusing on the values of tzedek and the role Israel plays in our lives.

Several students openly shared their feelings of guilt and privilege as North Americans, as well as their sense of obligation and commitment to social justice as Jews. However, the Argentine participants reminded us of their struggles and the importance of supporting your community at home, a message that the students from New Orleans understood only too well. We soon realized that we had as much to learn from one another in our own microcosm of Jewish peoplehood as we did from the African refugees.

Throughout the trip, our students questioned everything around them, but most of all, they questioned how much of an impact they could have.

After all, we were not professional painters and the needs of the refugees far exceed what a coat of paint can provide. But we quickly saw the difference that our group could make. We offered an ear to hear the stories the refugees wanted to tell.

We offered a bit of humanity in conditions that were sub-human. Ultimately, we knew that we could only offer our portion, and that there was more work to be done, but at least we would be a part of the change, both in Israel and on our campuses back home.

Tilly Shames is the associate director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Sderot: a city under siege

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

A distraught mother in Sderot mourns the death of a son caused by a Qassam rocket.

For more than seven years, the 190,000 men, women and children of Sderot and the Western Negev have been living under the constant threat of Qassam rocket attacks. Since 2001, the western Negev region has endured over 6,000 terrorist rocket attacks launched by Hamas from Gaza, half of which detonated in Sderot.

Imagine trying to live your life normally when, at any moment, that life could be shattered with just two words: "Code Red," words which Sderot residents know means they have 15 seconds to find cover before the next rocket hits.

For most of us, we only hear about these attacks once tragedy occurs, but for residents of this region, these attacks are part of their daily lives.

Many Sderot residents, so deeply affected by post-traumatic distress syndrome, and treated for hysteria and shock, are forced to take sedatives to get through the day and sleeping pills to endure the nights.

The psychological damage and the damage to homes, businesses and families from the constant threat are ruining lives. Many families - struggling to get by on reduced salaries - find themselves divided over whether to stay or leave Sderot. Often families have been forced to take out several loans and dip into the family savings to keep afloat.

Sderot's economy began freefalling with the first rocket attack. Between 20 to 30 percent of businesses in Sderot and surrounding areas have been forced to shut down.

Ironically, the Qassam attacks intensified after Israel withdrew from Gaza in the summer of 2005.

The history of the Qassam

The Qassam rockets are named after the Izz ad-Din al-Qassam Brigades, the armed branch of Hamas.

Preferred by Hamas for its portability which allows terrorists to fire the rocket while on the run, the Qassam is filled with a number of explosives, produced by Hamas.

Although they are sometimes referred to as missiles, Qassams, that have been targeting Israeli civilians for seven years, are actually free-flight, artillery rockets lacking any guidance system. It is that indiscriminate feature of the Qassam that makes them considered as much a psychological threat as a physical threat, creating considerable psychological damage to many children in Sderot. Sderot residents receive only 15 seconds warning before a Qassam strikes the city.

Voices from Sderot

The following are actual blogs posted by citizens of Sderot, all of whom live every day with the threat of terror hanging over their heads.

"CODE RED, CODE RED, I turned round and looked at my watch to see what time it was. It's 5:30 in the morning, they're early today,' I thought, and a second later I found myself in the corridor. That's the safest place in our house. BOOM! 'That was pretty close,' I said to myself, 'oh well, I guess I can go back to sleep for another hour'. And without further ado, I went back to bed, almost oblivious to the crazy situation here in Sderot."

Posted by L, a student in Sderot.

"Last May-June, the situation in Sderot was very difficult. Every day, dozens of Kassam's fell all over the city, people suffered deep emotional scars, there was considerable damage to property and many of the residents left. As program coordinator, I was faced with serious dilemmas. What do we do now? Is it safe to go to work? What about the students, for whom I'm responsible, can I force them to stay in Sderot to help? And how can we possibly organize activities for those who stayed? The beautiful side of Israel is still there, thriving. I would like to invite anyone who tries to paint a negative picture of the youth of today should to come to Sderot and see the sincere work that is being done there - out of pure Zionist values.

Tel Aviv is Israel's culinary capital

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Tel Aviv has become a "culinary superpower," a city where a unique culinary culture has blossomed, says master chef of the city's Dan Panorama Hotel, Miki Nir.

Nir and chef Roman Elazarov were here on Jan. 29 to prepare a special $150-a-plate, five-course kosher Tu b'Shvat meal for a Jewish National Fund (JNF) dinner held at the Fairmont Hotel.

The event was attended by about 75 people, including Ovide Mercredi, chief of Grand Rapids First Nation and former national chief of the Assembly of first Nations. Mercredi was seated next to Mel Lazarek, the new president of JNF Winnipeg.

In an interview following the event, Nir said that between the falafel stands and gourmet restaurants, as well as the large spectrum of French, North African, Italian, Persian, Chinese and east European eateries, Tel Aviv has become a top gastronomic destination.

Nir, who has been working at the Dan Panorama for 17 years, noted that the menus at the hotel have changed over time. "We used to serve a lot of Jewish food, with eastern European flavours. But now there is less of that and more Middle Eastern dishes, with distinctly Israeli touches," he said. "We are taking the recipes that our mothers made at home and are adapting them to new gourmet standards."

According to Nir, Tel Aviv's food industry has had to adapt to the increased number of international tourists this year. "Tourism has been exploding in the last year in Tel Aviv and elsewhere in the country. The Dan Panorama is completely full all the time, and the situation is the same for all the other hotels along the beach strip. You can no longer just book a room for a night — a seven-day minimum is required," he said.

"We anticipate that it will be the same throughout the spring and summer. We've noticed a real increase in the numbers of business travellers. When it comes to food, the business traveller wants a high level of professionalism and service."

Nir said he likes to go to Tel Aviv's upscale gourmet restaurants to sample the offerings of other well-known chefs. "There has been a real development in the genre of gourmet food in Tel Aviv in the last few years," he noted.

Top restaurants use fresh, locally grown vegetables, and chefs create superb seasonal dishes with the highest quality ingredients.

"The chefs are using French techniques with local Israeli, Middle Eastern or Arab touches," Nir said. "Prices at these gourmet restaurants range from expensive to very expensive to very, very expensive."

Nir said popular Tel Aviv restaurants include the one at Dan Panorama as well as Cordelia under chef Nir Zook; Rafael's under chef Rafi Cohen; Moul Hayam; Roshfeld, a new cuisine bistro; and Katit, which serves dishes featuring "a combination of tastes."

Gourmet restaurants in Tel Aviv are known for their innovative and exacting chefs and also for their professional service, Nir said.

Elazarov, who was trained by Nir and also works at the Dan Panorama, said that "in Tel Aviv, the food is best in the summer, when there is so much fresh fruit and vegetables available."

Elazarov, who has a young family, prefers the "steakiyyot" restaurants of Tel Aviv, which focus on grilled meats, hummus and fresh vegetable salads.

"I like Middle Eastern restaurants which are authentic and affordable for a family. There are some restaurants such as Yitzhak HaGadol, where people stand in line to wait for the food, and it's expensive, but they are willing to pay," he said.

Elazarov is looking forward to the upcoming spring and summer.

"Everyone in the food industry is excited about the prospects for the upcoming months. Already this year has been one of the most successful years ever for tourism," he said.

"We are preparing for a big wave of tourists who will come to celebrate Israel's 60th birthday in the spring and expect there to be lots of tourists this summer."

Use of Yiddish declining in Canada

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For the first time in Canadian history, Hebrew has eclipsed Yiddish as a mother tongue for Jews in Canada, as elderly speakers of the European language die off and as the flow of Israeli immigrants continues.

According to a new analysis by the Montreal-based Association for Canadian Studies (ACS) of data from the 2006 census, there were 18,550 people in Canada whose first language was Hebrew, compared to 17,255 for Yiddish.

In 2001, the census numbers were 12,435 for Hebrew as a mother tongue and 19,295 for Yiddish.

That represents a 49 per cent increase in people with Hebrew as their mother tongue — including 40 per cent increases each in Montreal and Toronto — between 2001 and 2006, and a 10 per cent drop in people whose first language is Yiddish.

Going back even further, there has been a 20 per cent decline in native Yiddish speakers between 1996 and 2006, said Jack Jedwab, executive director of the ACS.

The obvious reason for Hebrew overtaking Yiddish is the accelerated attrition rate among elderly Yiddish-speaking Jews, Jedwab said, combined with rising immigration from Israel.

"Clearly, as these trends continue, Yiddish will be more part of Jewish folklore" than a meaningful currency in Jewish life, a regrettable if inevitable part of the Jewish future, he said.

"Yiddish will not be an important part of Jewish identity except at some sort of folkloric level, except maybe in chassidic communities," Jedwab added. "The critical mass is declining."

He noted that "Yiddish was once the third-most common language in Montreal. Now, in terms of the Jewish community in Canada, we see its inevitable decline, and it's a deep, deep decline. It's happening very fast."

The ACS-crunched numbers reveal that while Montreal in 2006 had about twice as many native Yiddish speakers as Hebrew speakers — 8,545 versus 4,320 — it's the exception to the rule.

Toronto, by comparison, had 10,245 people with Hebrew as their mother tongue, versus 6,520 for Yiddish.

"Montreal might be the only city in the world like that," Jedwab said, "except maybe Brooklyn. I haven't checked."

The most dramatic, even "shocking," figure for Jedwab was an almost 10,000 drop in the total number of Yiddish speakers — which encompasses "mother tongue" and "second-language" speakers — over the five years.

For all age cohorts, that figure plummeted from 37,010 to 27,605, or 25 per cent, while Hebrew speakers rose from 63,675 to 67,390. Yiddish speakers in Canada in the 65-and-over age group alone declined precipitously from 19,135 to 13,275 over the cited five-year period.

Jedwab praised educational institutions such as Montreal's Jewish People's and Peretz Schools (JPPS) and its affiliate, Bialik High School — one of two mainstream Jewish schools in Canada, along with Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto — for incorporating Yiddish into their core curricula.

He also rued the fact that once the current Yiddish-speaking generations die off, many Jews might never be exposed to the great works of Yiddish literature and culture.

No reason to change Quebec charter: CJC

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Appeasing fears over the practices of religious minorities is the wrong reason to change the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC), told the parliamentary commission holding consultations on a proposed law to amend the charter.

CJC says there is no need for the new legislation, Bill 63, which aims to reinforce women's rights, because gender equality is already adequately protected under the Quebec and Canadian charters.

CJC officials Adam Atlas and Michelle Serrano warned the government against tinkering with the province's supreme law in reaction to "fears" expressed by some Quebecers about religious expression in the public sphere.

CJC contends that amending the Quebec charter to include a clause expressly stating that the rights it contains are guaranteed equally for women and men will do little to improve the situation of women. Moreover, it may even have "negative consequences" for the primacy of the charter, it says. CJC is of the opinion that modifying the charter, especially in the face of a "political tempest," will have the effect of eroding its value as "a pillar of the Quebec identity."

THE COUNTERFEITERS

An epic tale of ultimate temptation during the Second World War, The Counterfeiters is based on a real-life story that recounts a diabolical Nazi plot that involved toppling foreign economies and fueling the German war effort with hoards of counterfeit pounds and dollars. The men forced to craft all that money were imprisoned Jews who were offered the chance to live the high life while their fellow prisoners starved. This is a first-rate piece of filmmaking that meshes plot with debate and is compelling and clever. Nominated for the 2008 Academy Awards® (Best Foreign Language Film).

Hospital must keep man on life support, judge rules

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — The family of an 84-year-old Orthodox Jew who is on life support has won the first round of a legal battle against doctors who tried to pull the plug on him some 2½ months ago.

In a Feb. 13 decision, Justice Perry Schulman of the Court of Queen's Bench granted an interim injunction that prevents doctors at Winnipeg's Grace Hospital from removing Samuel Golubchuk's life support, a move that would have hastened his death and thus violated his family's wishes and religious beliefs.

The injunction will remain in place until there is a full trial in the case. The family's lawyer, Neil Kravetsky, said that "Golubchuk's condition improved some weeks ago and since then, it is much the same. He is awake and is slowly being weaned off life support."

In November, the hospital took the position that Golubchuk had minimal brain function and that the decision to remove him from life support ought to be made solely by treating physicians, not the courts.

However, Schulman ruled that, on the contrary, in a situation where doctors make a decision to remove a patient's life support without the family's consent, there is a role for the courts to play in adjudicating the factual and legal issues in dispute.

Schulman ruled that since doctors are not infallible and can on occasion make mistakes, a patient's family has the right to seek redress through the court system. He said this is particularly appropriate when the family has not had the opportunity to get independent, third-party mediation. Schulman concluded that in this case, "there was no evidence" to suggest that medication was available or offered to the Golubchuk family.

A trial will involve the testimony of two medical experts, Dr. Daniel Rosenblatt, a critical care physician from New Jersey, and Dr. Leon Zacharowicz, a neurologist from New York. The two disputed the position of physicians from the hospital who said Golubchuk has minimal brain function.

In the meantime, until a full trial takes place, Schulman ruled that the hospital must provide Golubchuk with antibiotics, blood transfusions and CPR in the event that such a need arises.

"He [Golubchuk] is entitled to have full medical care as required until trial," Schulman said.

Schulman also ruled that a copy of his court order be attached to Golubchuk's medical chart to ensure that every doctor, nurse and health care worker properly abide by it.

Responding to the ruling, Golubchuk's son, Percy Golubchuk, told reporters, "This decision isn't just for my dad, but for every elderly or handicapped person. It's not just a decision for a Jewish person, but for everyone."

He added: "Doctors don't always know everything. God is the top doctor. Doctors are just his assistants."

A teary-eyed Miriam Geller, Golubchuk's daughter, said, "Our dad would be very proud of us."

The Winnipeg Regional Health Authority (WRHA), the agency that oversees the hospital, said in a statement that it's reviewing the case.

"We do want to say that decisions to withhold or withdraw life-sustaining treatments are never easy and not made lightly by medical experts," the WRHA said.

Golubchuk fell in June 2003 and suffered a brain injury, but he could still understand speech and communicate. Since then, he was being cared for in a nursing home, but he went to Grace Hospital emergency ward last October suffering from pulmonary hypertension and pneumonia.

In his ruling, Schulman said that if Golubchuk's death were to be hastened before a full trial, "no relief at trial could adequately compensate him or his family for the loss."

He added: "If the injunction is continued, the plaintiff may, during his lifetime, be afforded an opportunity to be heard fully on his legal, religious and charter positions."

Schulman said he wants to see the matter come to trial as quickly as possible.

Kravetsky said it's very possible the case won't go to trial quickly, because the hospital may decide to appeal Schulman's ruling to grant the interim injunction.

The appeal would be heard by the Manitoba Court of Appeal, and then ultimately the Supreme Court of Canada.

"In fact, it is possible that this case could get to the Supreme Court of Canada, before a full trial is ever held. This is a precedent-setting case," he said.

Kravetsky added that the case would go on even if Golubchuk were to die before a trial was held, "because we have filed a civil lawsuit for damages" based on the hospital's behaviour.

In his decision, Schulman said a patient has the right to be free from medical treatment to which he or she doesn't consent. He said that the removal of Golubchuk's life support would involve "an interaction" with his body, and would necessitate giving him narcotics when being taken off his ventilator.

Schulman said that the removal of a patient's life support without his consent violates the patient's right to have control over his bodily integrity.

However, Schulman said that Golubchuk's right to control his bodily integrity can be reasonably limited in a free and democratic society. An issue before the court at trial will be whether it's reasonable in this case for the hospital to limit Golubchuk's right to control his bodily integrity by removing his life support.

Living with a purpose

Finding your bliss is synonymous with living your life with purpose. And we are very blessed when we can find our bliss and do the things we love and are passionate about helping others and making the world a better place.

Life
Coach
Corner

Judy

will be successful at it. I don't think Mrs. Fields set out to have a multimillion-dollar company. She just loved making cookies and that's where it all began.

As a life coach, my greatest joy is to help other people find their bliss and watch people transform and be at their best, knowing they are living their dreams and goals, and ultimately fulfilling their purpose on this planet.

Our lives are often more blessed than we realize. Many of us sometimes feel as if we're on a treadmill, racing from one appointment to another. Our days are hectic and full of overflowing schedules – cooking, carpools, careers and demands on our time and energy, not to mention the joy and "busyness" of our families and the importance of nurturing our marriages. But there are often so many "to dos" on our list that the question of fulfilment and bliss gets lost in the shuffle.

And the question becomes, "Who has time for bliss, what is bliss anyway, and why is this so important?"

Bliss is a state of complete happiness, spiritual joy, deep fulfillment, and a sense of peace, enlightenment and even ecstasy. It is what we feel when we have learned the secrets of daily joy and fulfillment, and it is often the place we arrive at when we have found our purpose.

Each of us is born with a unique life purpose. We are all here for a reason, and we are all here to serve each other in some way. A life of purpose is not only a true expression of who we really are, it is our gift to the world.

When you are living your life "on purpose," you find greater satisfaction and joy. As author and motivational speaker Napoleon Hill says, "There is one quality that one must possess to win, and that is definiteness of purpose, the knowledge of what one wants and a burning desire to possess it."

I have a funny story to tell that illustrates this point. I tried for almost a year and a half to get my column, Life Coach Corner into The Canadian Jewish News. I was so passionate about writing about the secrets to a happier life, the power of kindness, how to get unstuck, how to tame your inner critic, how to find your passion and your purpose, that I was bursting to impart this information. I pitched the column to the editor of this paper. And from Jewish holiday to Jewish holiday, we would talk. He would say, "Let's talk again after Rosh Hashanah," or "It's looking good, let's talk after Pesach." And a year of holidays went by.

But my focus was so clear and my belief in what I wanted to do was so strong that I kept trying. Once I sent more than 75 story ideas and a sample column and finally he agreed to meet with me. After our meeting, which was a good one, it still wasn't finalized, but one day, I called him and said, "I have so many ideas and I think this is so important. We need good news and positive thinking in light of what's going on in the world. Please let me write one column and we'll take it from there."

He finally gave me the chance I had been waiting for. Truthfully, I think he finally said yes just so I would stop calling. But the point is, when you're passionate about doing something and you back it up with hard work, tenacity and joyfulness, you can't help but make things happen.

Thank you for helping me find my bliss.

From intern to associate producer: moving up at CBC

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Growing up in a household of CBC Radio enthusiasts, it comes as no surprise that Natalie Ruskin landed her first job out of Ryerson's School of Journalism alongside Canada's finest journalists and producers at the CBC.

"The idea of walking into the CBC building was unreal. I was so in awe, and I still am. It was a big deal for me to be here," said the 28-year-old.

In 1998, Natalie left her home in Toronto and moved to Montreal to attend McGill University, where she majored in cultural studies and minored in Jewish studies.

"I was really immersed in literary criticism and academic writing," she said.

But her academic interests quickly changed after spending her third year of university abroad at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"My orientation shifted, and I became really captivated by the news, the nuances of the relationship between Israelis and Muslims, Sephardics and Ashkenazis and all the segregation within that society and how they relate to one another," she said.

Ruskin returned to McGill to complete her fourth year with a newfound desire to comment and report on the world around her.

"I just thought, why am I writing about 18th-century novels and 19th-century mythology?"

Driven by this emerging interest, Ruskin put her skills to the test, enrolling in a small creative writing class. There she wrote Talmud and Tehina, a story about a girl who befriends an Arab spice seller during her daily visits to a Jerusalem market.

Ruskin's talent was recognized as she received the Chester Macnaghten Prize for the best creative writing by an undergraduate and the Lionel Shapiro Award for creative writing.

Upon completing her undergraduate degree, Ruskin returned home to live with her parents, Ronald and Marilyn, while studying journalism at Ryerson.

"I went to Ryerson thinking I was going to do print, and I became really interested in TV and images. There is a whole other level of creativity when you have video involved," she said.

From there Ruskin interned and later worked part-time at CBC Radio One's Metro Morning show, hosted by Andy Barrie.

"It was always daunting when I would meet a radio host I had listened to forever. They were like celebrities to me."

But it was her enterprising skills that left an impression on Barrie.

"If you don't ask, you don't get, and she got. She took the initiative to get out there."

She has great ideas and is very enthusiastic," Barrie said.

Benefiting from professional relationships and a little serendipity, Ruskin was presented with an exciting career opportunity. The executive producer of the national current affairs show, The Hour, with George Stroumboulopoulos, was looking for an editorial assistant. Ruskin joined the show in April 2005, straight out of school, and grew with it for three seasons.

"It was the best thing for my career," she said.

With The Hour under her belt, Ruskin was in search of a new challenge that would allow her to gain more practical experience. Again, CBC offered her an irresistible opportunity. She was hired as the associate producer for Fortune Hunters, a television program that premiered on Jan. 12.

"When you are working on a small show like this, you have the opportunity to do everything. I get to go into the field with a camera person and grab footage, screen and edit the tape and find guests to profile," she said.

Fortune Hunters, which airs Saturdays at 6:30 p.m., explores the latest money-making trends and introduces viewers to those who are cashing in on them. Hosted by Dianne Buckner, who also hosts the CBC television shows Dragons' Den and Venture, Fortune Hunters introduces viewers to a trend for the week, which business experts analyze and assess for its visibility.

The final segment, "My First Million," profiles celebrities of the business world, focusing on their secrets to success. The episode's guests include Herschel Segal of Le Chateau, a clothing company.

"It's so important to have the right team when you're starting up a brand-new show," Buckner said.

"We knew ahead of time that we were going to have a very small production team, and that we would be counting on every single member of the team to come through in a big way. And Natalie has really done that. She is naturally creative, and because of her experience at The Hour, she was able to step right in and contribute so much."

Ruskin is particularly proud that she encouraged Wallace McCain, a co-founder of McCain Foods Ltd., to guest star on the "Easy Eating" episode.

Lindsey Neely, Natalie Ruskin, Dianne Buckner and James Dunne make up the Fortune Hunters team.

"He is very media shy, but I convinced him to do it, and he was fantastic. He was a delight," she said.

In addition to appreciating her professional skills, the team at Fortune Hunters enjoys Ruskin's sense of humour, which, she said, she gets from her mother.

"My mother's sense of humour had a big influence on me being outgoing and drawn towards this drama aspect of television," she said, also crediting her father's ingenuity for helping her and her two sisters, Joelle and Danielle, to develop their creative sides.

Despite differences over Iran, Germany and Israel plan closer ties

BY TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — Germany and Israel may agree that Iran's development of nuclear weapons would be dangerous, but meetings last week in Berlin highlighted the significant differences between the leaders of the two countries on how to stop the Islamic Republic from getting there.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel supports sanctions and diplomacy, while Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert says all options — including the use of force — are open.

"It is very important to use diplomatic means," Olmert said, but Israel would consider using other options if diplomacy fails.

Iran is likely to be a central issue at an unprecedented bilateral cabinet meeting between ministers of the two countries scheduled for March 17 in Jerusalem.

Despite the differences over Iran, the joint cabinet meeting underscores the strong links between Germany and Israel. Merkel said she wants to make the meeting an annual tradition.

Among the German officials who will accompany Merkel on next month's trip to Israel is Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, a vociferous opponent of the use of force against Iran.

Aside from Iran, Middle East peacemaking and German-Israeli ties, all of which Olmert and Merkel discussed last week in Berlin, the March meeting will address youth exchange programs and scientific co-operation.

Gerd Weisskirchen, the foreign policy speaker of the Social Democratic Party parliamentary faction and one of several legislators who met with Olmert during his three-day visit to Berlin, said the March meeting will be more than just a superficial display marking Israel's 60th birthday.

The joint meeting is "the beginning of a real new development, making the German-Israeli relationship much deeper than before," he said.

Deidre Berger, the managing director of the American Jewish Committee's Berlin office, said the decision to hold a joint cabinet meeting is "extremely positive."

"It helps make more public the unique relationship that Israel and Germany have," Berger told JTA. It "shows the importance to which Germany, one of the leading countries in the European Union, accords this relationship."

"It will help strengthen Israel's position with other EU countries. And I think it can help close the gap between the good relations at an official level and the sometimes strained perceptions in the general public about that relationship."

Weisskirchen said Germans, even if they don't endorse force, must understand Israel's position on its use against Iran, whose president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has threatened to destroy the Jewish state.

"This is the state that would be wiped out by Ahmadinejad," he said.

A 2007 survey by the Bertelsmann Foundation found that 80 per cent of Israelis believe there are situations in which the use of force is necessary, while 58 per cent of Germans disagreed. The survey found that 62 per cent of Germans polled believe Iran poses an existential threat to Israel.

Stephan Vopel, a senior expert on German-Israeli relations for the Bertelsmann Foundation, said the Israel-Germany relationship no longer is informed only by a sense of guilt and responsibility about the Holocaust.

German Chancellor
Angela Merkel

The past "shapes our political outlook in both countries," said Vopel, who coordinates the foundation's German-Israeli young leadership exchanges and annual German-Jewish dialogue, but "one has to be free of the past in a certain way."

"On the Israeli side, you have to look at the positive aspects of the past" and not only at victimhood, Vopel said. "On the German side, you have to see that pacifism is not the major lesson of the past. You can see through history that sometimes you do have to use military force to combat a bigger evil."

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. They should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 14. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Submissions will not be returned. The CJN will not enter into any correspondence with participants.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2008 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 29, 2008. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 2008.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 20, 2008. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel can handle Hezbollah threat, Livni says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — As Israel went on high alert and warned its citizens of kidnap threats abroad, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said last Thursday that Israel is capable of handling the threat posed by Hezbollah following the assassination of its deputy leader on Feb. 12.

"Israel has been under threat since the day it was established, and we know how to handle these threats and will do so now as well," Livni said during a brief visit to Washington.

"Israel's response to terrorism is clear. Israel is a strong country, the Jewish people are a strong people, and statements by one terrorist or another won't change that or send us into panic," she said.

"Hezbollah is a terrorist organization, it has committed terrorism in the past, and it is trying to carry out terrorist attacks all the time," Livni concluded.

Israel's Counter-Terrorism Bureau issued a travel advisory to all Israeli citizens travelling abroad over grave concerns that Hezbollah will attempt to launch terror attacks or abductions, as Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah vowed to retaliate against Israeli targets for the Feb. 12 assassination of Imad Mughniyah. No one has claimed responsibility for the killing, but Hezbollah and its allies Iran and Syria were quick to blame Israel.

Mughniyah was killed when a car exploded in an upscale Damascus neighbourhood in an incident that was not only a blow to Hezbollah, but also to Syria's much-vaunted internal security services.

Israel also ordered its military and embassies to go on alert last week, and advised Jewish institutions worldwide to follow suit. The United States has also raised its level of alert regarding Jewish institutions.

The slain Hezbollah deputy secretary general was wanted by Israel and the United States for terrorism against Americans, Israelis and Jews, among others, throughout the 1980s and 1990s.

Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi instructed forces to take the necessary precautions by air, land and sea in order to protect the northern border and other Israeli interests, the army said.

The military sent more troops to the already heavily patrolled northern border with Lebanon, defence officials said, without elaborating. Soldiers were ordered to be on guard for attacks on both the border with Lebanon and in the Palestinian territories.

"Hezbollah is accusing Israel again and again in the death of Mughniyah. Therefore, the danger of Hezbollah carrying out terror attacks against Israeli targets abroad is escalating," said a statement from the Prime Minister's Office.

The Counter-Terrorism Bureau also issued travel warnings against travelling in places abroad where there are high concentrations of Israelis, especially at tourist attractions.

The bureau advised Israelis travelling abroad to be especially alert and pay attention to any abnormal occurrences. It also advised Israelis to avoid travelling to any Arab or Muslim nation for which a travel advisory has already been issued. Finally, the bureau stressed that Israelis should resist any seemingly tempting opportunity originating from an unknown source abroad, and refuse any unexpected gifts.

Also last week, the FBI put its domestic terror squads on the alert for any threats against synagogues and other potential Jewish targets in the United States in the wake of Mughniyah's killing.

Unlike many Middle Eastern leaders whose speeches are riddled with idle threats, Nasrallah is known for delivering on his promises. In 2006, he promised to take action to free Lebanese prisoners in Israel, and in July that year, Hezbollah guerrillas staged a cross-border raid in which it snatched two IDF soldiers and left three others dead.

The incident triggered a 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah, devastating south Lebanon. It ended with the Israeli soldiers still captive, and no deal for a prisoner swap has yet been reached.

In related developments, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki met in Damascus last Friday with the leaders of two radical Palestinian groups, members of the Iranian delegation said.

Mottaki held separate meetings at the Iranian Embassy with Damascus-based Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal and Islamic Jihad chief Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, the Iranian officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to talk to the media.

Later in the day, Mottaki held a one-hour meeting with Syrian Vice-President Farouk al-Sharaa to discuss Mughniyah's assassination.

"We discussed the terrorist crime that led to the martyrdom of one of the most senior commanders in the Lebanese Islamic Resistance (Hezbollah), martyr Imad Mughniyah," Mottaki told reporters after his meeting with al-Sharaa.

Mottaki also discussed Mughniyah's death with Syrian President Bashar Assad on Thursday.

Mottaki flew to Damascus on Thursday from Lebanon, where he attended Mughniyah's funeral and offered condolences to the man's family and associates. Underlining Iran's close ties to Shiite Hezbollah, Mottaki sat between Mughniyah's father and a senior Hezbollah official.

Meanwhile, the Iranian defence ministry said Feb. 15 that a team of investigators from Iran and Syria will investigate Mughniyah's killing.

Iran's deputy foreign minister, Ali Raza Sheikh Attar, speaking during Friday prayers, said the team would investigate the circumstances surrounding the car bombing in Damascus, in order to "discover the identities of those who carried out this filthy crime."

A Lebanese security source on Friday said the investigation into the assassination showed that Mughniyah was killed by a car bomb parked close to his car. It was detonated remotely as he walked past after leaving a building he had been visiting. Early reports said the bomb had been placed inside his car.

The suspects arrested in connection with the killing have been mostly Palestinians residing in Syria, the Lebanese source said.

Also Friday, the Hezbollah-affiliated Lebanese newspaper Al-Akhar reported that investigators from the organization would also launch a probe into the incident. According to the report, there has been progress in the investigation.

"Syrian security forces are continuing investigations into this terrorist crime and we hope you will hear results soon," Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem said at a press conference with Mottaki on Feb. 14. "We as a state will show with full proof the party involved in this crime and who stands behind them."

Moallem described Mughniyah's killing as a blow to peace. He said his killers "assassinated any attempt to revive the peace process," hinting for the first time that Israel might be involved.

France quits European Jewish Congress

By DINAH SPRITZER
JTA

PARIS — As participants at this week's European Jewish Congress General Assembly talked about the need to collectively combat increasing anti-Semitism in Europe and the threat of a nuclear-armed Iran, French Jewish leaders led a three-country rebellion against the 42-member group.

Richard Prasquier, the president of the CRIF umbrella organization of French Jewry, announced on Feb. 10 that CRIF was suspending its membership in the congress after delegates voted 51-34 to approve the extension of European Jewish Congress (EJC) executive board terms to four years from two.

That gives the EJC president, Russian-born mogul Moshe Kantor, two years beyond the term to which he was elected.

Denouncing the vote Prasquier, along with leaders of the Austria and Portugal Jewish communities, said he could not be part of an "unethical" organization that "retroactively" enabled Kantor and the board to serve until 2011 when they were elected last June to terms that end in 2009.

The moves by France, Portugal and Austria are part of a long-simmering battle over control of the EJC between some of the western European nations involved in founding the congress and the Russian president who now controls it.

The three delegations have been at odds with Kantor since he defeated French incumbent Pierre Besnainou to become the first eastern European president of the EJC, a subsidiary of the World Jewish Congress.

Florence Kaufmann, an EJC board member from Britain, said some western European Jewish leaders simply "have a problem with the EJC being run from the east."

She added, "Britain is not one of them."

Kantor told JTA the French delegates could not stand not being in charge of an organization they long had dominated. The French were founding members of the EJC 20 years ago and frequently have been at its helm.

"This suspension was planned," Kantor said. "It comes as no surprise and it was intended to send disunity in the organization. This is really a bad idea when we need to be focusing on fighting anti-Semitism and Iran's efforts to develop nuclear weapons."

Supporters of the term extension said the move will enable EJC officials to devote more time to core congress projects, including lobbying European governments on Israel's behalf and improving Jewish and Holocaust education programs.

Joel Rubinfeld, the president of the Belgian Jewish umbrella group CCOJB, said the French walkout was disappointing.

"I did not support the extension of term limits, but you don't just leave an organization because you do not like the vote results," he said. "That means you don't accept democracy, and we have some important work ahead of us — we should be unified."

CRIF member Albert Cohen said he approved of France's withdrawal from the EJC.

"Why should French Jewish interests be represented by Russia?" he asked.

Kantor said he would try to bring the Jewish leaders of the three countries back to the EJC in the coming weeks.

With some 600,000 Jews, France has western Europe's largest Jewish population and a strong influence on European politicians when it comes to matters of Jewish concern.

A Jewish leader from one of the three countries that suspended its EJC membership confirmed rumours that the three departing countries would try to set up a parallel Jewish organization that would exclude Russia and include only the 27 members of the European Union.

Doctors head to Tanzania

A six-person medical team of Israeli and Palestinian doctors and nurses on Friday went on a week-long mission to Zanzibar and Tanzania to screen hundreds of children in need of life-saving heart surgery. The team, part of the Israeli aid group Save a Child's Heart, will hold a cardiology clinic in Zanzibar from Feb. 16 to 18, where close to 200 children will be checked.

Israel Briefs

Heard the story from his father, later confirmed it with Teddy Kollek, the late Jerusalem mayor. According to the account, which Greenspun said he was making public for the first time, Kollek — who, in 1948 was Israel's point man heading the arms smuggling effort in New York — got to know the singer.

Kollek needed to pay the captain of a ship a cash bribe to smuggle the weapons out of New York harbour, but knew he was being watched by the FBI, because the United States was party to an arms embargo of all parties to the conflict. Kollek left the hotel on the appointed day carrying a satchel, and was followed by the agents. Sinatra left through another entrance with a paper bag containing the money and paid the captain. Sinatra and Kollek remained friends and the singer contributed to a number of Jerusalem building projects at the mayor's behest.

Small quake hits Israel

An earthquake measuring 5.3 on the Richter scale shook Israel early last Friday afternoon. It was felt mostly on the coastal plain. No damage or injuries were reported.

Fleeing Sudan for Israel

Some 123 Sudanese refugees entered Israel early last Friday morning through the border with Egypt, near the Gaza Strip. An Israeli Defence Forces spokesperson told Ha'aretz: the refugees entered Israel in small groups at different locations along the frontier. Over the last four months, some 2,800 asylum seekers have entered Israel.

Poverty rises in Israel

According to the National Insurance Institute's semi-annual poverty report released last week, 1,674,800 Israelis were living under the poverty line in 2007 — 24.7 per cent of the population, an increase of some 20,000 people over 2006. In mid-2006, the number was 24.4 per cent and rose to 24.5 per cent at the end of 2006. The number of children living in poverty reached 804,000; or 35.9 per cent of all Israeli children. A year ago, the figure was 35.2 per cent, and 35.8 per cent six months ago.

Sinatra helped run guns

Singer Frank Sinatra reportedly played a role in smuggling guns to Israel in 1948. Brian Greenspun, a son of Hank Greenspun, the Las Vegas media and real estate magnate who helped lead the gun smuggling effort, related the account last week to a Washington fundraising dinner for Israel's Rabin Center, which promotes democracy and pluralism. Greenspun, who

Ha'aretz replaces editor

David Landau is being replaced as editor-in-chief of Israel's daily Ha'aretz. Landau, who has been editor for the last four years, is being replaced by Dov Alfon, a former senior editor. Alfon will assume the post on April 15, while Landau will stay on as a member of the paper's editorial board. Ha'aretz publisher Amos Schocken said Landau became editor during an uneasy period for the newspaper and its editorial staff, and succeeded in expressing Ha'aretz's commitment to the values of practical Zionism, the newspaper said. The move came after recent revelations that Landau told U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza at a private dinner last fall that Israel is a "failed state" and that it "wants to be raped" by the United States in order to force it into a peace deal. Alfon, 46, joined Ha'aretz in 1989 and started the paper's cultural "Gallery" section, edited its weekend magazine, served as Paris correspondent and was the senior editor of Ha'aretz's business publication, The Marker, before leaving the paper in 2004 to become editor-in-chief of the publishing house Kinneret. Peace deal 'absolutely possible', Sarkozy says from certain states and numerous NGOs that turned the conference into a forum against Israel, and no one has forgotten," Sarkozy said.

"France will not allow a repetition of the excesses and abuses of 2001. Our European partners share France's concerns. France will chair the EU in the final months preceding the review conference. I say to you: if ever our legitimate demands are not taken into account, we will disengage from the process."

In his remarks, made to a crowd of more than 1,000 leading French Jews, as well as politicians from the political right and left, Sarkozy spoke of the indispensable place of French Jewry in French society; said 2008 would be a crucial year for French-Israeli reconciliation and promised to play a leading role in helping Palestinians and Israelis reach a peace deal, which he called "absolutely possible."

"I think it's going to be a landmark year," Israel's ambassador to France, Daniel Shek, said after the speech. "We used to be very close to France until 1967, so this is a real renovation, which is very exciting to experience."

The president's appearance came as his approval rating among the French has dropped some 20 points since September, to 39 per cent — due in large part to France's sluggish economy and revelations about Sarkozy's personal life, including his recent marriage to model Carla Bruni.

But Sarkozy found a warm reception at the CRIF dinner. French Jews overwhelmingly supported Sarkozy's candidacy for president, and many say he is a true friend of Jews and Israel.

"It's the first time that a president of the republic has come here in person, and it shows how important it is to him," said Claude Hampel, editor of Cahiers Bernard Lazare, a Jewish periodical. "It shows that the Jewish community is an integral part of the French nation."

Sarkozy described the evening as significant to him as well, and the start of a busy year in French-Israeli relations.

Israeli President Shimon Peres is scheduled to visit Paris on an official state visit March 10-14, and Sarkozy is expected to go to Jerusalem in May to celebrate Israel's 60th anniversary. In July, France will take over the EU presidency, which Sarkozy said could have major implications for Israel's future.

The president also spoke of the need to maintain dialogue and trade ties with Arab states, saying he sees "absolutely no contradiction" between this policy and a steadfast friendship with Israel, arguing that this gives France broader influence in the Middle East to push for peace.

Yet Sarkozy drew a line when it came to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. "I will not meet with or shake hands with people who refuse to recognize Israel's right to exist," he said.

Sarkozy also talked about anti-Semitism in France, pledging to combat it through original educational measures, including a proposal to have every 10- or 11-year-old in the country "entrusted" with the profile of a French Jewish child killed during the Holocaust. Sarkozy's maternal grandfather was a Greek Jew.

"I'm very touched and interested," Ariel Goldmann, CRIF's vice-president, said of the elementary school memorial initiative. "I think it's a magnificent idea, and that it will last."

While the crowd mostly had praise for Sarkozy's remarks, his comments about the compatibility of religious and secular values struck some as striking the wrong chord, while others said they found them comforting.

In another one of his attempts to open up the delicate debate in France over introducing aspects of religion into French culture, Sarkozy said, "The drama of the 20th century, the millions of beings thrown into war, famine, separation, deportation and death, were not born from an excess of the idea of God, but of its fearsome absence."

Sometimes sounding more pastor than politician, Sarkozy said of the Bible: "Never again, after the Torah, never again has man been able to speak about God the way he was able to in the past."

Alain Bellassen, president of the southeastern section of the CRIF, said he was thrilled to hear a politician talk about spirituality, and to listen to Sarkozy's heartfelt contemplations about Judaism.

This is the kind of discussion France's 600,000 Jews need more of, in order to heal the wounds caused by nearly a decade of renewed anti-Semitism here, Bellassen said.

Jean-Michel Quillardet, head of the Grand Orient of France, an organization that stridently defends French secularism, said Sarkozy's remarks were at odds with French culture.

"This is the first time that a French president talks this much about God. That's his affair, if you will, his personal conviction, but it's a little like the U.S. in the end, and we are not in the U.S., we are in France, with the great tradition of French enlightenment," he said. "So I'm very dubious and a little worried."

Kosher cooking contest winners to compete in finals

By JUDY
BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

"While the other kids were playing house, I was playing restaurant," Evan Levy of Danville, Calif., recalled. He was one of the semifinalists in the Second Annual Simply Manischewitz Cook-Off western regional competition held Dec. 20 at the Hilton Hotel in San Francisco.

Lucky me – I was one of the judges! "I started very young – I went to Mom's cooking school," Levy said. "My mother went back to work when I was in the 10th grade. I made myself in charge of dinner. I have two sisters and a brother, but I was the one with the fewest activities, so I did the cooking."

Even today Levy mans the kitchen. "My wife is a wonderful cook," he said, "but she says she's better off doing the dishes!"

Three semifinal events were held in Chicago, Philadelphia and San Francisco. Ten contestants in each area, selected from thousands of entrants, had one hour to prepare and serve their original recipes, each using at least one Manischewitz product and containing no more than eight ingredients.

Levy's Southwestern Potato Kugel was one of two winning entries, garnering him a free trip to New York for the finals to be held on Feb. 27. After that date, go to www.manischewitz.com to see the grand prize winner, who will take home a $25,000 prize package, including a GE Profile kitchen, cash and more.

Black beans, green chilies, corn, cheese, chili powder – all mixed with Manischewitz Potato Kugel Mix. This is a kugel with pizzazz! Though more of a pilaf than a kugel, it makes a unique and tasty side dish.

I asked Levy what inspired him to create the dish. "Potato kugel has always been a comfort food for my family," he said. "I wanted to update it, make a new and improved version."

Over 200 onlookers attended the event, free to the public, which included a kosher lunch and a first-hand look at the contestants as they donned their aprons and used their allotted hour to produce their dishes and wow the judges.

"I thought it was really fun," Levy said, "especially the reactions from these elderly ladies surrounding me. They couldn't believe black beans could be in a kugel!"

The other winning semifinalist was Julie Hession of Las Vegas, for her Rib Eye Steak with Marsala Mushroom Sauce.

"This is the first cooking contest I ever entered," she said. "I cook all the time – it's my passion! If my friends need help with a recipe, they come to me."

Early in the competition, Hession was thrown a curve, but handled it with finesse. "The original recipe called for tenderloin steaks, but the kosher butcher sent these huge rib eyes," she recalled. "No problem. The recipe is so simple and versatile, you can interchange any cut of steak. You can even use it for chicken or fish."

The rib eyes worked well, she said. "I've cooked with rib eyes before. They've got a little bit more marbling. I knew they were going to have to sit for the judging, so it worked to my benefit. I looked at it as a very real world experience. You have to roll with the punches when you don't get what you need. Sometimes the best results come from improvising."

There was a real sense of camaraderie among the contestants, Hession noted. "Everyone wanted to win, but we were all very supportive of each other. I had so much fun. It was definitely an adrenaline rush competing doing something you love to do."

Brian Malarky, one of this season's finalists on Bravo TV's Top Chef series, served as MC. This chef-owner of Oceanaire Seafood Room in the Gaslamp district of San Diego worked the room, questioning the chefs and the judges, who were served the entries according to the kosher laws: dairy dishes first, then pareve and finally meat, all on paper plates with new plastic utensils provided for each dish.

"This is the largest kosher competition in the country," said David Rossi, vice-president of marketing for Manischewitz and the RAB Food Group. "We have the highest level of kashrut happening here."

All ingredients, utensils and equipment were provided to the contestants under strict rabbinical supervision, including kashered GE ranges.

Besides the two winning entries, other dishes included San Francisco Salmon Cakes, Easy Matzo Ball Dumplings Stuffed with Portobello Mushrooms, Crusted White Fish, Dapper Red Snapper Parchment Paper Packets, Raspberry Glazed Tilapia, Poblano Stuffed Chicken, Lamb Chops with Twist of Rosemary, and Grilled Lamb Kebabs with Apricot-Hoisin Glaze.

Sword-and-sorcery tale steeped in Jewish lore

Gentlemen of the Road by Michael Chabon, Bond Street Books.

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

In the afterword to his latest novel, Gentlemen of the Road, Michael Chabon reveals that he had originally wanted to title the book Jews with Swords, if only to dispel the Woody Allen nebbish stereotype that so many readers, Jewish or non-Jewish, might hold in regard to the book's subject matter.

His main point is that, whether perceived as Jews with swords or not, the Jewish experience throughout the ages — from exile and displacement through persecution and destruction to a return to Zion with the creation of the modern State of Israel — is a long adventure on par with any complex sword-and-sorcery epic you can imagine.

In that light, Chabon, who is clearly carving out a career on refracting Jewish themes and characters through unlikely and unconventional lights, is the right man to pen a kosher sword-and-sorcery tale that, though influenced by many others, shines in its own unique way.

Beautifully illustrated, Gentlemen of the Road tells the story of two unlikely buddies, circa 950 CE, a Frankish (German) Jewish physician named Zelikman and Amram, an Abyssinian (Ethiopian) Jewish ex-soldier, who survive by working as con artists and, sometimes, as hired thieves and muscle. Their latest con, which pits them in a supposed battle to the death over a perceived insult, with the innkeeper collecting bets that he later splits with the duo, takes a different turn when Zelikman and Amram cross paths with a spoiled young man, who turns out to be a Khazar prince, whose family has been wiped out by a pretender to the kingdom's throne.

Reluctantly, our intrepid pair gets caught up in the historical pageant of the time, whose results have a life-changing effect, particularly on Zelikman, whose mysterious past is slowly, intriguingly, unveiled.

Gentlemen of the Road is a nod to fantasy writer Michael Moorcock, to whom the book is dedicated, and also to the late Fritz Leiber, whose gritty Fafhrd and the Gray Mouser books are a clear template for this adventure tale. The novel succeeds mostly because of its use of the compelling and legendary Khazar backdrop.

The Khazars, a semi-nomadic Turkic people who converted to Judaism about 1,200 years ago, likely to avoid having to choose sides between the Christian and Muslim powers who were pressuring them, remain one of the more intriguing side stories in Jewish history. It's an inspired move for Chabon to base a novel on their true-life actions.

He's less satisfying with his portraits of Zelikman and Amram, not because you don't believe their relationship — you do — but because they're so sketchily depicted. The novel, which was initially published in 15 serialized chapters in The New York Times Magazine, is, after all, less than 200 pages long and could easily have used an additional 50 pages to flesh out its rather slight story.

Still, Gentlemen of the Road is a fun read that is steeped in Jewish lore. From Hillel, Zelikman's beloved horse, and Hanukkah, the inept soldier of fortune the duo take along for the ride, to the fatalistic approach Zelikman and Amram bring to their battles, Gentlemen of the Road abounds with Jewish references. Clearly, Chabon has become the go-to guy for unusual depictions of Jewish characters and situations.

He's not the first genre writer to trade on his Jewish background and knowledge — Robert Silverberg and the late Avram Davidson come immediately to mind — but he's doing it more consistently and fascinatingly than anyone else. Be it the Golem legend addressed in his remarkable The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay; the Holocaust theme woven through his fine Sherlock Holmes-type novella, The Final Solution; the alternate Jewish state at the heart of the imaginative The Yiddish Policemen's Union; and even the seder scene in the touching Wonder Boys, Chabon seems determined to wring new variations out of the Jewish themes and portraits created by senior writers such as Mordecai Richler and Philip Roth.

It helps, of course, that Chabon's such a good, descriptive writer, but it's the thoughtful books and stories in which he puts his immense writing skills to use, that are allowing him to stand out from the pack.

Chaim's Love Song opens at Leah Posluns

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The C.J.N.

When audiences watch and listen to Chaim Shotsky share the stories of his life, they will instinctively relate to him, says Ari Weisberg, director of Chaim's Love Song.

"Everybody can identify with this man," Weisberg says.

"His humour, his wittiness and his friendships will remind people of who they are or someone they know."

Chaim's Love Song, produced by Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre, will be performed at the Leah Posluns Theatre from Feb. 27 to March 9.

A dramatic comedy penned by Marvin Cherno, the play centres on the experiences of Shotsky, a retired mailman in Brooklyn who, like the famed character Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof, speaks to God and philosophizes, all with a twist of humour.

*Retired mailman

As Shotsky chats in the park recalling various events from his life, the play harkens back to those moments in time with touching vignettes.

"The play is intimate and touching, but it is also funny," Weisberg says.

"I think what people will take home from it is that after all the challenges and debates Chaim has with the other characters, he still comes back to tradition. The message is that without being grounded by tradition, you will drift away."

Shotsky is played by Irving Dobbs, who appeared in the movie Rock Garden, which recently won the Global Audience Award for best short film at the Slamdance Film Festival.

Teatron was founded by Weisberg in 2002 with the aim of "unveiling the treasures of Jewish tradition, enriching and inspiring the Jewish experience of all theatergoers, [while] leading to better understanding and harmony."

"We are dedicated to [producing] plays that have major Jewish challenges or history," says Weisberg, who moved to Canada from Israel in 1976.

"This is what is close to my heart, and I think we have found there is a demand for these kinds of productions."

Now in its fifth season, Teatron has put on a diverse array of productions, including This Night, The Chosen, The Sisters Rosensweig and The God of Isaac.

As the Leah Posluns Theatre will soon be undergoing renovations, Teatron performances will be moving to the Toronto Centre for the Arts in 2010.

"There is nothing better to me than live theatre," says the father of three.

"The live audiences, real actors on stage, and the fact you can really work on a character's evolution evening after evening is what attracts me to it."

Following Chaim's Love Song, Weisberg is looking to bring a play originally performed in Yiddish to the stage, as well as an Israel-themed production to celebrate Israel's 60th anniversary.

Oscar gift baskets include ex-Torontonian's sculptures

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The C/IN

Not everyone will walk away with an Oscar this weekend at the annual Academy Awards extravaganza.

But those nominated and not ultimately selected for an Oscar will get a gift basket, and in it, a colourful box containing the work of Vancouver ceramic sculptor Suzy Birstein, 56

Birstein, an artist and teacher who left Toronto's Bathurst Manor for Kitsilano in 1976, got her work into the Oscars' gift basket because Kristina Estlund of Distinctive Assets, a Los Angeles firm that assembles gift baskets for celebrity events, discovered her through the Internet. Estlund found Birstein's work while searching for Mexican pottery, for a gift basket for the Grammy Awards

"I fell in love with Suzy's work," Estlund says. "Her art is just stunning, and she's a very creative, cool and awesome individual."

"Kristina gave me carte blanche as to what I wanted to make for the Oscar gift baskets," says Birstein, who came up with the series Motion Pitchers, ceramic artwork designed to resemble a pitcher.

This is the first time Distinctive Assets is including ceramic items in its gift baskets. Concerns about possible breakage were alleviated when Birstein came up with a tube package secured with thick bubble wrap that would protect her sculptures until their hand-delivery to the residences of the non-winning nominees. "Everyone who doesn't win an Oscar gets a Suzy," she quips.

Birstein, the only artist whose work has been selected for inclusion in the baskets, made a total of 38 sculptures for the event, 21 of them for the nominees in the top categories and 17 for selected media.

"This is amazing exposure that I would never be able to get ordinarily," she says. She is already feeling the effects of that exposure; she has received an offer from the Jonathan Bancroft-Snell Gallery in London, Ont., to show her work.

Birstein is enclosing a DVD containing a slide show of her work in every gift package.

A graduate of the Emily Carr School of Art in 1980, she cites Chagall as a key influence. She has focused on creating sculpture and tableware, in-between raising two sons and teaching from her home studio and at Granville Island's Arts Umbrella for the past 18 years.

COEN BROTHERS TO FILM CHABON'S YIDDISH POLICEMEN'S UNION

Michael Chabon, Pulitzer Prize-winning author of The Yiddish Policemen's Union, has expressed jubilation that Joel and Ethan Coen, the maverick American filmmaking duo whose most recent film is No Country For Old Men, have agreed to write and direct a film adaptation of the 2007 bestseller.

"Naturally, I am over the moon about this," Chabon told JTA last week. "They are heroes of mine."

Set in Sitka, a fictional Yiddish semi-state in Alaska established after Israel supposedly lost its war of independence in 1948-49, The Yiddish Policemen's Union overlays a noirish crime novel overtop the geopolitical fantasy that a region of Alaska was set aside as a homeland for the Jews.

"Richly conceived and phenomenally detailed, Chabon's Sitka is home to just the sort of improbable characters that populate Coen brothers films," critic Ben Harris noted. But according to JTA, the novel has its critics, among them Yiddish scholar Ruth Wisse, who has decried its unmistakable anti-Zionist tone.

Other Jewish critics have noted the book's many negative Jewish characters, including dope addicts, pimps and prostitutes.

No Country For Old Men, meanwhile, is up for eight Oscars. Other films by the Coen brothers include Fargo, Raising Arizona and The Big Lebowski.

Film examines plight of displaced Israeli settlers

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

In August 2005, thousands of journalists from Israel and around the world descended on the Gaza Strip to cover the controversial disengagement of settlers.

The same happened five months later in January 2006 when settlers were removed from the Amona settlement in the West Bank.

But since then the media have moved on. Whatever happened to these settlers? Where are they now? And, more importantly, why don't the media — Israeli or international — care about them?

These are some of the questions Toronto-based documentary filmmaker Igal Hecht examines in his latest film Banished, airing on Crossroads Television Feb. 24 at 9 p.m.

Banished is the latest in Hecht's trilogy on the disengagement, which began with Qassam (2004) and was followed by Disengagement Democracy (2006).

Hecht and his crew travel to Nitzan, where the majority of those evacuated are currently living. From afar, the settlement looks like a lovely suburban subdivision, but up close you are stuck with the reality of a shantytown.

Yehudit Damari, a young film student at Sapir College in Sderot, is one of those uprooted and has been documenting her experiences since two years before the disengagement. She shows us her tiny portable home, complete with cracks on the walls, and a hole she covered with duct tape to prevent rats from coming in.

"All these years we [settlers] were the 'obstacle to peace.' And we had to pay the price for there to be peace. Now that we've paid, will there will be peace? Oh come on!" she says dejectedly.

Many of the disengaged settlers have become despondent and have lost their faith both in democracy and their spirituality. Many people, especially those in their 50s, have not been able to find work.

A settler, Laurence Bezit, takes us on a tour of the Nitzan settlement — originally meant to be only a temporary home — and points out its shortcomings. "It was very hard for many families in the beginning," she says, adding that there was no convenience store or bus stations. "It looks like a refugee camp. We feel like refugees. We don't belong to any place right now."

This sentiment is echoed by Benny, the founder of Chomesh, a settlement built 25 years ago and one of those torn down during the disengagement.

"I feel like a refugee, unwanted. Here I was a somebody," he says, surveying the rubble of the former settlement. "How can a 55-year-old start over again. I haven't worked a day since I left, and no one is helping us."

Despite a promise by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to act swiftly, the settler issue seems to have been swept under the rug.

Many of the settlers believe that the media have purposefully ignored their post-disengagement plight.

The senior news editor for Israel's Channel One agrees. "The media covered them intensively during the disengagement and forgot them the next day," he says candidly. "It has ignored their existence as if the ground swallowed them whole."

He believes that covering the post-disengagement is not a ratings booster and that most Israelis believe that whatever happens to the former Gaza residents is not their problem.

Produced by Chutzpa Productions, Banished is an engaging look at these forgotten people and a strong criticism of the news media and their disinterest in following up their own stories.

It is directed and produced by Hecht and co-written with Lior Cohen.

Degrassi actor branches out into movies

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The C.J.N.

This season we can be sure Lauren Collins character on Degrassi: The Next Generation will reach new heights. After all, we can't expect less from the creators of the award-winning series, which has been pushing boundaries for seven years. Collins plays Paige Michalchuk on the hit show that evolved from Degrassi Junior High, a 1980s series about Toronto teens coping with social issues.

Degrassi: The Next Generation, co-created and produced by Epitome Productions' Linda Schuyler (one of Degrassi Junior High's creators), features story lines that include subjects such as abortion, school shootings, drugs and date rape — topics rarely covered on shows aimed at teens and tweens.

Many of these issues have touched Collins' character, Paige, who was a brash 14-year-old when the series began in 2001. "Paige has certainly gone through a lot," Collins, 21, says. "In season one, she started off as a great character, but very two-dimensional — she got in the way of everyone else's life and was only thinking about herself. In season two, the rape story line started, and that obviously affected her deeply."

"For an actor my age and when I was younger, to have the opportunity to deal with this kind of material is a blessing. Usually, what's available for youth actors is Disney fare. I've done that and I loved it, but this is acting — it's really challenging and ground-breaking. It makes waves everywhere," says the versatile actress who puts in 13- to 14-hour days when she's on the set.

While attending Degrassi Community School for eighth and ninth graders, Paige pursued a high school soccer player who raped her at a frat party.

"That influenced her right up until season seven now. It changed her. Especially in recent seasons, she's been questioning her sexuality," says the Toronto-born Collins.

Paige's brief same-sex relationship with Alex (Deanna Casaluce) is a first for a teen show on Canadian prime-time television.

Collins has garnered one win and two nominations for the Young Artist Foundation's Young Artist Award for best ensemble actor in a TV Series. And she is proud of Degrassi's second nomination for a GLAAD (Gay, Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation) Media Award.

"It's really important to me because I had a big part in that story line," she says. "Paige has been dealing with the relationship with Alex and just growing up in general — moving away from home, going to university and coming back... she's really come a long way."

Collins says Degrassi's writers are open to suggestions to ensure that the series has realistic story lines.

"We have a good relationship with our writers. We have a table-read of every script, then talk about it, sometimes for 10 minutes and other times for an hour, getting into a deep discussion about the issue at hand. They're open to us sharing personal experiences."

"Since they're adults, sometimes we say, 'OK guys, no one would really say anything like this,' and they listen," Collins says.

Any hint as to what's in store for Paige?

"Great things — can't really give away too much, but as one relationship comes to an end, another might begin," Collins says.

Since Degrassi: The Next Generation's filming wrapped this past December — an impressive 24 episodes, its biggest season yet — Collins has had time for voice work in animation, and she completed the lead role, opposite Ashley Tisdale of High School Musical fame, in Picture This, directed by Stephen Herek, of Bob and Ted's Excellent Adventure fame.

"I play Mandy's [Tisdale] best friend, Alexa. Very different from Paige, she's punky and gothic. I had dark streaks in my hair and wore combat boots," Collins says.

"It's very much the Pretty in Pink movie or one of those '80s classics with a new spin to it. Really cute and lots of fun to work on. It may be coming out in the spring."

Collins' role as a cheerleader in another flick, Charlie Bartlett, a comedy about a high school hero with Robert Downie Jr. and Hope Davis, is out tomorrow in theatres.

Collins takes fame in stride. "I'm really thankful to my family, boyfriend, friends — if it weren't for them, well they keep me in my place. I owe them a lot," she says.

Degrassi: The Next Generation airs on CTVglobemedia Mondays at 7:30 p.m.

Day school hockey league scores again with 2008 tourney

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Throng of excited kids swarmed Chesswood Arenas last week for the Jewish Day School Hockey League's (JDSHL) 13th annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Tournament.

Russell Pritchard, a parent who is now in his third year as co-convenor of the tournament and has a son at United Synagogue Day School who played in the tourney, called this year's games "amazing" and said he was proud of the effort on display by players and volunteers alike.

The rink's four arenas were packed with cheering parents and friends of the players, many of whom were bused in by their respective schools to support the players.

The JDSHL estimated that close to 600 people attended the day-long tournament, held Feb. 8.

"It was a whirlwind of excitement," Pritchard told The C/JN last week.

He also praised his co-convenor, parent Errol Singer, and tournament co-directors Kelly Bernknopf and Ellise Benitah, also parents, for their work.

"Errol and I arranged for the refs and the ice, but Kelly and Ellise were truly great, arranging the food, collecting the trophies and just making sure everything was done for the kids," Pritchard said.

The non-contact, co-ed league consists of 14 teams, 238 players in all, from five Jewish day schools and their various campuses: USDS, Associated Hebrew Schools, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck Day School and the Toronto Heschele School.

The regular season began last December – with weekly games being held in the early mornings at Chesswood Arenas, before classes – and culminated with the memorial tournament.

"We shaped a league that is more than just hockey," the 2008 JDSHL tournament program read. "It has been a social environment where kids could be amongst peers from many schools. It's a wonderful opportunity for families throughout the Jewish community... to bring us all together."

Pritchard, who this year coached the USDS Bayview campus senior team, echoed the sentiments while waiting outside his team's locker room.

Jewish day school hockey players gather en masse between games at this year's Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Tournament.

"At the end of the day, it's all about the kids and... realizing that we're giving them a chance to play against friends from other Jewish schools," he said. "A lot of these kids play in city leagues during the year, and this allows them to [re-connect] with their friends in a sport they love."

Singer noted that despite the odd complaint, most parents thanked the organizers for their work.

"They're very positive, because the kids love it," he said, pleased by the day's turnout. "In fact, my kid told me his main objective is to be on his school team from Grade 3 to Grade 8. Not exactly the [scholastic] priority I had in mind."

Once again, the tournament was divided into a competition for younger kids in grades 3 to 5, and one for grades 6 through 8.

This year, the eight junior teams were divided into four divisions – tiers A through D – while the six senior teams played a round-robin to determine the champs and consolation finalists.

In what Pritchard called "maybe the best game ever played in the JDSHL," Associated Kamin defeated Leo Baeck North by a score of 3-2 in their third game of a mini-series to determine the Tier A junior champions.

"It was amazing," Pritchard said. "There were 300 or more fans in the crowd from each school watching that [series]."

Other results from the junior divisions saw Bialik capture the Tier B championship with a 4-2 win over USDS Bayview. USDS Bathurst took the Tier C championship with an 8-2 win over Leo Baeck South, and Associated Posluns won the Tier D championship with a 9-4 victory over Heschele.

On the senior side, Leo Baeck North beat Associated in a tough 5-4 battle to win the championship.

The consolation finals had USDS Bayview beating Bialik 3-2, while USDS Bathurst defeated Leo Baeck South 8-2 in another consolation game.

Pritchard noted that like any hockey league, the JDSHL has many "hockey parents" who sometimes get belligerent about how the league is run or about some of the rules.

Still, he said most parents appreciate the work that he and his leadership team put into the JDSHL, and he said he is gratified by the support they continue to receive from the community.

"After I take a breath from the tournament, I just enjoy it," Pritchard said. "I think I'll be back doing it again next year."

I'm learning to know and like myself

In a recent interview with Vanity Fair, actor Katherine Heigl made a comment that has really stuck with me and made me think.

"As women, we have more of a tendency to be people-pleasers, and I know a lot of women who are not vocal about what makes them happy. I was like that in my early 20s, but not anymore," she said.

"I spent a lot of time not being clear about who I was and what was important to me," she continued.

"It's easy to be taken advantage of if you're not honest. I knew that dance of trying to please a man, trying to guess what they want you to be, and I got really tired of that, really confused and frustrated. I decided I was sick of trying to figure out what everybody else wanted, and I should just decide what I want, and be honest, and not spend all my time guessing."

After reading that, I realized that her perspective on her early twenties rang true for me, too, although at the time, I never necessarily understood that I was trying to be a people-pleaser.

I just thought that making other people happy was the way to get what I wanted. You work hard at your job, your boss is happy and, therefore, you get promoted. You're nice to your boyfriend, your boyfriend is happy and, therefore, you live happily ever after.

Sometimes it worked, sometimes it didn't, but it's the shift in perspective from "them" to "us" that's important in Heigl's words.

This past New Year's, I made a toast with one of my girlfriends in which we promised each other that we'd "own" 2008, "own" our lives, and, most importantly, "own" ourselves.

It was an acknowledgment that up until then, we had never really asked ourselves honestly, "What do we want?"

Instead, we were trying to fit into a mould of a quintessential twentysomething woman. We had an idea, an archetype, of what it's supposed to be like, what people expected us to be like and act like at this age, and we were trying to fit into it. We'd told ourselves that that's what we wanted.

Maybe it's not so much that we were being people-pleasers as much as we were going through a series of tests in which we were trying to find our voice and trying to find out what it is that we actually wanted out of life, rather than what life wants out of us.

And that was the case for each aspect of our life—every decision we made felt like we were trying on different hats to see which one fit the best.

But now I'm in my late twenties, and I'm sick of searching for my voice. I guess what we all have to realize is that our voice has always been there. We've just been listening to everything and everyone but ourselves.

What does it really mean to own 2008, to own our lives? It means taking responsibility for ourselves, our feelings, our actions, our jobs, our choices in boyfriends.

It means not needing validation that what we want, and who we are, are what we're supposed to be.

What does it mean to own yourself? It means getting to know yourself and, more importantly, getting to like yourself.

Because until we can achieve that, we'll always be the people-pleasers that manage to somehow please everyone but ourselves.

embarrassing, especially when she does it to one of my friends or a service person that I may have recommended.

This seems to be a family thing, as I've noticed that other members of her family behave this way. I thought it might be because they are the children of Holocaust survivors. How do I work around this personality flaw that she has?

Hard To Take

Dear Hard To Take

There are a couple of points you mention that are very revealing - first, that other family members behave this way, and second, that they are children of Holocaust survivors.

Children of survivors have been raised by parents who have been through, and seen, unspeakable horrors. You can't survive the Holocaust and not have it affect every part of your life, including child rearing. That's why there are many books, studies and lectures on this subject.

Dear Ella,

I have a dear friend, Sue, who regularly alienates people around her. The best way I can describe it is paranoia. On the outside she smiles, makes conversation, jokes around, but on the inside, she is thinking that people have an ulterior motive and that they are going to take advantage of her. She constantly gets people's backs up, and for no good reason.

Sue is truly a lovely person, and I enjoy her company and her intellect, but at times I find this behaviour to be unacceptable and

After the war, survivors had no choice but to move on with life. They married, had children, ran businesses and seemed to fit in fine on the outside. But often, what went on behind closed doors was very different.

There is no question that many survivors had an increased sense of paranoia and nervousness. Many of them didn't believe in sharing any personal outside of the walls of their home. You can't grow up in a home environment like that and come out of it unscathed.

My suggestion to you is to stay calm and relaxed. If you feel uncomfortable, tell Sue that you know the new people you introduce her to very well. Set her mind at ease so that she has nothing to be concerned about.

Be supportive and try not to take her behaviour personally. You can't undo history, or the scars it has left on people who have been touched by it.

I receive many requests to write columns on various topics, from the death of an animal to day school morning parking problems. Generally, I stick to a list of articles that I want to write. However, from time to time, I take a request.

I recently received an e-mail from someone in her 40s that I have known for many years - we'll call her Katie - asking me to write a piece on the need for people to be kinder to each other in the dating world.

She wrote: "Avrum, you need to write about how unkind people can be in the dating world." Unkind? Oy. Her words and some discussions I had with others convinced me that it was time to write.

Our community is one of the only growing Jewish communities in the world. You wouldn't think that we would have a large singles population. But we do. Proof can be found in the endless number of matchmakers, Internet dating services and singles events that exist in Toronto.

Kindness in the dating world

The challenge of being single in our community is great, especially the older you get, because our community - and Judaism in general - is set up to cater to the nuclear family.

As an example, if a single man of any age (even 60!) is called to the Torah, he is referred to as a "bochor" - a boy. Troublesome! Perhaps this is one of the reasons the dating scene is "unkind." Could it be that the Jewish perception in general is that if you're not married, you haven't made it and are, therefore, less valued? Maybe.

What follows are some examples that Katie gave me of disrespectful comments she has heard from people looking for their bashert (their match).

We live in a time when the Internet is a popular tool to find a date. Dating websites can be effective, but they're not always easy on the soul or self esteem.

Once Katie was sharing her Internet stories with a girlfriend, who told her that a guy asked her via e-mail about her dating site ad: "Are you sure you're 40?" His next question was, "How old is your picture?" He continued to badger her about the authenticity of the information she provided in her ad.

The poor woman called Katie crying, questioning her appearance and in essence asking if she was living up to the expectations "out there," which are, more often than not, to find a woman who is skinny and beautiful, or a guy who is rich.

Some of the expectations for men that I found on these sites include: a guy who is strong, self-sufficient, sure of himself, vulnerable, handsome, in great shape, works and plays hard, adventurous, family oriented, etc.

I believe Superman can be found on the magazine rack with the other superheroes.

Katie told me of other unflattering remarks she has heard, such as, "Can you still have kids?" The question came right at the start of a first meeting. It's a reasonable thing to ask, but it must be framed in a sensitive way and asked at the right time during the dating process.

A male friend of Katie's was once asked, "How can you still not be married at your age?" The woman continued, "So what's wrong with you?" the inference being that if you're not married and are in your 40s or 50s their must be a serious problem.

Nonsense. We forget that the right person comes along at the right time.

Katie summed things up well in her e-mail to me. She wrote: "It's already difficult enough for people in search of their soul mates, but when they have to deal with these comments, it just adds to the suffering. I'm hoping this article can increase awareness and sensitivity in the dating world."

Amen.

P.S.: Match people up. It's a very kind thing to do.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

The Day of the State

A special edition newspaper was published jointly by the newspapers of Israel on "Friday, the fifth day of Iyar, 5708, May 14, 1948, erev Shabbat, at 4:00 in the afternoon, one day after the end of foreign rule," to commemorate the founding of the Jewish state. The headline above the famous portrait of Theodor Herzl says: "The people proclaim the State of Israel." The headline of the article below Herzl's portrait says: "All the laws of the White Paper are null and void." The infamous White Paper promulgated by Great Britain restricted Jewish immigration to Mandatory Palestine. With the founding of the state, Jews worldwide were now free to seek sanctuary and join the ingathering of exiles in the State of Israel.

Reflections as Israel approaches 60

The drama that surrounded the birth of Israel 60 years ago does not dim. With the passing of the United Nations resolution on Nov. 29, 1947, creating both a Jewish and an Arab state in a partitioned Palestine, many evil winds blew, often whipped into violent storms. Throughout the Arab world the killing and beating of Jews, and the looting of Jewish property, was widespread. Within 10 years of the United Nations resolution, more than 750,000 Jews had fled from Arab and Muslim lands. Among those Jews were many who came to Canada, where they rebuilt their lives and became integral, active, productive members of Canadian life.

By Sir
Martin Gilbert

The second evil wind that began in November 1947, within hours of the passage of the United Nations resolution, was the assault throughout Palestine, by Arab gangs, on Jewish buses, shops and homes. The Jewish commercial centre in Jerusalem was looted and burned. From the first hours following the Israeli declaration of independence on May 14, 1948, another evil wind threatened to destroy the newborn Jewish state, when five Arab armies attacked, determined to drive the Jews into the sea. The Egyptian air force bombed Tel Aviv. Egyptian troops reached the southern outskirts of Jerusalem. The Jordanians conquered the Jewish quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem. The Iraqis reached to within 16 miles of the sea. The Syrians reached the southern shore of the Sea of Galilee and the gates of nearby Kibbutz Deganya.

Several thousand Jewish refugees, from the areas overrun by the Arab armies in 1948, including from the Jewish quarter of the Old City, made new lives as Israeli citizens within the "Green Line," the armistice lines of 1949. In contrast, the half million and more Arab refugees, many of whose homes were likewise levelled to the ground in the first months of Israeli rule, have remained as refugees to this day, as have their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Rather than resolve the refugee problem, as it did with all other wartime and post-war refugee groups, the United Nations perpetuated the refugee status of the Palestinian Arab refugees. The countries to which they fled – Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon – were happy to keep them in camps, not to absorb them, and to use them as political pawns.

There can be no greater contrast with this enforced Palestinian refugee status in the immediate postwar years, than the fate of more than five million German refugees in Europe. There is no German refugee problem today. The German refugees of 1945 rebuilt their shattered lives in new homes, turned their back on any notional "right of return," and became productive, successful citizens of the new Germany – they, their children, their grandchildren and now their great-grandchildren.

The survivors of the Holocaust also accepted that they would have to find new homes. Today, they and their descendants are productive citizens of the lands to which they went, including Israel, Britain, the United States and Canada.

There have been many miracles at work in Israel in the past 60 years. Each miracle had a powerful human element, the desire of the Jews to make their homeland a centre of modernity, productivity and security. The largest Jewish immigration to reach Israel – more than a million people out of a population at that time of just over five million, 20 per cent – was from the former Soviet Union. Jews denied their rights fully to express their Jewishness and Jewish national identity had struggled for years to live that life in Israel.

In 1976, the Entebbe rescue (a hostage-rescue mission performed by Israel at Entebbe Airport in Uganda, in July 1976) showed that Israel would take great risks, and call on the highest courage, to save Jewish lives. In 1981, prime minister Menachem Begin ordered the bombing of the nuclear reactor in Iraq. This was done, and was successful. In 1984, Operation Moses flew 6,500 Ethiopian Jews to Israel, another act of rescue.

Today, Israel remains a haven for Jews whose lives in the Diaspora are confronted with upsurges in anti-Semitism. Israel is also a beacon of challenge and opportunity to immigrants from all over the world, seeking, not a refuge, but a vibrant life with Jewish neighbours and Jewish values.

As in past decades, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict casts a cloud today on optimism. The rule of Yasser Arafat as president of the Palestinian Authority (1995-2004) was a time of setback for both Israel and the Palestinians. An International Monetary Fund audit estimated that Arafat transferred $900 million in Palestinian public funds to his personal bank accounts. At the negotiating table, Arafat repeatedly failed to enter into constructive compromise. Insisting that Arafat had not done enough to curb Palestinian attacks against Israel, both the United States

On March 19, 2003, Mahmoud Abbas was appointed prime minister of the Palestinian Authority. On April 30, the details of the Road Map were made public (Abbas was elected president of the PA in January 2005). On May 27, the Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, hitherto a hardliner, stated that the "occupation" of Palestinian territories was "a terrible thing for Israel and for the Palestinians" and that it "cannot continue endlessly."

On June 2, 2003, the first day of a three-day visit by Bush to the Middle East, Israel freed 100 Palestinian political prisoners. While in Egypt, Bush met Abbas, and the leaders of Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Bahrain. As a result, the Arab leaders announced their support for the Road Map and promised to end funding to "terrorist groups." But in the West Bank and Gaza, the Hamas movement, fundamentalist and confrontational, rejected an end to terror, won control of the Palestinian Authority through the ballot box, and embarked on a vicious battle against Abbas and his Fatah movement.

Today, Abbas rules the West Bank, and Hamas rules the Gaza Strip. The main, and destructive contribution of Hamas to the debate, is the rockets fired continually against the Israeli Negev town of Sderot.

Despite Israel's economic vigour and military strength, her enemies have two pernicious weapons that can undermine both prosperity and military might: education and propaganda. Cartoons and editorials in the Arab and Muslim world persistently seek to demonize Israel. Some of these cartoons come from openly hostile sources, including Syria and the Hamas-run Gaza Strip. Others come from those nations that the United States administration designates as "moderate": Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Oman, Qatar, and, through government-funded newspapers, Jordan and Egypt.

In October 2007 in Egypt, the government-funded mass-circulation daily Al-Ahram showed an Israeli hand extended in peace, holding an olive branch, but with missiles instead of fingers. Also that October, a cartoon in Qatar's Ash-Sharq showed Ehud Olmert as a snake wrapping himself around the Islamic shrine of the Dome of the Rock. In November 2007, a cartoon in Jordan's Ad-Dustur showed a Jew, identified by a skullcap and a Star of David on his briefcase, wearing a suit covered with images of fighter jets and tanks.

Arab anti-Israel education and propaganda are a continual source of concern in Israel. Yet efforts are being made to counter the gulf of ignorance and hostility. In 2005, 16 Israeli and 20 Palestinian mayors met in Jericho to discuss a one-year "civilian truce."

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Outside forces seeking to intensify the conflict

Each year the Hebrew University of Jerusalem holds courses to train young Israeli and Palestinian entrepreneurs. Among the initiatives of the Peres Centre for Peace – based in Tel Aviv – is Viewpoints Theatre, where a mixed Palestinian-Israeli cast perform for Palestinian and Israeli audiences. In 2007, 500 Palestinian and Israeli youngsters participated in the finals of mixed Israeli-Palestinian soccer matches; they included a joint Israeli-Palestinian girls' team. On the northern border of the West Bank, the Palestinian district governor of Jenin and the Israeli head of the Gilboa Regional Council are creating a 250-acre free-trade industrial zone to generate 10,000 jobs for Palestinians.

Such efforts at Israeli-Palestinian cooperation, at the local level, are continuous. Despite the severity of the hundreds of Israeli road blocks and barriers, and the severe restrictions of the movement of Palestinians on the West Bank – restrictions Israel considers essential for security reasons – goodwill does exist on both sides and does find outlets.

But outside forces are also at work in the Muslim world, seeking to intensify the conflict. On Nov. 4, 2007, Tony Blair, the Middle East emissary of the Quartet, spoke of the dangers. "The essence is the struggle going on inside Islam," he warned, "either to modernize and embrace today's world, or retreat in the face of it into reactionary old-fashioned defiance, in which the West and all its allies, including for these purposes Israel, is seen as the enemy."

Fundamentalist Islam has no interest in an Israeli-Palestinian agreement, and sees the enmity of Israel and the Palestinians as something to be encouraged and fomented. Iran is a vociferous leader in this anti-Israel stance. Hamas, now ruling in Gaza, shares this anarchic, destructive aim. Fortunately, the two current leaders of both sides of the divide, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Abbas, are both determined to try to find a peaceful resolution. They know that economic distress, ill will and bloodshed could follow, if the conflict continues to fester.

A month after Arafat's death in November 2004, Mahmoud Abbas declared: "The uprising should be kept away from arms, because it is a legitimate right of the people to express their rejection to occupation by popular and social means. The use of arms has been damaging and should end."

First Sharon, and then Olmert, responded to what Abbas had urged upon his own people. In 2005, as a gesture of conciliation, all Israeli settlements were withdrawn from the Gaza Strip. That year, and again in 2007, the Israeli Supreme Court adjusted the route of the security barrier in favour of the Palestinians living on either side of it.

Explaining the new era that he believed was dawning, Olmert declared on the eve of the Annapolis conference in November 2007: "At the top of the Palestinian leadership stand leaders committed to agreements signed in past years... this is an opportunity and we need to take it." Olmert added: "I am committed to the vision of two States, the Jewish state of Israel and a Palestinian state for the Palestinian people – there will be no negotiations over this vision, there will be no concessions over this basic goal, so succinctly phrased by U.S. President George W. Bush – 'two countries for two peoples.'"

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Prospects for both sides great if peace can be secured

Olmert sought to be even-handed: "We will not compromise Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state," he said, "nor will we try to force the Palestinians to compromise their right to a state of their own. These are basic tenets which are a sine qua non of the process." Olmert did not minimize the need for both sides to act with equal honesty in carrying out the obligations laid down in the American-sponsored Road Map for peace. "The Road Map demands a series of moves on Israel's side," Olmert declared. "These, like the obligations of the Palestinians, have not been carried out. Some of these obligations and demands are not convenient for us. But I have no intention of running away from them."

Those obligations on both sides are heavy. There has been far too much bloodshed for an easy of quick resolution of the conflict. In the seven years and three months between Sept. 29, 2000, and Dec. 31, 2007, a total of 4,330 Palestinians were killed by Israeli security forces. Forty-one Palestinians were killed by Israeli civilians. A further 569 Palestinians were killed by fellow Palestinians, mostly in the Hamas-Fatah struggle. On the Israeli side, 705 Israeli civilians and 425 Israeli security force personnel were killed by Palestinians. All these killings, on an unacceptable scale in any situation of dialogue and compromise, must be addressed — and the numbers brought drastically down — for Annapolis and the Road Map to have a chance of success.

Olmert is not a quitter, nor is Abbas. With their joint aim of achieving a final agreement and Palestinian statehood by the end of 2008, the two men agreed at Annapolis that they would continue to meet every two weeks, for discussions on matters of substance. At the same time, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators have been in continuous session since Annapolis with regard to all the problems that need to be resolved. Among these are three most contentious: the future of the Palestinian refugees, the borders of the Palestinian state and the status of Jerusalem. For the Annapolis timetable to succeed, and for a Palestinian state to come into being by the end of 2008, these problems will continue to be discussed throughout 2008 at a series of meetings in Israel, the PA areas and far beyond.

This process began on the day after Annapolis, when Bush, Olmert and Abbas met at the White House. At this Nov. 29 meeting — held 60 years to the day after the United Nations voted to set up a Jewish and a Palestinian state in a partitioned Palestine-Israel, the PA and the United States agreed to begin work on three parallel tracks.

The first track, that of Israeli-Palestinian bilateral negotiations, started with a steering committee meeting on Dec. 12 between Israeli and Palestinian representatives. No American representatives were present. The steering committee is to meet on a regular basis to establish the framework for the negotiations that is intended to lead to an agreement by the end of 2008. It was in part to oversee the work of the steering committee that Olmert and Abbas would meet every other week.

The second track agreed upon by Olmert, Abbas and Bush at the White House was the Road Map implementation, with the United States in charge of a monitoring mechanism. Israel had declared that it would not implement any agreement until the Palestinians fulfil their Road Map requirements, including a halt to acts of terror. The monitoring mechanism, which will judge when this happens, is thus a crucial element in furthering Palestinian statehood. A retired United States general, James Jones, a former NATO supreme allied commander in Europe, has been appointed head of the monitoring mechanism.

The third post-Annapolis track was to enlist the practical support of the Arab countries, all of whom had been present at Annapolis, and of the international community, to produce "a favourable regional environment" — essentially Palestinian economic security and growth — to advance the two-state solution. To this end, the donor countries met in Paris on Dec. 17, to put in place practical steps to help create workable Palestinian governing institutions within a flourishing Palestinian economy. PA prime minister Salam Fayyad, a man of the highest integrity, asked for $5.6 billion. Sixty-eight nations pledged $7.4 billion between them. Canada, with $300 million pledged, was among the top 11 donors.

The host of the Paris talks, Blair, had been at Annapolis as the representative of the Quartet. Among those whose help he was able to enlist was the British-based Portland Trust, an initiator of projects designed to create Palestinian business opportunities and to finance housing development in the West Bank. From the United States, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gave her strong support to the American-based Aspen Institute's U.S.-Palestinian Public-Private Partnership, committed to attracting international investment, supporting existing Palestinian businesses, creating jobs and training for Palestinians, and, like the Portland Trust, fostering economic opportunities in the PA through economic and social projects.

One of the goals of the Annapolis process was to delegitimize Hamas in the eyes of Palestinians and the Arab world, by showing the PA as a viable alternative to it. To do this, the economic track is considered essential.

Today, as Hamas continues to serve as a destabilizing factor, the attempt by Abbas to assert PA control over the Gaza-Egypt border is an example of the positive efforts being made. But with Hamas approval, rockets are still being fired into Israel from the Gaza Strip, almost on a daily basis. Amid Israeli fears and casualties, Israeli counter-strikes lead to a Palestinian death toll far higher than the Israeli death toll. A strong act of faith is needed to see the Annapolis and Paris process through to success. But without that act of faith, sustained by whatever efforts each individual can make to seek a fair balance, there can no prosperity, and no peace. Israelis and Palestinians are always going to share, in one form or another, the tiny strip of land. At its widest point — from Tel Aviv to the Allenby Bridge — Israel and the West Bank combined stretch the same distance as from Toronto's Union Station to the waterfront at Barrie, on Lake Simcoe.

Each side has to be shown, by the deeds and actions of the other, that the prospects for both are incalculably great if a true peace can be secured. Trade, commerce, exports, joint enterprises, common activities, shared aspirations, all are at stake and all are on offer, if only the will and the determination to grasp them is present on both sides of the divide.

Commenting on the gap between rich and poor in Victorian Britain, prime minister Benjamin Disraeli wrote: "The gulf is unbridgeable." The events of the next few months will show if this is true of the Israeli-Palestinian divide. No crystal ball can reveal it. As Churchill once commented: "The future, though imminent, is obscure."

Optimism is not a popular frame of mind just now in the Middle East. But for the sake of the next generation of Palestinians and Israelis, working toward it is surely worth the effort. Israel is a country with great resilience and hope. Despite the grave challenges, it has every chance of proving its endurance and its creativity.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Israel in search of peace

My great-grandfather, Rabbi Arye Leib Frumkin, went to Israel in 1871; his father had settled there 20 years earlier. His first act was to begin writing his History of the Sages in Jerusalem, chronicling the Jewish presence there since Nachmanides arrived in 1265.

In 1881 pogroms broke out in more than 100 towns in Russia. That was when he realised that aliyah was no longer a pilgrimage of the few but an urgent necessity for the many. He became a pioneer, moving to one of the first agricultural settlements in the new yishuv. The early settlers had caught malaria and left. Rabbi Frumkin led the return and built the first house there. The name they gave the town epitomizes their dreams. Using a phrase from the Book of Hosea, they called it Petach Tikva, "the gateway of hope." Today it is the sixth largest city in Israel.

By Chief Rabbi
Sir Jonathan Sacks

The Jewish connection with Israel did not begin with Zionism, a word coined in the 1890s. It goes back 4,000 years to the first recorded syllables of Jewish time, God's command to Abraham: "Leave your land, your birthplace and your father's house and go to the land that I will show you." (Ex. 12: 1) Seven times God promised Abraham the land, and repeated that promise to Isaac and Jacob. If any nation on earth has a right to any land – a right based on history,

Two young Israelis recently wave the flag along the ancient ramparts of Jerusalem in a bid to re-emphasize the millennial Jewish connection to the city. [RNS/Reuters photo] attachment and long association – then the Jewish people has a right to Israel.

Judaism – twice as old as Christianity, three times as old as Islam – was the call to Abraham's descendants to create a society of freedom, justice and compassion under the sovereignty of God. A society involves a land, a home, somewhere where the "children of Israel" form the majority, and can thus create a culture, an economy and a political system in accordance with their values. That land was and is Israel.

Jews never left Israel voluntarily. They never relinquished their rights. They returned whenever they could: in the days of Moses, then again after the Babylonian exile, then again in generation after generation. Judah Halevi went there in the 12th century. So did Maimonides and his family, though they found it impossible to stay. Nachmanides went after being exiled from Spain. There was a large community there in the 16th century. There are places, especially in Galilee, where they never left at all.

Those with a sense of history long ago recognized the injustice of denying Jews their ancestral home. In 1799 Napoleon, at the start of his Middle East campaign, called on Jews to return (the campaign failed before there was a chance to act on this proposal). So did many British thinkers in the 19th century, among them Lord Palmerston, Lord Shaftesbury, and the writer George Eliot in her novel Daniel Deronda.

Jews as 'outsiders', a perverse, modern myth

The Balfour Declaration in 1917, ratified in 1922 by the League of Nations, was an attempt to rectify the single most sustained crime against humanity: the denial of Jewry's right to its land and its subsequent unparalleled history of suffering. Prime minister Winston Churchill never wavered from this view. There were Arab leaders who understood this, too. In 1919, King Faisal, of Iraq, wrote to the American-Jewish judge Felix Frankfurter: 'We Arabs, especially the educated among us, look with the deepest sympathy on the Zionist movement... The Jewish movement is national and not imperialist. Our movement [Arab nationalism] is national and not imperialist. Indeed I think that neither can be a real success without the other.'

The idea that Jews came to Israel as outsiders or imperialists is among the most perverse of modern myths. They were the land's original inhabitants: they have the same relationship to the land as native Americans to America, aborigines to Australia, and Maoris to New Zealand. They were ousted by imperialists. They are the only rulers of the land in the past 3,000 years who neither sought nor created an empire.

In fact, no other people, no other power, has ever created an independent state there. When it was not a Jewish state, Israel was merely an administrative unit of empires: the Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Byzantines, Umayyads, Fatimids, Abbasids, Crusaders, Mamluks and Ottomans. The existence of Israel, in ancient times and today, is a sustained protest against empires and imperialism: against Mesopotamia of Abraham's day and the Egyptians of the exodus.

Do we really need a Jewish state? Yes. There must be some place on earth where Jews can defend themselves, where they have a home in the sense given by the poet Robert Frost as "the place where, when you have to go there, they have to take you in." Every nation has the right to rule itself and create a society and culture in accordance with its own values. That right, to national self-determination, is among the most basic in politics. Today, there are 82 Christian nations and 56 Muslim ones, but only one Jewish one: in a country smaller than the Kruger National Park, 1/4 of one per cent of the land mass of the Arab world.

Long ago, Jews recognized the right of the Arab population of the land to a place of their own. There were various plans for the partition of the land into two states, one Jewish, one Arab, in the 1920s and 1930s. Jews accepted them; the Arabs rejected them. In 1947, the United Nations voted for partition. Again, Jews accepted, the Arabs refused. David Ben-Gurion reiterated the call for peace as a central part of Israel's Declaration of Independence in May 1948. Israel's neighbours – Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon and Iraq – responded by attacking it on all fronts.

Palestinians betrayed by their own supporters

The offer was renewed in 1967 after the Six Day War. The response of the Arab League, meeting in Khartoum, Sudan, in September 1967, was the famous "Three Nos": no to peace, no to negotiations, no to the recognition of the State of Israel. The call was repeated many times by Golda Meir, and always decisively rejected.

The boldest offer was made by prime minister Ehud Barak at Taba, 2001. It offered the Palestinians a state in the whole of Gaza and 97 per cent of the West Bank, with border compensations for the other three per cent, with east Jerusalem as its capital. The story is told in detail in Dennis Ross' The Missing Peace (Ross was the chief negotiator). Many members of the Palestinian team wanted to accept. The Saudi ambassador at the time, Prince Bandar bin Sultan, said, "If Arafat does not accept what is available now, it won't be a tragedy, it will be a crime."

Tragically, the Palestinians have been betrayed by those who claimed to be their supporters. They were betrayed in 1948 by the Arab states who promised them that if they left now they would return soon, all Jews having been expelled. They were betrayed by the Arab nations to which they fled, who refused to grant them citizenship, in marked contrast to Israel and its treatment of Jewish refugees from Arab (and other) lands.

They were betrayed by countries that encouraged them to pursue violence instead of peace, bringing poverty to an entire population which, under Israeli rule from 1967 to 1987, had achieved unprecedented levels of affluence and economic growth.

They are betrayed today by those who encourage impossible expectations – Palestinian rule over the whole of Israel – thus condemning yet another generation to violence, poverty and despair.

The Egyptians, who ruled Gaza between 1949 and 1967, could have created a Palestinian state, but did not. The Jordanians, who ruled the West Bank during the same years, could have created a Palestinian state, but did not. Instead, Egypt persecuted its Islamist intellectuals, sentencing many to death.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Israel's achievements have been immense

The Jordanians expelled the Palestinians in 1971, after killing almost 10,000 of them in 1970 in the massacre known as "Black September." The only country that has ever offered the Palestinians a state is Israel.

What has systematically derailed Israel's efforts for peace is the fact that every concession it has made, every withdrawal it has undertaken, has been interpreted by its enemies as a sign of weakness, and has led to more violence, not less. The Oslo process led to suicide bombings. Barak's offer led to the so-called El Aqsa intifadah. The withdrawals from Lebanon and Gaza led directly to the onslaught of Katyushas and Qassams. How does any nation make peace under these conditions? Hamas and Hezbollah have made it clear that they do not seek peace. They seek Israel's destruction.

Under constant threat of violence or war, Israel's achievements have nonetheless been immense. It has taken a desolate landscape and turned it into a place of farms, forests and fields. It has taken immigrants from more than 100 countries, speaking more than 80 languages, and turned them into a nation. It has created a modern economy with almost no resources other than the creative gifts of its people. It has sustained democracy in a part of the world that had never known it before. It has taken Hebrew, the language of the Bible, and made it speak again. It has taken a people devastated by the Holocaust and made it live again. Israel remains a Petach Tikva, a gateway of hope.

We must challenge the blatant falsehoods

Is criticism of Israel anti-Semitism? No. Criticism is a legitimate part of democratic politics and free speech. Many of Israel's most acute critics are Israelis. No nation is perfect; no nation can be perfect; a good society is one that makes space for, and listens to, constructive criticism. That is something with which we must live. The Hebrew Bible is the most self-critical document in religious or national history.

What we must challenge are the blatant falsehoods: that Israel is the aggressor, that it has not sought peace; above all the idea that it has no right to exist. Equally we must challenge the false paradigm that the Israel-Palestinian relationship is a zero-sum game in which one side loses and the other wins. It is not. From peace, both sides gain. From war, violence and terror, both sides lose.

The call on both sides must be for peace: peace for Israel, peace for the Palestinians. You cannot have one without the other. The choice is not between supporting Israel or supporting the Palestinians, but between peace or violence. Peace is sacred, violence a desecration. Too many lives have been lost, too much blood has been shed. Eventually both sides must recognize the other's right to be — and if not now, when?

Canadian Jewry Responds

For the Jews of Canada the years immediately following World War II were the worst of times. The news trickling out of Europe was appalling. No one yet knew how many Jews had been murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators, but it was increasingly evident that events too horrible to be believed were not too horrible to have happened. The world's largest Jewish community had all but disappeared, and with it the fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, aunts and uncles of most Canadian Jews. The extent of the genocide was not yet clear – and would not be for years – but Canadian Jewry realized the world had changed.

But for them it had not yet changed for the better. Continuing its pre-war policy, the Canadian government was still not allowing Jews into the country. The remnant of European Jewry who survived the Holocaust would largely remain cooped up in displaced persons camps for another three years despite frantic efforts by their relatives in Canada to bring them over. And the blanketing anti-Semitism that enveloped Canada in the years before the war refused to lift. In fact, it got worse.

Despite the contributions of Canada's Jews to the war effort – thousands had enlisted and fought and died for their country – anti-Jewish attitudes and behaviour persisted. Restrictive covenants still prevented Jews from buying or renting homes in most parts of Canada. Quotas still kept many Jews from admission into universities and professional schools. Hospitals would still not accept Jewish doctors. There were still barely any Jewish judges and university professors. Whole sectors of industry and government still refused to hire Jews, including veterans.

Indeed, very little had changed for Canada's Jews as several public opinion polls at the time made clear. More than half of those questioned did not want any more Jews in the country, and in fact, preferred German immigrants to Jewish ones. As well, many Canadians felt that there were already too many Jews in Canada. Even as more and more Canadians learned through newspapers, magazines and newsreels about the extent of Nazi depravities, rates of anti-Semitism rose in Canada, reaching their peak in 1948.

Worse, Jews everywhere, including Canada were increasingly concerned over the situation in Palestine, where the British were blocking the arrival of Jewish refugees and seemed to be siding with the Arabs in their efforts to preclude the creation of a Jewish state. As the number of Jewish casualties grew Canadian Jews grew more frantic. For them the future of the Jews both at home and abroad seemed increasingly bleak.

And then came November 29, 1947.

On that day, after several false starts, the United Nations voted to create a Jewish state in Palestine. During the day, Canadian Jews, like their counterparts everywhere huddled around their radios listening to the vote. Once it was announced there was an outpouring of rejoicing in every Jewish community in Canada, the likes of which had never been seen before. The re-creation of a Jewish homeland after an absence of some 2000 years prompted spontaneous rallies in every Jewish neighbourhood in every village, town and city across the country. This was the first bit of good news for Canadian Jewry in over two decades and was their first opportunity to celebrate. The marches, demonstrations, and meetings over the next few days were absolutely cathartic for a community desperately in need of letting loose its long pent-up frustrations.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Support always strong

"In our neighbourhood people charged out on to the streets to embrace. Men and women who hadn't been to a synagogue since last Yom Kippur surprised themselves, turning up to offer prayers of gratitude and then toss back glasses of schnapps with slices of schmaltz herring. Horns were honked. Photographs of Chaim Weizmann or Ben-Gurion, torn from back issues of Life and Look were passed up in bay windows. Blue-and-white Stars of David flapped in the wind on some balconies. Many wept as they sang Hatikvah, the Zionist anthem. We ... trooped downtown singing Am Yisrael Hai ("the People of Israel Lives") and then danced the horah in the middle of St. Catherine Street, just outside the Forum, bringing traffic to a halt."

And what happened in Montreal was replicated in Toronto, Winnipeg, Glace Bay, Hamilton, Vancouver, Brantford, Edenbridge, indeed everywhere in Canada where there was a Jewish community. I remember joining the huge rally on Spadina Avenue proudly waving the Jewish flag my father had given me. Typically I was brought back to earth the next day when I naively took the flag to my local public school to show off to my classmates in Grade 1 and was promptly beaten up by two bullies in the school yard who grabbed the flag and shouted anti-Semitic epithets. I never did get to show my flag to my friends. In fact I never did go back to that school. The next day my father removed me from Ogden public school in the Queen Street and Spadina Avenue area and enrolled me in the new Hebrew Day School on Brunswick Avenue. It is to these two bullies to whom I am indebted for my Hebrew and Zionist education.

Support for a Jewish homeland had always been strong in Canada, much stronger, for example than in the United States. Throughout the inter-years the many Zionist organizations in Canada raised millions of dollars to buy land for Palestinian Jews. From time to time leaders of its umbrella organization, the Zionist Organization of Canada, met with government officials to lobby on behalf of the homeland promised to the Jews by the British government in the famous Balfour Declaration of 1917. More persistently they pleaded with prime minister Mackenzie King to intercede with the British to open up Palestine to some of the persecuted Jews of Europe. But King and his cabinet supported the British restrictionist policy and politely rebuffed every delegation's entreaties.

Once the war began, Canadian Zionists adopted a more militant approach. A new massive public relations campaign on behalf of Palestine was launched. But it too achieved little. A Canada at war had even less time and patience for Jewish grievances than a Canada at peace. Only after the end of hostilities in Europe, when the United Nations took up the problem of Palestine, did Canadians evince some interest in what was to become of the promise made to the Jews in the Balfour Declaration – and then only because a Canadian, Ivan Rand of the Supreme Court of Canada, was appointed to the United Nations Special Commission on Palestine.

New Jewish state gave Jews everywhere self-esteem

Canadian Jews did what they could. Divided by ideological splits among the supporters of labour, the right-leaning revisionists, the liberals and the religious parties, Canadian Zionists turned to a high profile committee of non-Jews to help turn the tide. And it seemed to work. The Canadian Palestine Committee issued statements and press releases, sponsored radio broadcasts, bought newspaper advertisements, and lobbied government officials. The committee gave Canadian Zionists a credibility they had not had before in government circles. These activities certainly played a role in Canada's decision to vote for partition on that fateful November evening and to create a state for the Jews in part of Palestine. But as most historians believe, Canada's decision was based on its own self-interest and not on the lobbying of Canada's Jews.

But it was not only in fundraising and lobbying for Palestine that Canadian Jews were selfless. Many also put their own bodies on the line. Hundreds of war veterans volunteered to fight for the new Jewish state when it was attacked by five invading Arab armies. For those who could not go over and fight there were equally important tasks to be done at home. Zionist activists were able to procure tons of surplus war materials—guns, mortars, radios, even airplanes—through dummy corporations and ship them to a desperate Israeli army in crates marked 'agricultural tools'. Other Jews launched a massive fundraising campaign. In one year, nearly $10 million was collected for the State of Israel, making it probably the most successful fundraising campaign in Canadian history to that time. Indeed in per capita terms the amount of money raised for the Jewish State was the largest in the world.

Like November 29, 1947, May 14, 1948 was another red-letter day for Canadian and world Jewry. That day marked the official birth of the State of Israel. At a ceremony in Tel Aviv a Jewish state was proclaimed and a government created. Within hours the United States announced its recognition of the new state. Canada, ever careful, would not grant recognition for another seven months.

But Canadian Jews did not seem to care. They did not expect much from a government that had been a constant disappointment to them. For them, the creation of the state was sufficient and the community launched days of celebration and rejoicing. In Toronto, Jews piled out into the streets singing and dancing. Synagogues were full and 20,000 piled into Maple Leaf Gardens in tribute. In Montreal they jammed into the Montreal Forum, and across Canada hockey arenas and auditoriums were filled by raucous Jewish crowds commemorating the establishment of the Jewish state. There had been so little to celebrate for so long Canadian Jewry took the opportunity to revel in their pride.

They were proud of the achievements of the Jews of Palestine. But they also celebrated their own accomplishments. They felt their vigorous campaigns had moved a reluctant Canadian government to support partition. Many toasts were drunk to the leading Canadian advocates of the Jewish state at the United Nations, Justice Ivan Rand and a young Lester Pearson. Both had played key roles in the creation of the State of Israel. Forgotten for the moment were the anti-Semitic, restrictive policies of King, who chose this moment to leave office.

The formation of the new Jewish state gave Jews everywhere a self esteem they had not had for centuries. They were no longer homeless; after 2,000 years of dispersal they finally had returned home. In the words of Abba Eban, Jews everywhere were now walking with a new jump in their step, especially when the Jews in Palestine triumphed over the attacking Arab armies in Israel's war of independence.

In Canada Jews were now viewed from a different perspective. Capitalizing on the victories of their Israeli cousins, Canadian Jews achieved a new level of prestige that had eluded them for generations. Anti-Semitism, which had been on the rise in the years after the war, according to all the polls, reached its peak just before the creation of Israel. In the following months and years, however, began an inexorable slide for the next 50 years. For Canadians there was now a new Jewish stereotype. The ragged, bearded peddler was now replaced by the heroic, vigorous Sabra who had just won a spectacular military victory. The world does not like losers, and finally Jews were winners.

But the birth of Israel had a more profound impact on Canada's Jews. Confident that most of the survivors of the Holocaust would choose to move to their new homeland, after 30 years of keeping them closed, the Canadian government opened the country's doors to Jewish refugees. No longer concerned that Jews would flood Canada, Ottawa ordered officials in the displaced persons camps to recruit Jews for Canada. Until then of course, in the three years following the war, very few Jews were allowed admission. Suddenly the gates were wide open and over the next few years over 35,000 survivors and their families poured into the Canada.

As well, taking their cue from the courage of the Jews in Palestine, Jewish human rights activists in Canada became more militant in their fight against the discrimination and restrictions confronting Canadian Jews. Within a few years they had achieved an astonishing success. Laws were passed to protect minority rights. With Jews in the vanguard and with a more accommodating government and society Canada became the tolerant, welcoming, humane nation that is still its hallmark today.

Jewish Canadians have much to celebrate in the creation of the State of Israel some 60 years ago. Perhaps more than they thought...

has operated in support of Technion-Israel Institute of Technology for over 60 years, acting to raise funds and friends in Canada for Technion, and to encourage interaction between educational institutions, university faculty members and students in Canada, and Technion.

Over the years Canadians have made generous donations in support of numerous projects at Technion to build or renovate campus buildings, for scholarships and endowments, faculty chairs and lectureships, and to sustain various research activities and exchange programs. These have been instrumental in aiding Technion to grow and flourish.

Schulich Faculty of Chemistry is recognized globally for its excellence in teaching and research.

Mr. Seymour Schulich's gift of $22.5 million transformed the possibilities for this faculty to enhance its profile and capabilities by providing monies for an impressive set of scholarships, fellowships, lectureships and support for new faculty.

Consistent with his vision, Technion is undertaking to renew and refurbish the laboratories and technical infrastructure at the Schulich Faculty of Chemistry.

Canadian Technion Society has agreed to raise $5.0 million for this refurbishing program.

Canadian Technion Society has a long association with the Faculty of Chemistry at Technion. The original building was named the Canada Chemistry Building and several Canadians have previously donated funds to outfit laboratories in this building.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

The Declaration

Issued by the Provisional Government of Israel in Tel Aviv, on 5 Iyar 5708, May 14, 1948.

The Land of Israel was the birthplace of the Jewish people. Here their spiritual, religious and political identity was shaped. Here they first attained to statehood, created cultural values of national and universal significance and gave to the world the eternal Book of Books. After being forcibly exiled from their land, the people kept faith with it throughout their Dispersion and never ceased to pray and hope for their return to it and for the restoration in it of their political freedom.

Impelled by this historic and traditional attachment, Jews strove in every successive generation to re-establish themselves in their ancient homeland. In recent decades they returned in their masses. Pioneers, defiant returnees, and defenders, they made deserts bloom, revived the Hebrew language, built villages and towns, and created a thriving community controlling its own economy and culture, loving peace but knowing how to defend itself, bringing the blessings of progress to all the country's inhabitants, and aspiring towards independent nationhood.

In the year 5657 (1897), at the summons of the spiritual father of the Jewish State, Theodore Herzl, the First Zionist Congress convened and proclaimed the right of the Jewish people to national rebirth in its own country.

This right was recognized in the Balfour Declaration of the 2nd November, 1917, and re-affirmed in the Mandate of the League of Nations which, in particular, gave international sanction to the historic connection between the Jewish people and Eretz-Israel and to the right of the Jewish people to rebuild its National Home.

The catastrophe which recently befell the Jewish people – the massacre of millions of Jews in Europe – was another clear demonstration of the urgency of solving the problem of its homelessness by re-establishing in Eretz-Israel the Jewish State, which would open the gates of the homeland wide to every Jew and confer upon the Jewish people the status of a fully privileged member of the community of nations.

Survivors of the Nazi holocaust in Europe, as well as Jews from other parts of the world, continued to migrate to Eretz-Israel, undaunted by difficulties, restrictions and dangers, and never ceased to assert their right to a life of dignity, freedom and honest toil in their national homeland.

In the Second World War, the Jewish community of this country contributed its full share to the struggle of the freedom- and peace-loving nations against the forces of Nazi wickedness and, by the blood of its soldiers and its war effort, gained the right to be reckoned among the peoples who founded the United Nations.

On the 29th November, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz-Israel; the General Assembly required the inhabitants of Eretz-Israel to take such steps as were necessary on their part for the implementation of that resolution. This recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish people to establish their State is irrevocable.

This right is the natural right of the Jewish people to be masters of their own fate, like all other nations, in their own sovereign State.

Accordingly we, members of the People's Council, representatives of the Jewish Community of Eretz-Israel and of the Zionist Movement, are here assembled on the day of the termination of the British Mandate over Eretz-Israel and, by virtue of our natural and historic right and on the strength of the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly, hereby declare the establishment of a Jewish state in Eretz-Israel, to be known as the State of Israel.

We declare that, with effect from the moment of the termination of the Mandate being tonight, the eve of Sabbath, the 6th Iyar, 5708 (15th May, 1948), until the establishment of the elected, regular authorities of the State in accordance with the Constitution which shall be adopted by the Elected Constituent Assembly not later than the 1st October 1948, the People's Council shall act as a Provisional Council of State, and its executive organ, the People's Administration, shall be the Provisional Government of the Jewish State, to be called "Israel."

The State of Israel will be open for Jewish immigration and for the Ingathering of the Exiles; it will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all its inhabitants; it will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective

The State of Israel is prepared to cooperate with the agencies and representatives of the United Nations in implementing the resolution of the General Assembly of the 29th November, 1947, and will take steps to bring about the economic union of the whole of Eretz-Israel.

We appeal to the United Nations to assist the Jewish people in the building-up of its State and to receive the State of Israel into the community of nations.

We appeal – in the very midst of the onslaught launched against us now for months – to the Arab inhabitants of the State of Israel to preserve peace and participate in the upbuilding of the State on the basis of full and equal citizenship and due representation in all its provisional and permanent institutions.

We appeal to the Jewish people throughout the Diaspora to rally round the Jews of Eretz-Israel in the tasks of immigration and upbuilding and to stand by them in the great struggle for the realization of the age-old dream – the redemption of Israel.

Placing our trust in the Almighty, we affix our signatures to this proclamation at this session of the provisional Council of State, on the soil of the Homeland, in the city of Tel-Aviv, on this Sabbath eve, the 5th day of Iyar, 5708 (14th May, 1948).

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

They fought for the nascent Jewish state

On a cold night in early 1948 the main auditorium of the Brunswick Avenue Talmud Torah in Toronto was filled to capacity as Maj. Ben Adelman, a Canadian-born member of the Yishuv – the pre-state Jewish community in Palestine – addressed an expectant crowd. Adelman had moved to Palestine in the 1930s and served in the British Army in World War II. As a former Canadian he had been sent to Canada by the Haganah – the official pre-state army of the Yishuv – to recruit Jewish veterans to serve in Palestine. The previous November the United Nations General Assembly had voted to partition Palestine into a Jewish state and an Arab state upon the expiry of the British mandate at midnight, May 15, 1948. Everyone knew a war would erupt between the new Jewish state and the Arab countries surrounding it as soon as the partition became official. Indeed, a civil war between Arabs and Jews in Palestine had broken out within hours of the UN vote. Now, representatives of the Yishuv were fanning out across the globe trying to raise money, gather surplus arms from the recent war, and attract volunteers to fight.

Canada by the Haganah – the official pre-state army of the Yishuv – to recruit Jewish veterans to serve in Palestine. The previous November the United Nations General Assembly had voted to partition Palestine into a Jewish state and an Arab state upon the expiry of the British mandate at midnight, May 15, 1948.

Everyone knew a war would erupt between the new Jewish state and the Arab countries surrounding it as soon as the partition became official. Indeed, a civil war between Arabs and Jews in Palestine had broken out within hours of the UN vote. Now, representatives of the Yishuv were fanning out across the globe trying to raise money, gather surplus arms from the recent war, and attract volunteers to fight.

The Volunteers: How a Handful of Jews (and non-Jews) From Overseas Helped Establish The State of Israel

Most of the men at the Talmud Torah that evening had come to listen. Some were too young to have served in the recent war but were fired up by the ideal of helping avoid a second Holocaust, this time in Palestine. Others were veterans of the war – almost one out of every 10 Jews in Canada had donned a uniform to fight Nazism. There had been no formal announcement of the meeting, just a few mysterious posters urging Jewish men to “stand up and be counted,” because everyone thought it was illegal for a Canadian to serve in the armed forces of another country (it was not, but many believed it was) and thus illegal to recruit Canadians for service abroad. Men had also been phoned, or spoken to quietly at the Wingate branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, founded by Canadian Jewish war veterans in Toronto.

One man in the room who had not come to listen, but to volunteer and to convince others to volunteer as well, sat on the stage as Adelman addressed the crowd. He was Benjamin Dunkelman, former major in the Queen's Own Rifles of Canada, who had been a decorated mortar platoon officer in World War II. The scion of a wealthy Toronto family, Dunkelman had also moved to Palestine in the 1930s – the two men had once planned to establish a Canadian kibbutz there – but had returned to Canada before the war. He was an avid supporter of the Zionist cause and he was ready to lead 1,000 Canadians to Palestine – if that many could be recruited.

The recruiting campaign was surreptitiously launched in Toronto and Montreal by leading members of the local Jewish communities and carefully watched by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who reported to the Canadian cabinet on the activities. But although Canada had passed a law during the Spanish Civil War to discourage Canadians from serving in the militaries of other countries, actual prohibition only applied to service for nations at war with Canada. So the government did nothing about the recruiting though it was rather more vigilant about allowing the Yishuv to acquire war surplus planes, ships, or guns in Canada.

Most of Canada's Jews, then as now, lived in Montreal and Toronto and thus the recruiting effort was focused on those two cities. But Jewish war veterans and young Jewish men eager to serve could be found all across the country, literally from Nova Scotia to British Columbia. And wherever they were, it was easy for them to volunteer simply by approaching the local Zionist Organization of Canada branch, or via the Jewish War Veterans of Canada or through the handful of Jewish dominated Royal Canadian Legion branches in Montreal (The Brigadier Kisch Branch), Toronto or Winnipeg, which had the third largest number of Jews in Canada at that time. And although Dunkelman and others yearned for a chance to eventually recruit up to 1,000 men, the Haganah eventually decided to aim for a quota of approximately 300 volunteers from Canada. The best figures available indicate that about 5,000 "volunteers from outside the country", as they were called by the Haganah, or Machal in Hebrew, joined the Jewish forces in Israel's War of Independence. They literally came from all parts of the world; the largest contingents were from the United States, South Africa, the United Kingdom and Canada.

The recruitment campaign in Canada was to be entirely locally financed by funds raised secretly for that very purpose. The chief organizer of the overall fundraising campaign was D. Lou Harris, a Toronto businessman who worked closely with Samuel J. Zacks, president of the Zionist Organization of Canada and Zack's wife Ayala who had been an underground agent in France during the war and who had risked her life helping downed Allied flyers escape to the United Kingdom. In Vancouver, local lawyer Harold Freeman was asked by Harris to raise money on the west coast and help recruit local volunteers. In Montreal, lawyer Leon Crestohl, a Polish-born graduate of both McGill University and the Université de Montréal who had worked for the government during the war, was one of the key personnel, along with Moshe Myerson, a veteran of the Canadian army, and Sydney Shulemson, Canada's most highly decorated Jewish war veteran, who had pioneered ship-busting flying a twin-engined strike fighter for the RCAF.

Shulemson had a special assignment; as an air force veteran it was his job to find air crew, especially pilots, for an Israeli air force that was not even born yet. David Ben-Gurion was certain that when the war began in earnest, warplanes would be needed to protect the skies over Tel Aviv, to ferry men and supplies to outlying settlements cut off by the invading Arab armies and – if necessary – to bomb strategic Arab targets. Negotiations were already underway to buy war surplus transport aircraft in the United States and fighters from Czechoslovakia. The transports would also fly arms to Jewish controlled areas of Palestine from Czechoslovakia and elsewhere. Eventually the Israelis, as they were to become after May 15, even obtained three war surplus B-17 bombers in the United States and flew them to Israel via Czechoslovakia. Since there were very few pilots, let alone pilots with war experience in the Yishuv, it was vital to obtain pilots from wherever they could be found. At the end of the day, the majority of Israel's air crew came from the United States, Canada, Britain and South Africa. A few were not Jews, but men who came to fight either for the excitement or for the cause.

One of the most prominent – a man Shulemson recruited – was Canadian ace George "Buzz" Buerling who had shot down 31 enemy planes flying with the RAF and the RCAF to become Canada's highest scoring fighter pilot of the war. Buerling was on his way to the Middle East piloting a small transport plane when he crashed and was killed at Rome's Urbe airport just five days after Israel's independence. He is buried in an Israeli military cemetery in Haifa alongside several other non-Jewish volunteer pilots including Canadian Len Fitchett.

Aircrew from Canada, the United States and other countries flew directly to various points in Europe, then made their way to Israel either directly or via Czechoslovakia. The Czechs were the chief source of fighter aircraft and many other weapons because the Soviet Union was, at that time, a strong supporter of the new Jewish State. Transport aircraft flew constantly between Israel and Czechoslovakia either directly or via Corsica. Volunteers for the other fighting arms – mostly the army – were sent by ship to Le Havre, in France, overland to Marseille, then by steamer (or sometimes even via illegal refugee ships) to Palestine/Israel. Most were then gathered at a former British army base near Tel Aviv before being assigned to units in the Haganah.

The Yishuv had already built a sizable fighting force even before the partition vote. It was composed mainly of either veterans who had fought for or had been trained by the British in World War II or young men and women, mostly in the Palmach, who had been training in the forests, hills and deserts of Palestine since the 1930s. These young commandos had a thorough knowledge of the terrain and of their potential antagonists, but for them, as for the others, heavy weapons were in very short supply and almost no one had experience in modern open warfare.

Many extraordinary people

The Machal was intended to fill the gap. No matter how many young Jewish (or non-Jewish) enthusiasts wanted to come to Israel's aid, manpower itself wasn't the problem. Israel needed pilots and aircrew. It needed veterans of tank warfare, artillerymen, signals and communications personnel, logistics and supply experts, radar operators and men (and women) who had had sea duty in the recent war. It needed veteran non-commissioned officers who knew how to train soldiers. It needed veteran officers who knew how to plan complex operations or command tanks, planes and ships. In large measure the volunteers from Canada, the United States and elsewhere did fill that gap.

There were many extraordinary people among the Canadian volunteers, some of whom had never fired a shot in anger before. A number of them received their baptism of fire on May 11, 1948 as part of a Givati Brigade attack on Bash-Shit, home to some 1600 Palestinian Arabs, situated about three kilometres east of the main road between Tel Aviv and Gaza. Unimportant in itself, Bash-Shit was nevertheless at the junction of five dirt roads that had to be secured as part of a larger Haganah offensive known as Operation Barak. Half of one company of Givati's 2nd Battalion consisted of 27 Canadian volunteers known throughout the brigade as "the Canadian platoon."

Among the soldiers in the Canadian platoon were Toronto's Murray Cappell, Irving Kaplansky and Moe Dankovy, Syd Cadloff from Montreal and Lionel Drucker from Vancouver. Their Israeli officers seemed as young and untried as they were and the platoon ran into an ambush. Cadloff's leg was stitched by machine gun fire – he later lost it entirely – while Drucker and the three Toronto men, carrying a Spandau machine gun, tried to shoot their way out of the town. Luckily they were successful. They were subsequently transferred to the north of the country to fight the Arab Liberation Army, a group of irregulars and volunteers under the leadership of Fawzi-al-Kaukji which was threatening to cross the Lebanese border and seize all the Galilee. Their new unit was the 7th Brigade, commanded by Ben Dunkelman.

The chaotic early weeks of fighting were brought to a halt by a four week UN ceasefire order on June 11. There was no sign of a diplomatic solution since both the Arab Higher Committee – which represented the Arabs of Palestine – and the Arab League, which stood for the invading Arab countries, would not enter into direct talks with the Israelis. The ceasefire was a respite and in that respite both sides tried to rush as many arms and men into the fighting fronts as they could manage despite a UN embargo on such activity. The Israeli forces had held the Egyptians back from Tel Aviv and the Syrians from the upper Galilee, but the Trans-Jordan Arab Legion was dug in on the approaches to Jerusalem, and had besieged the old Jewish quarter. The danger remained of an Egyptian-Jordanian junction in the northern Negev which would truncate Israel at Beersheba. Ben Gurion was determined to go on the offensive in the next round.

When the ceasefire ended, Dunkelman had a large contingent of volunteers under command including Canadians and Americans. One of his battalions was commanded by Joe Weiner, a Canadian veteran of the Armoured Corps who led a motley collection of rebuilt halftracks mounting anti-aircraft guns and home-made armoured cars during one phase of an advance from the coast north of Haifa to Nazareth. The attack on Nazareth was part of Operation Dekel, designed to eliminate the threat from the Arab Liberation Army to the coastal plains north and east of Haifa and the largely Jewish-settled areas of northern and eastern Galilee. Not only did Dunkelman's forces take Nazareth, but Dunkelman interceded with commanders who had ordered him to chase Nazareth's residents out. He simply refused to carry out the order and eventually the Arabs were allowed to stay. In later fighting Dunkelman's brigade crossed the Lebanese border and drove the Lebanese troops up to the Litani River before the shooting finally stopped. About 10 per cent of his troops were volunteers. Other Canadians helped to defend the upper Galilee from Syrian attack and using the growing numbers of heavy mortars, machine guns, artillery and even tanks that began making their way into Israeli hands, helped to drive the Arabs back over their borders with but one exception – the Trans-Jordan Arab League retained its grip over the West Bank.

As the ground fighting raged, Canadian pilots and aircrew joined other Machal in the new airforce. They attacked Egyptian forces on the ground (that was how Fitchett lost his life), sometimes using Harvard trainers smuggled out of Canada and equipped to dive bomb. They flew Palmach troops from central Israel into the blockaded Negev to prepare for a breakout attack against the Egyptians. They flew twin-engine Dakotas and C-46 Curtiss Commandos equipped as horizontal bombers to hit key Arab junctions and strong points. One Canadian pilot flying a war surplus Spitfire even shot down several British RAF pilots in newer model Spitfires when they flew top cover for the Egyptian army in the Sinai in the last days of the war.

After the war, most of the volunteers returned to Canada and other countries though there were some notable exceptions. Joe Weiner wrote a manual of training for the Israel Armoured Corps before returning to Canada. Lionel Drucker and Arthur Goldberg, two youthful volunteers from Vancouver, started what later became the largest private tour operator in Israel. But there were very few opportunities for most of these men – the Jewish Agency seemed to take their volunteering for granted and failed to recognize how much their technical skill might benefit the new state. At the same time, hundreds of thousands of refugees from the Holocaust and the displaced persons camps in Europe and Cyprus started to crowd in to Israel almost immediately. No one seemed to have the time or patience to make a real effort at keeping the Machalniks. The war effectively ended in early 1949 and by early 1950, the vast majority of the volunteers had left for home.

Israel might have won the War of Independence without the help of the 5,000 or so volunteers around the might. If it had, it would have paid a much higher price and taken much longer. But the War of Independence forced the mostly covert militia army of the Haganah to begin to evolve toward a modern conventional military force. That new force – the IDF – would almost immediately have at its disposal an air force, a navy, an armoured corps, artillery, and modern communications, logistics, and supply centres. That was where Machal counted most. Their sacrifice was palpable – 80 Americans and Canadians were killed in action with an unknown number of killed and wounded from other countries. Perhaps Machal was even more important in a symbolic way – the Holocaust had united Jews all over the world as never before to help the birth of the new Jewish State. That state was founded primarily on the success of Jewish arms and the Machal contributed palpably to that victory.

FROM '48 TO '08: TORONTO CELEBRATES OUR JEWISH STATE

BY DANIEL HOROWITZ-

With Israel's special 60th Yom Ha'atzmaut birthday bash drawing near, Toronto is gearing up for what is expected to be the highlight of its year-long celebration of all things Israel with many festivities throughout.

But the biggest of them all will take place on May 8th, with more than 8,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community expected to celebrate at the Ricoh Coliseum. The evening of festivities, which has many surprises planned, will celebrate Israel's countless achievements, most notably in science and technology, agriculture, education, the arts, medicine and much more.

Even before the creation of Israel and certainly since its establishment, the bond when its very existence was threatened - and has never wavered in its commitment. Several prominent Torontonians have served in senior positions with the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) - UJA Federation's overseas partner - as well as with Keren Hayesod, the fundraising arm of JAFI, and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Thousands of our community members have visited Israel on organized missions since 2000 and more than 11,000 young Toronto Jews have participated in Taglit Birthright Israel trips since the inception of the program in 2000.

The chairs of UJA Federation's Israel@60 - Fred Waks and Sara Zagdanski - are both honoured and excited to celebrate our Jewish homeland's 60th.

"Being a child of Holocaust survivors, I understand how important Israel is to the community-at-large," says Waks. "And Israel at sixty years is definitely something for us to celebrate. We've invited every single community organization to participate in this, and that's something that is unique."

"I'm honoured to be involved because Israel is completely my passion and I have a special connection to both the State and its people," says Zagdanski. "I think it's extremely important to recognize - and celebrate - everything that's been accomplished by Israel in only sixty years, in spite of all the challenges and threats it faces."

When Yom Ha'atzmaut 5768 arrives, Waks will - appropriately enough - be touching down at Israel's Ben Gurion Airport aboard UJA Federation's Prime Minister's Mission while Zagdanski takes to the stage at the Ricoh Coliseum. But, regardless of where they are, both are certain it will be a night to remember.

"We have such tremendous pride in all of the achievements this little country has given the world," says Waks. "It's a time to have a little naches for the country that we're all so much a part of. This is going to be one amazing celebration."

"When reading the story of the exodus, we are always amazed at how the Israelites, who saw the ten plagues, the splitting of the sea, and received the Ten Commandments, could take it all for granted," says David Koschitzky, Board chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "Living today, with the State of Israel as a reality, many communities take for granted something that for over 2000 years was an impossible dream. We are so fortunate that our community of Toronto, time and time again, proves that we understand how important Israel is. We do it in times of emergency; how much nicer to be doing it to celebrate something as wonderful as Israel at 60."

"What a wonderful time – and a special opportunity – this is to celebrate all that Israel has contributed to not only Jews around the world, but to the world itself," says Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "Toronto and Israel have always had a special bond, a bond that grows stronger as each year passes. Our Israel@60 celebrations – and those in other cities across the globe – will provide a great opportunity to showcase Israel as one of the world's most creative, imaginative, cultural, productive and beautiful countries."

It was anything but business as usual at a session of the Provincial State Council in Tel Aviv at 4:00 p.m. on May 14, 1948.

On this date, just hours before Shabbat, the council members were about to proclaim a new State – the State of Israel, the first Jewish State in 2,000 years.

On Sunday, May 16, 1948, thousands of Toronto Jews flocked to Maple Leaf Gardens for a massive rally sponsored by the United Zionist Council of Toronto. "I remember marching along College Street as a proud member of the Jewish community, celebrating the establishment of the new State of Israel," says Mira Koschitzky, who was 12 at the time. "I'll never forget the wonder, excitement, and goodwill of that evening."

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

So you think you know Hatikvah?

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Hatikvah is Israel's national anthem and, most would say, the uniting hymn of Jewry worldwide. It's sung by millions across the world in schools, camps, community events, in the Knesset or almost anywhere Jews congregate for a formal occasion.

Though many know the words – whether by rote or by devotion – fewer know the rich history behind the song whose title translates into English as The Hope.

Originally, a nine-stanza poem, the song was written in 1878 by Naphtali Herz Imber (1856-1909) – a wandering Jewish poet and writer from Galicia – and was first titled Tikvateinu (Our Hope) as a reflection of his feelings on the founding of the city of Petach Tikvah that year.

The poem was first published as part of a collection of poems titled Barkai (Morning Star) in 1886 in Jerusalem.

Samuel Cohen, a Moldavian-born pioneer-farmer residing in Rishon LeZion, read Imber's poem and inspired, set the words to music using a Romanian-Moldavian folk song Carul cu boi (Cart and Oxen) as a template.

According to historical accounts, soon after the song grew in popularity with the Rishon LeZion pioneers, who sang it on their daily walks to work in the vineyards of Rehovot, and its fame quickly spread throughout the nascent Jewish state.

There is some dispute as to whether Cohen borrowed the tune from a composition by Cantor Nissan Belzer, but most research points to Cohen using his own Moldavian roots for inspiration.

Hatikvah's central musical theme can be heard in Czech composer Bedrich Smetana's 1874 symphony, The Moldau, which was also based on known Moldavian folk music.

According to various researchers, over the years Imber's words were alternately dropped or rearranged by Jewish pioneers in Palestine, as they co-opted his sentiments to fit their new lives and aspirations in the Holy Land, leading to the eventual phrasing we read today.

Hatikvah was also sung at the First Zionist Congress in 1897. By the time of the Sixth Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland, in 1903 – the last one presided over by Theodor Herzl – Hatikvah had become the de facto hymn of the Zionist movement, and was sung at all ensuing Congresses.

The song was officially adopted as the hymn of the Zionist movement at the 18th Zionist Congress in Prague in 1933.

Between then and Israel's birth in 1948, Hatikvah had, by virtue of its popularity among the chalutzim, become the unofficial anthem of Jewish Palestine under the British mandate.

When the State of Israel was declared on May 14, 1948, Hatikvah was jubilantly sung by a rejoicing Jewish People's Council at the Tel Aviv Museum.

In 1953, Imber's body was reinterred in the National Cemetery on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem. He had died in America after settling in New York near the turn of the 19th century.

Despite all this, Hatikvah was not formally adopted as the official anthem of Israel until 2004, when a Knesset vote finally entrenched the hymn as the country's national anthem.

The reasons for this 56-year delay were numerous. Among them were concerns voiced by Israel's Arab communities who refused to accept the anthem because its core wording refers to the "nefesh Yehudi" (Jewish soul), and is considered exclusionary by some of the country's non-Jewish citizenry.

Other reasons included movements by various Jewish parties to consider alternate songs for the anthem, such as the popular Naomi Shemer composition Jerusalem of Gold; Hayyim Nahman Bialik's Birkat Am and Psalm 126 or Shir Hama'alot, which is traditionally recited after meals on Shabbat, festivals and special occasions.

Regardless, Hatikvah won out in a Knesset vote of 38-8 on Nov. 10, 2004, to become state law.

The C/JN's retranslation of Hatikvah follows:

As long as a Jewish soul stirs
Deep in one's heart,
And we cast our eye
To the far horizon of the east and towards Tzion,
Our hope will not be lost.
The hope of 2,000 years,
To be a free nation in our own land,
In the land of Tzion and Jerusalem.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

A time of great hope

The visit to Israel by former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat on Nov. 7, 1977 ushered in a period of great hope for Israelis that the Jewish state might finally be able to live in peace with all its neighbours. Clockwise from top left, Sadat addresses the Knesset; he arrives at Ben-Gurion Airport and is met by leading Israeli figures; and he laughs at a joke made by former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin at a subsequent meeting in Sharm el-Sheik. We would like to take this opportunity to wish the State of Israel a hearty Mazel Tov in reaching this very important anniversary. And may we see peace in Israel and around the world.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Chaim Weizmann on a pre-State of Israel visit to Canada

'The highest expression of Zionist humanism'

*Excerpt from an address by Chaim Weizmann,
First President of Israel, on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the establishment of Hebrew University, April 1950.*

I am reminded of the finest days of the dawn of the Zionist movement. For many of us, the ideal of the Hebrew University was the highest expression of our Zionist humanism, embodying the dreams of our youth movement days and our endeavours in maturity. A Hebrew university in the Land of Israel meant a liberation from a condition of inferiority, the condition of Jewish youth at most of the universities of Eastern and Central Europe. The Hebrew University was destined to become the focus for the free development of the Jewish spirit; it was to provide scientific instruction and impart a moral influence to the builders of the new Zion. It was to lead the way to the synthesis between the spiritual heritage of our people and the cultural currents of our time.

Such were the ideals that animated us in those five early years of our movement. Some of them, though not all, have been attained.

The frightful calamity of the last two decades has left the Jewish people wounded in spirit no less than in body. Entire communities have been wiped off the face of the earth. Among those who perished were many talented and promising men and women. Now the problem of providing a higher education for the Jewish youth of Eastern Europe is no longer before us - because that youth is gone. The few who survived have made their way here, to the ancient homeland and much of what has been and being built up here is due to their efforts and their sacrifices.

Today the Hebrew University, no longer serving as a haven for Jewish students from abroad, is the new Israel's first alma mater. A younger generation of scientists, scholars and technicians has grown in the lecture halls and laboratories on Mount Scopus. Our achievements in the political, military, administrative and economic spheres would have been impossible but for the training and instruction provided by the Hebrew University. Indeed, it has laid firm foundations which, I am confident, will in the days of peace and security to come, provide the basis for a great centre of scientific education and fruitful research.

Israel's universities – the engine behind Israel's economic growth

In December 2007, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) published the best report any leading international body ever wrote about Israel's economy. "The economy is performing exceptionally well," begins the concluding statement of the IMF report. The report went on to forecast that "economic activity is likely to remain strong" noting too that household real income has been rising and that corporate profits and stability have improved.

Israel's industrial growth in 2006 was the highest in the Western World, and according to the Economist, expected inflation for 2007 is two to three per cent, third lowest in the world. Foreign direct investments in 2007 are expected to grow by eight per cent, reaching $15.3 billion as compared to $14.2 billion in 2006. Figures for the third quarter of 2007 show a five-year record in venture capital investment in the high-tech sector led by the communications sector, semiconductors, and the software and Internet sectors.

Israel's basic geopolitical realities remain unchanged since the state's establishment 60 years ago. Israel is one of the smallest countries in the world. Indeed, it is the 100th smallest country in the world, with less than 1/1000th of the world's population ... about the size of Belgium or the U.S. state of New Jersey. Yet despite its small size, both geographically and in population, and despite the absence of any natural resources of any significance, and despite the fact that the country is in an ongoing state of constant war and conflict with its neighbours, Israel is today recognized as a world leader in science and technology, second only to Silicon Valley in California.

Some salient facts:

- Israel's $157 billion economy is larger than the economies of all of her immediate neighbors combined.
- Israel is home to the highest number of high-tech and startup companies in the world after the United States – more than 3,000 high-tech companies, and 1,500 start-ups.

Left, Robert Aumann, of Hebrew University, was awarded the 2005 Nobel Prize in Economics for his work on conflict and co-operation through game-theory analysis. He shared the prize with Thomas Schelling. Right, Avram Hershko, and Aaron Ciechanover, of the Technion (along with Irwin Rose of the United States) were awarded the 2004 Nobel Prize in Chemistry for the discovery of ubiquitin-mediated protein degradation.

• Israel is no. 2 in the world for venture capital funds after the United States, no. 2 in the world after the United States for the number of NASDAQ listed companies, and no. 3 in the number of patents per capita following the United States and Japan.

Only recently, in a lead article, the Wall Street Journal described Israel as "the best initiative economy in the world."

From 1967 to 2007, Israel's population grew from 2.6 to 7.1 million, of whom two million are immigrants. The Israeli gross domestic product (GDP) grew from $21.4 billion (in 2007 dollar terms) to $157 billion in 2007, a compounded growth of 630 per cent. GDP per capita, a measurement of the degree of economic development, rose by 163 per cent (2.4 per cent per year on average), and for the first time last year crossed the level of $21,000.

How did little Israel reach this level of achievement over the last decade despite two Palestinian uprisings; a long sequence of fatal terrorist attacks; several wars with her neighbours; maintaining a high cost of defence (nearly one-quarter of the GDP in the 2000 to 2006 period); the integration of massive immigration of nearly one million people from the former Soviet Union; and the competition and challenges of growing globalization?

There are at least five primary factors behind the growth and potential of Israel's economy.

Successive governments have encouraged foreign investment

1. National orientation

Following the 1967 Six-Day War, Israel set out to develop an indigenous science-based industry with sophisticated, new product-oriented, export-focused industrial research and development capabilities. And over the past decade, successive Israeli governments have made a strong effort to encourage foreign investment and trade and become technologically competitive. This included legislation aimed to attract foreign investment, reinforced by a strong banking system. The government encouraged Israeli and foreign companies (primarily from the United States) to form partnerships in which the Israeli firms focused on research and development, and the foreign firms on marketing and sales. Israel also linked both its companies and its venture capital industry to foreign financial markets. This approach led to a winning formula, i.e., R&D leading to either the development of new technologies or new products based on cutting edge technology. Free trade agreements were also signed with the United States and European Union to facilitate economic growth.

Government also provided strong support for the R&D sector, with conditional grants amounting up to 50 per cent of the approved R&D budget and grants for companies sub-contracting R&D work in Israel. Indeed, the percentage of Israelis engaged in scientific and technological pursuits, and the amount spent on research and development in relation to GDP are among the highest in the world.

In addition, there are a number of bi-national research foundations that provide up to 50 per cent of the R&D costs for joint R&D projects. Israel is also the only country outside of Europe participating in the European Union Sixth and Seventh Framework research initiative. Israeli researchers have been particularly successful in this highly competitive forum.

Nearly 100 leading international companies have established corporate R&D centers in Israel including Intel, IBM, Microsoft, Motorola, Google, Applied Materials, Cisco Systems, National Semiconductor, and many more.

2. Socioeconomic infrastructure

Israel has succeeded in developing the necessary physical, financial, and human resources needed to support a modern, technology-based nation. This is primarily a result of Israel's human capital, and the country's strong encouragement of foreign investment. Today, Israel leads the world in the number of scientists, engineers, and technicians in the workforce – 145 per 10,000 compared to 85 in the United States, 70 in Japan, and 60 in Germany. With over 25 per cent of its workforce employed in technical positions, Israel places first in the world in this category as well.

3. Technological infrastructure

The Israel of today houses the infrastructure needed to advance a high technology, science-based economy. These include a system for the protection of intellectual property rights, readiness for the application of R&D to industry; competency in high-technology manufacturing; and the capability to train highly-qualified scientists and engineers.

4. Productive capacity

Israel is home to a relatively large pool of skilled labour; made-in-Israel high-technology companies; and proven management ability. As a result, Israel has the highest number of start-up companies in the world after the United States, and it is no. 2 after the United States for the largest number of NASDAQ listed companies.

5. World-class research universities

Israel's achievements in high technology and science-based industries are a direct result of the presence of world-class research universities that provide the knowledge, the highly qualified scientists and engineers, cutting-edge research, personnel, and initiative to succeed in a global marketplace.

In a comprehensive study of the global marketplace published in 2006 by the National Science Board of the U.S. National Science Foundation, Israel and China received the highest scores of nations positioning themselves for future prominence as exporters of technology products in the global marketplace.

Israel's economic miracle could not have been accomplished without the leadership of the nation's research universities. It is the universities that provide the knowledge through innovative research and the highly trained graduates that ensure a strong and innovative Israeli economy. Israel's high-technology and science-based industries in particular are wholly dependent upon the nation's universities to provide the personnel needed to ensure their lead and growth.

Over 80 per cent of all published Israeli research, and almost all basic research and basic research training are conducted within the nation's universities. Israeli researchers publish more scientific papers per capita than any other nation (109 per 10,000 people), and in many fields, such as chemistry and computer sciences, they have a high impact on the world scientific community. Relative to the size of its labour force, Israel has a significantly large number of scientists and scholars who have published in the natural sciences, engineering, agriculture and medicine as compared to other countries. Indeed, over the last five years, no fewer than three Israeli scholars have received the coveted Nobel Prize – professors Aaron Ciechanover and Avram Hershko (winners in chemistry) from the Technion, and Prof. Robert Aumann (winner in economics) from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem – in recognition of their breakthrough discoveries in their respective fields, evidence of the high level of science and research in Israel.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Research guarantees future

In order to ensure Israel's place in the international academic community, Israeli institutions encourage post-doctoral research and sabbaticals abroad as well as frequent attendance at foreign scientific conferences. The universities maintain and encourage a wide range of exchange programs and joint projects with leading institutions of higher learning around the world, as well as hosting international scientific conferences on a regular and frequent basis.

All six Israeli universities have established technology transfer companies for the commercial utilization of their research. The Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, Weizmann Institute of Science, and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem have established science-based industrial parks in proximity to their respective campuses to encourage interaction between scientists and the corporate sector. Indeed, it was the universities that pioneered "incubators" for developing technology allowing talented entrepreneurs to turn innovative ideas into products. The universities have also set up "spin-off" industrial firms for the commercialization of specific products based on their research, often in partnership with local and foreign firms.

The large number of patents issued by Israel's universities also indicates the effectiveness of the interactions between the universities and industry.

Interdisciplinary research and testing institutes are functioning at the universities in various scientific and technological fields vital to the country's industrial capability. And a high proportion of faculty serves as advisors to industry.

R&D - related products comprise more than one-half of the total of Israel's industrial exports (excluding diamonds). The key sectors include electronics; optics; computer-based equipment; robotics; and aeronautics. Israel's industrial strategy rests on fostering the growth of research and development in the industrial sector. And such activity is also wholly dependent on knowledge gained and personnel enlisted from the universities, particularly of graduate students, especially in the last decade, who have pursued advanced degrees.

As Israel looks to the challenges and opportunities ahead, its ability to remain a leader in the competitive high-tech world will continue to rely upon the nation's universities to produce innovative research and talented graduate professionals. A prime example is Israel's young and rapidly growing life sciences industry. This sector is focused on major diseases for which existing therapies are largely ineffective. These include treatments for cardiovascular and peripheral vascular diseases, oncology, neurodegenerative disease, and age-related diseases such as ophthalmic and orthopedic.

More than any other high-tech industry, the life sciences require long and expensive research.

All six of Israel's research universities offer high level studies in the life sciences, and no fewer than 35 per cent of Israel's researchers are involved in this field. Israeli universities are considered to have a competitive advantage due to their interdisciplinary approaches with other disciplines such as computer science, chemistry, and physics. The abilities and achievements of Israel's universities and its researchers will "make or break" Israel's position in this future-oriented, highly promising sector.

The Israeli economy is today heavily dependent upon the success and achievements of her high-technology and science-based industries, and this sector is in turn strongly dependent on the ability of the universities to employ outstanding scientists and scholars to pursue cutting-edge research and to graduate and train qualified and motivated personnel. As Israel approaches her 60th anniversary, this winning formula for success is now endangered by the government's dramatic reduction in the funding of higher education. Successive Israeli governments have reduced public funding of universities by no less than 25 per cent over the past six years - the deepest cut of any sector in the country.

Reduction in government support represents a real, long-term, strategic threat to Israel's ability to grow and thrive. Without world-class research universities, and without a well-trained workforce, Israel will not be able to maintain a modern, technologically oriented vibrant economy. Furthermore, if the universities cannot offer attractive, long-term careers to its young scholars and scientists, they will simply "vote with their feet" and pursue their careers elsewhere, including overseas, and other countries, mainly the United States, will benefit from their talents. And if the research universities cannot offer well-equipped teaching and research environments, academic standards will be adversely affected and Israel will not have the high level of trained manpower it requires to attract foreign investment and remain competitive in the global economy.

In a very real, strategic sense, Israel needs its research universities to remain in a leading position in order to guarantee its future.

In speaking before the Technion's Board of Governors meeting in 1959, in an address entitled "Israel and the Mission of Science", Israel's first prime minister David Ben-Gurion remarked: "The progress of man is built on three things: Knowledge, energy, and raw materials. Of the three, knowledge is the greatest for on it depends the discovery and utilization of the other two. Since the day when we began to build our new culture as an independent people in our ancient homeland, we have zealously striven to foster science, both pure and applied."

As Israel marks its 60th year of independence, we look toward the future with confidence in our abilities and the strength of our nation.

Yitzhak Apeloig is the President of the Technion - Israel Institute of Technology.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

The gradual progress toward gender equality in Israel

It has long been a Jewish tradition to evaluate any given phenomenon or situation in terms of the glass half full and that which is half empty. This seemingly evenhanded approach is as appropriate in relating to women's status in Israel as it is on any other issue.

The numerous positive changes and achievements of the past three decades, initially engendered primarily by sobering lessons learned from the Yom Kippur War and further fostered by invaluable moral and material support from the community of Diaspora women, are counterbalanced by profound awareness of continued discrimination, inferiority and even victimization.

By Alice Shalvi Born

Evidence of improvement in the role and status of women can be found in almost every aspect of Israeli life and society, due to the longtime existence of much admirable legislation dating back to the 1950s. There are currently 18 women members of Knesset; two of them, Tzipi Livni and Yuli Tamir, head major ministries, Foreign Affairs and Education respectively. The trans-party Knesset Committee on the Status of Women, which was originally established as an ad hoc body in 1992 but rapidly attained statutory status, has successfully initiated an impressive body of legislation and legislative amendments relating to women. Women currently constitute more than 30 per cent of elected members of local government and two of Israel's largest cities, Netanya and Herzliya, have women mayors heading their municipal councils. Furthermore, women now head some of the best known and most influential organizations in the "third sector," that of the non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that are playing an increasingly important role in creating a vital civil society, in advocating for increased and improved state action in funding social welfare and ensuring social and economic justice, citizens' rights and transparent democratic government.

Israel ranks second worldwide in the number of NGOs active in the country. Many of these are grassroots feminist organizations established by and dedicated to specific populations or issues: Bedouin women; Arabs; modern Orthodox Jewish women; Women in Black who demonstrate weekly under the slogan, "End the occupation"; Women in Green, who favour continued Jewish settlement across the 1967 Green Line (Israel's pre-1967 border); and Machsom Watch, whose members monitor Israel Defence Forces behaviour toward Palestinians at the checkpoints that operate on the border between Israel and Palestinian territory. There are also a number of more loosely organized groups, of both Jewish and Arab Israelis, who are actively engaged in dialogue with Palestinian women, both Muslim and Christian. All of these and hundreds of others now operate alongside the traditional, older organizations such as WIZO (the Women's International Zionist Organization), Na'amat (the Women's Division of the Histadrut Labor Union) and Emunah, the religious women's organization. All three of these are concerned primarily with providing day care and educational services, particularly for children of mothers in the workforce.

The business sector has witnessed an astonishing increase in the number of women entrepreneurs and CEOs, some of them extremely wealthy and influential. A similar increase has occurred in the legal profession. There are at present six women among the 12 members of the Supreme Court, current president of which is Dorit Beinisch. Indeed, the number of women lawyers, especially in the civil service, now appears to exceed that of men, just as women now constitute more than 50 per cent of law students.

Playing vital roles in all units of the IDF

Women's studies, long the despised Cinderellas of Israeli academia, are flourishing, producing a steady flow of groundbreaking research and publication, most of it readily accessible even to the wider reading public. While some courses in gender studies have existed at various universities since the 1980s, the first full BA program in Israel (indeed, in the entire Middle East) was established at Tel Aviv University in 1998. Overseas aid from the Ford Foundation and from U.S./Israel Women to Women facilitated an astonishing proliferation of women-related academic and non-academic activity and applied research, much of which served as a stimulus for political advocacy in favour of legislative innovation and change.

Culturally, Israeli women have also finally come into their own. A number are senior editors and contributors in both print and electronic media. Once rarely visible on TV screens, whether as newscasters or commentators, many now present their own, often highly influential, prime-time investigative programs. Some of them have exposed egregious examples of corruption, racism and gender discrimination. In entertainment, too, women are now major and highly influential innovators, whether as theatre directors, museum curators or performers. The country boasts an impressive number of women filmmakers, particularly of documentaries that relate to women's issues such as family violence, marriage and divorce. A similar trend is apparent in literature, especially in fiction and poetry. In 1987, when the Israel Women's Network organized the world's first international conference of women writers, there were only a very few Israelis who had works in translation to present at the reading sessions. None of them enjoyed the fame or status of colleagues from overseas, such as Grace Paley, Marilyn French and Rosellen Brown. They exuded a strong sense of inferiority and exclusion from the literary establishment. Now the situation is different. While no woman has achieved the worldwide acclaim accorded to Amos Oz, A. B. Yehoshua, David Grossman or Aharon Appelfeld, there is an ever-growing body of Israeli women's writing to be found not only on the Israeli market and bestseller lists, but also in translation to various European languages, and even Japanese.

Even in the male, macho stronghold of the Israel Defence Forces, women are now no longer auxiliaries, but are playing vital roles as skilled technicians, in intelligence and as instructors even of all-male combat units, though they themselves do not participate in front-line combat. Following the precedent-setting 1995 High Court ruling, based on the Equality of Men and Women Law, that women could not be excluded from pilot training simply on grounds of their sex, women now serve as pilots and navigators. There are high-ranking policewomen, and a woman recently headed the country's Prison Services.

The list of achievements could be lengthened even further, yet probably the most encouraging change, one that to a large extent underlies all the impressive progress that has been achieved, is the exponential growth of awareness of – and resistance to – discrimination, not only among women but also among an increasing number of enlightened, educated and well-informed men. This awareness is of vital importance, since without it there is no impulse to change and reform. And further reform is still required, for the half-empty glass can no longer be ignored, no matter how gratifying the contents of the other half.

There may be more women members of Knesset, but they are still less than 14 per cent of the total 120, and the majority of them no longer feel committed to the cause of equality between the sexes. It is perhaps significant that the Knesset Committee on the Status of Women is currently chaired by a man.

The number of women gainfully employed in the workforce has indeed increased, but they are still to be found primarily in the less well-paid "pink collar" service occupations such as teaching, nursing, social work, clerical work and customer service, and in the unskilled labour force, working as domestic help, waitresses and so forth.

Women's average wage is lower than that of men by some 30 per cent, even when they are doing identical work. More women than men are unemployed, and women heads of households constitute the majority of those eligible for National Insurance Income Supplements (social welfare), which have recently been radically reduced. Thus more women and children than ever before are living below the poverty line.

In 1996, when the Israel Women's Network first brought trafficking of women to the attention of the government and the general public, its findings were greeted with disbelief and, in consequence, inaction. Now there is a law prohibiting the trade in women, yet police action remains inadequate, Israel is high on the list of the world's worst offenders and the women victims continue to be treated as though they, rather than their handlers or clients, are the offenders.

The Israel Defence Forces can boast of more women at higher ranks, but they are still absent from the General High Command, which makes the most important decisions, including whether or not to go to war. Since women constitute the majority of peace activists and have even established their own peace-oriented organizations, it is not unreasonable to surmise that were there more women involved in security-related decision making, on both the Israeli and the Palestinian side, greater progress might be made toward the resolution of the ongoing bloody conflict. In July 2005, the Knesset did indeed pass a law, proposed by two women MKs, requiring the government to include women in any group appointed for peace negotiations. This was in line with UN Resolution 1325, but the law has not yet been implemented, nor does it seem likely to be enforced.

Encouraged by a law that now criminalizes sexual harassment and supported by admirable feminist groups such as the rape crisis centres, more women are finding the courage to lodge complaints against the perpetrators of one of Israel's most widespread practices. Sexual harassment, especially of women subordinates, in the military, academia and other places of employment, was long tolerated by society at large and accepted even by women as something they had to endure, rather than risk non-promotion or dismissal. Sometimes women were even expected to be proud of being sex objects. The situation was succinctly summed up about 25 years ago in the well-known dictum of President Ezer Weizmann when he was still Commanding Officer of the elite Israel Air Force: "The best men go to be pilots; the best women go to the pilots." Nobody took exception at the time, but it is fair to assume that, were any public figure to make so outrageously hubristic a statement today, he would at once be forced to retract it and to offer a public apology.

There is also now far greater awareness of widespread spousal abuse, wife beating and even murders. The victims more readily report abuse to the police, and their complaints more frequently lead to police action and restraining orders. Yet the violence continues, and among the Arab population so-called "honour killings" of women suspected of pre-marital or extra-marital sexual relations even go unreported. Only recently have the women of one family, nine of whose members have been murdered, dared to report the crimes to the authorities and request protection against further attempts on their lives.

One important subject in which virtually no progress has been made is that of women in the religious sphere. Despite strong moral and financial support from the Diaspora, which has helped them survive years of appealing to the Supreme Court, the Women of the Wall are still denied the right to pray at the Western Wall wearing prayer tallit and tefillin or to raise their voices in song and prayer. But while this edict affects only a relatively small number, thousands are victims of religious courts, both Jewish and Muslim, in which women's legal status is inferior to that of men. No woman can be divorced without her husband's acquiescence, and the number of "anchored" women (agunot) currently living in the limbo of neither leading a real married life nor enjoying the freedom of divorce is estimated as being in the thousands.

The International Coalition for Agunah Rights, founded in 1990 at the initiative of the Israel Women's Network, is a unique organization which brings together women of every religious stream – Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and secular – and includes virtually every women's organization in Israel and many in the Diaspora. Over the years, its members have demonstrated outside the headquarters of the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, held meetings with the chief rabbis, submitted petitions and proposed solutions, aroused media attention and enlisted the support of many public figures – but to no avail. Personal status (conversion, marriage, divorce) remains under the sole jurisdiction of the Orthodox rabbinical establishment, all of whose members are men.

In fact, tradition – and especially that based on religious law, principles and practice, whether Jewish, Muslim or Christian – is still the overriding factor in social definition. It continues to perceive women's primary role as being that of the helpmate – the wife, mother and homemaker. Women are expected to marry and bear children. It is surely not by chance that while Israel's health insurance system covers the cost of expensive infertility treatments until the woman has successfully given birth to two children, contraceptive devices are not included in the "basket" of free or heavily subsidized health services to which Israelis are entitled.

To this discriminatory religion-based tradition must be added the ongoing military conflict, in which women play no part, whether as actual participants or as effective peacemakers. One may thus sadly conclude that, until Israel separates state and religion, and until such time as the armed conflict gives way to peaceful coexistence between Israel and its neighbours, erasing military considerations from the public agenda, there will be no true equality of opportunity, reward or status between the sexes. The glass may be steadily filling, but much still remains to be done before we can lift it and raise a toast to the attainment of justice, freedom and equality.

Alice Shalvi Born is an educator and social-feminist activist. She was the recipient of the Israel Prize for Lifetime Achievements in May 2007.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Jerusalem's Jews showed no fear during 1948 siege

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For Jews born after Israel's War of Independence in 1948, it is easy to take for granted that Jews all over the world have the freedom to visit and live in Israel. But Rhoda Lipkin-Perel, a 94-year-old woman who lived through the siege of Jerusalem in 1948, said she'll never forget the brave men and women who fought against all odds to ensure the establishment of an independent Jewish state.

Lipkin-Perel came from a Zionist family in Cape Town, South Africa, and moved to Rehavia in Jerusalem in 1935 when she was 22.

Soon after moving to Israel, she was offered a job at the Evelina de Rothschild School, a school for girls in Jerusalem, and met her husband, Zvi Lipkin.

"I married into the Lipkin family, and they were here for generations, born in Jerusalem, some in the Old City," she said, adding that her husband was working for the British government. "We had a pleasant life. On Saturdays, we would go to the beautiful King David Hotel."

She said they would sit for tea, entertain each other and talk politics with government officers who were her husband's colleagues.

But everything changed after World War II. In 1946, the King David Hotel, which was also the site of the British military headquarters, was bombed by the Irgun, a Zionist militant group that fought against the British for restricting Jewish immigration to Palestine.

The Irgun chose it as a target after British troops invaded the Jewish Agency a month earlier, and confiscated secret documents.

"At that time, the Irgun gave a warning, and John Shaw, the chief secretary of the British administration, said, 'Here, I give the orders,'" Lipkin-Perel said.

It has been reported that Shaw didn't heed the warning, didn't evacuate the building, and more than 90 people were killed in the attack.

"We lost a lot of our friends," she said.

The Jewish minority continued to fight through underground organizations including the Haganah, the Jewish defence force, and the Irgun.

She said she would never know who was involved with the underground, and often it was those she'd least expected.

She remembered a "jolly, plumpish lady who baked marvellously" and owned a bakery.

"Do you know what I learned she was doing? The Hadassah Hospital used to be near the bakery before it was on Mount Scopus. The doctors would come in for pastries and coffees, and the British would come in and search. Where did she hide the armaments? In the dough."

Lipkin-Perel also played her role in helping the Jewish cause.

When members of the Haganah were operating out of Katamon, a town about 20 minutes from her home, they took over an apartment and erected an apparatus that enabled them to intercept British communications. Eventually, they cracked the code of the British police.

But most had trouble understanding the British accents, and Lipkin-Perel was one of the few who could.

"I had to go. I was young, leaving my kids at night. We'd listen to the police. There was one horrible night. I still want to weep," she said, becoming emotional as she recalled what happened.

"I was there with another man. And we heard that the police had picked up two boys, two Jewish boys... and they just threw them to the Arabs. There were a lot of these incidents."

In the midst of the violence, the British pulled out of Palestine in 1947, and in November of that year, the UN General Assembly approved Resolution 181 to partition Palestine into two states — one Jewish and one Arab.

She said that when it was announced that the partition passed by the UN, she remembered staying up all night by the radio.

She said that while people celebrated in the streets of Tel Aviv, in Jerusalem, the atmosphere was much more contained because there was so much more to worry about and deal with.

Lipkin-Perel said that soon after the resolution passed, the violence escalated between the Arabs, who rejected the resolution, and the Haganah and the Irgun. She said that being surrounded by millions of Arabs, she couldn't imagine that the Jews in Jerusalem would survive.

"When the British pulled out, they had built over the years forts and police stations, and all these were handed over to the Arabs in very strategic positions. They definitely got support," she said.

Soon after, the Siege of Jerusalem began. For weeks at a time, Arabs cut the Jews off from food, water and were placed under a strict 7 p.m. curfew.

"The siege was terrible because they cut the water pipes, and there was very little water. We were fortunate that Jerusalem always had cisterns, and they would come around once every two weeks or whenever, and you got a bucket of water," she said.

She said that despite the fact that the Jews had been at war with the Arabs and the British since 1946, it wasn't until the siege in 1948 that she really feared for her life.

"Guns were firing day and night. It was a terrifying time. I had very young boys," she said, adding that they were nine and three at the time.

"During the siege, we were all terrified. There were people who hid under tables. It was a terrible, terrible time, and I think a lot of it, I've blocked out of my mind because it was too [traumatic]. I didn't know if we would get out alive... We didn't know if the world had forgotten us. You mustn't forget there wasn't a TV like today, there weren't helicopters to bring in food, and no food was brought in until [Haganah] made the Burma Road across the mountains," she said.

"People were starving. People were eating the grass... One thing that saved us when we were absolutely cut off from food was that there was an Arab man in my husband's office, and he... brought us a tin of oil, a bag of rice and a bag of sugar... We divided this with family and it wasn't food, but it was food," Lipkin-Perel said.

"I think a lot of the world didn't realize how starved we were, how frightened we were and how in danger we were... I think a lot of people even in Israel didn't know what we were going through. All they had to do was march and starve us out... Even to go out to get your bucket of water, you could have been killed. They were just shooting and bombing."

Lipkin-Perel said that before the siege, she had an Armenian maid named Mary from the Old City.

She said that they liked each other very much, but Lipkin-Perel decided that it would probably be best for both of them if Mary stopped working for her because the Arabs might consider her a traitor for working for a Jew.

"We regretfully parted. One day there was a knock at the door, and Mary and her sister brought a big basket full of vegetables because we had no vegetables or food for the children. Now, I made some coffee, but I didn't know if she had come to spy, or she was my friend," she said.

"I'd learned already, that you don't take gifts, but as much money as I had in my house, I gave her, and I blessed her and I thanked her, and she spent a little while with me. We didn't talk politics."

She said that soon after this visit, when her husband was away for work, she got a phone call at about 10 p.m.

"I was one of those really privileged to have a phone... The phone rings and the children are asleep, and it's Mary. She says to me, 'Mrs. Lipkin,' as I was then. 'Please take your children and go to South Africa.'"

Mary, who was working for a very well-known Arab doctor, told her that there was a meeting and she'd heard them say they were going to kill all the Jews in Jerusalem.

"I wasn't sure if she was telling me this to frighten me, or to be a friend. You don't know what to think. The one thing we were taught was not to show fear. And we would walk down to Jaffa Road and say, 'It will be good. Yihyeh Tov. I had to think quickly. I said to Mary, 'Tell the doctor we Jews don't want war. But for every Jew they kill, we'll kill 100 Arabs. Good night.'"

Throughout the fear, the shortages of food and water and the violence that claimed thousands of lives, the Jews persevered and Israel was declared an independent state in May of 1948.

But the war had taken its toll on Jerusalem.

"Between '48 and '51, it was a sad city because the Israeli government had moved to Tel Aviv," said Lipkin-Perel, who also moved to Tel Aviv in 1951.

"That's what Jerusalem was made up of. So when all of us left, it was a sad, sad city with very little food."

Lipkin-Perel's husband, Zvi Lipkin, died of a heart attack in the early 1950s, and she later met a South African man in Israel. She remarried, and in 1956, they went back to Cape Town.

Although it's been 60 years since she and her family lived through Israel's War of Independence, she is still in awe of the fact that the Jews came out on top against all odds.

"You would have thought it was impossible to have a Jewish state in 1948. Not to be all killed in Jerusalem. That was a miracle. In that siege, we could have been finished... [But] we had the bravest army. Those men were absolutely marvellous, the bravest army. We've got no alternative, this was our feeling. We had no alternative and we've got to have a homeland. Otherwise, we're not safe anywhere."

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

UIAFC and Israel:

Israel is celebrating a 60th birthday. If the state were a person we would wish Bis 120 – and kvell that we were halfway there! As a country, we are in fact just in our infancy – but – what a tremendous Jewish achievement to have reached this milestone! It is truly a cause for celebration as well as a time for reflection! Let's review for a moment what has been accomplished in our short history and what we can expect of the future. For United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC), this landmark speaks to its very core and purpose. In fact, UIAFC which is celebrating its 40th anniversary this year was created in order to have a vehicle through which Canadian Jewry could support Israel both financially and socially. What a successful partnership we have enjoyed!

In so many ways, the history of the UIA's relationship with Israel mirrors the history of the state itself. We shared the early pioneering and Zionist ideals and values: we shared moments of great excitement such as the founding of the state and the related optimism as it grew and developed, and we shared the tremendous pride of helping to ensure that all Jews had a safe place to go – their homeland. We have stood proudly with Israel in times of greatness and glory just as we have stood steadfastly with her in times of distress and crisis. We have been with Israel in every sense even before its official birth and through all of its stages of development through to maturation.

Our connection and responsibility goes beyond the traditional areas of support such as social welfare programming and educational initiatives. This is particularly evident as we work to ensure that Israel's concerns and issues are understood not only in our own community, but among those who are in positions of influence in the public domain. We confront the skeptics and the cynics while trying to instill an understanding of Israel's needs and challenges as we continue to engage people from all ends of the political spectrum. We work to enlarge Israel's circle of friends and supporters from diverse environments.

We will always reinforce the mantra that as Jews, we are all responsible for one another. Israel, like any other modern industrial society, regardless of its enormous successes in a variety of sectors, has ongoing social and educational challenges, and with our support, is working tirelessly at attacking the problems.

Since its inception, UIAFC has been active at every pivotal moment in the evolution of Israel. We participated in Operation Magic Carpet, Operation Exodus, Operation Moses and Operation Solomon. We continued to visit and to send our children on trips to Israel during the intifadah, because we clearly understood that our presence was crucial to the morale of our brothers and sisters and we also understood that our risks paled in comparison to the daily risks taken in Israel by average citizens of all ages.

In the most recent days of the Second Lebanon War, Canada was among the first countries to galvanize support across the country and mount a nationwide emergency campaign that resulted in outstanding and unprecedented levels of giving. Not only were the results of these fundraising efforts incredibly robust, but the quick receipt of funds had a major impact on the ground. We are very proud that our infusion of $45M has been so far reaching. We have made a major contribution to post-secondary education, in helping with the expansion of Tel Hai College. Tel Hai College is not only an excellent educational institution catering to students from all parts of the country, it also is among the largest employers in the north. Canadian funds have contributed to the college itself and have facilitated in the building of the dormitories for the student population in Kiryat Shmonah.

Our support extended beyond the financial. Concurrent with the emergency fundraising, we continued to send missions, and organized some special ones to show not just moral support but to really be there on the ground seeing how we could be helpful. Our professional team based in Jerusalem provided unbelievable support and commitment above and beyond the call of duty. And our Israel experience travel groups completed their summer program in Israel, albeit in a modified way and we continue to do so in record numbers. We were there with full unequivocal conviction.

The priorities of the Jewish Agency, our primary partner, have been incorporated into UIAFC's priorities, aliyah and klitah. Educating youth at risk are examples of two such priorities. Collectively, we have ensured that there are adequate resources to welcome and integrate new immigrants and to provide them with the tools and skills to become independent and contributing members of the Israeli society. We have been present through it all, and we are still there supporting aliyah and klitah while ensuring that there are adequate resources to guarantee the successful integration of all who want to make Israel their home. We have worked together with respect to our young people, on such innovative programs as Youth Futures, which are designed to provide youth at risk with a significant intense mentoring relationship. We expect that these relationships will provide a positive role model that will be an influence on actualizing the potential for success. We help to ensure that all young people get opportunities that may be lacking in their own social or family environment. Our goal is to help strengthen communities as a whole and to assist in helping them to reach their potential. We are experiencing great success!

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Standing proudly together throughout all times

Imagine the excitement that we have felt in helping to transform a barren country into a flourishing metropolis. In the early days of Project Renewal we worked in development towns such as Yerucham and Beit Dagan, assisting them in raising the standard of living and enhancing their capacity to manage themselves effectively. We built early childhood centres which provided a supportive educational experience for young children while at the same time we facilitated the re-entry of young mothers into the workforce. We invested in after-school care for the very same reasons. We developed residential programs for young people who were not able to live with their families or who had no families. We contributed to the innovative work with children and adults who have special needs whether they are physical, developmental or emotional.

And we continue to provide expertise, and support, along with our funds to develop programs and projects that continue to benefit these regions.

More recently, we evolved to a partnership program based on common objectives, aimed at creating long-lasting people-to-people relationships that were mutually beneficial and fulfilling. We focused all of our Canadian partnerships in the peripheral regions, in Be'er Sheva, in Eilat/Eilol, in the Galilee Panhandle. The choice of these regions was based on the understanding that there is a strategic need to reinforce and strengthen regions of the periphery and to expand and deepen the repertoire of services and their capacity to work independently. In so doing, we gained a mutual understanding of how to contribute to the overall common good. We continue to support disadvantaged areas in growing their capacity as we have always done, but we now do it collaboratively. We exchange, we learn from each other, we share experiences and expertise. We have become increasingly creative in finding common interests and new ways of connecting and we continue to do so successfully. Not only do Canadians visit Israel, Israelis visit Canada. Today we are extremely pleased and excited to welcome Israeli volunteers to the circle, working side by side with Canadian volunteers, shaping the activities and programs in each of our partnership regions. The development of indigenous leadership is truly becoming a reality.

We can proudly state that our partnership continues to evolve, and we continue to add new members. Our traditional NGO partners are now being complemented by an emerging group of Israeli philanthropists, individuals who have succeeded in business, and who are increasingly active and interested in working together on many of our projects. This latest development presents new opportunities for building together that take our collaborative spirit to a new level, never before imagined. The possibilities continue to grow exponentially and things that we only dared to imagine are actually becoming realities.

Our partnership with Israel is emotional and practical. It is also Jay and Amy Papernick of Thornhill, Ont., with the aid and support of UIAFC, helped organize a festive Rosh Hashanah meal for newly arrived immigrants at the Tzahal Absorption Center Tsfat. physical. And it can be communal and individual. We facilitate relationships on all levels, and we create opportunities for collective contributions as well as individual projects.

Nothing represents Canada's commitment to Israel and her citizens more concretely than the range of capital projects that are evident all over the country. Among these projects is one that stands above the rest, and best symbolizes Canadian support. It is Canada Centre in Metulla. This athletic and recreational facility was built by UIAFC as a way of enriching the lives of the residents of the area, and of attracting others to visit and participate in the variety of programs and activities that are offered. Canada Centre has experienced good times as well as difficult times. Its very location, which is close to the Lebanese border, has been an important factor in its history. Just recently, UIAFC made a strategic decision to reinvest in the centre in order to allow the facilities and the programs to be renovated and updated. It is undoubtedly our Canadian flagship and we are proud of its contribution to the country. Without the introduction of Canada Centre, ice hockey would never have been introduced into the Israeli society!

We are so proud of the way in which UIAFC and Israel have forged an unwavering and intertwined relationship. We are proud of our strong engagement and of our continuous and mutual support. We will continue to nurture this special relationship, to deepen it, to update it in accordance with changing realities and capacities, but we will always be there for ourselves, for our children and for generations to come. We will do whatever may be required to ensure that our next generation of leaders follows in these footsteps and stays connected and invested.

Would it be presumptuous to say that the destiny of Israel and UIAFC are interlinked? Maybe, but it would not be far from the truth. And so we say, mazel tov, Ishatzlacha, and we hope and pray that we all have the required wisdom and strength to deal with the challenges of the day so that there will always be a safe and secure tomorrow.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Israeli Ambassador Chaim Herzog's response in the General Assembly of the United Nations on Nov. 10, 1975 to the infamous Zionism Is Racism resolution

Mr. President,

It is symbolic that this debate, which may well prove to be a turning point in the fortunes of the United Nations and a decisive factor in the possible continued existence of this organization, should take place on Nov. 10. Tonight, 37 years ago, has gone down in history as Kristallnacht, the Night of the Crystals. This was the night in 1938 when Hitler's Nazi storm-troopers launched a co-ordinated attack on the Jewish community in Germany, burned the synagogues in all its cities and made bonfires in the streets of the holy books and the scrolls of the holy law and Bible. It was the night when Jewish homes were attacked and heads of families taken away, many of them never to return. It was the night when the windows of all Jewish businesses and stores were smashed, covering the streets in the cities of Germany with a film of broken glass which dissolved into the millions of crystals which gave that night its name. It was the night which led eventually to the crematoria and the gas chambers, Auschwitz, Birkenau, Dachau, Buchenwald, Theresienstadt and others. It was the night which led to the most terrifying Holocaust in the history of man.

By Chaim Herzog

UN resolution an assault on Judaism

It is indeed befitting, Mr. President, that this debate, conceived in the desire to deflect the Middle East from its moves towards peace and born of a deep pervading feeling of anti-Semitism, should take place on the anniversary of this day. It is indeed befitting, Mr. President, that the United Nations, which began its life as an anti-Nazi alliance, should 30 years later find itself on its way to becoming the world centre of anti-Semitism. Hitler would have felt at home on a number of occasions during the past year, listening to the proceedings in this forum, and above all to the proceedings during the debate on Zionism.

It is sobering to consider to what level this body has been dragged down if we are obliged today to contemplate an attack on Zionism. For this attack constitutes not only an anti-Israeli attack of the foulest type, but also an assault in the United Nations on Judaism — one of the oldest established religions in the world, a religion which has given the world the human values of the Bible, and from which two other great religions, Christianity and Islam, sprang. Is it not tragic to consider that we here at this meeting in the year 1975 are contemplating what is a scurrilous attack on a great and established religion which has given to the world the Bible with its Ten Commandments, the great prophets of old, Moses, Isaiah, Amos; the great thinkers of history, Maimonides, Spinoza, Marx, Einstein, many of the masters of the arts and as high a percentage of the Nobel Prize-winners in the world, in the sciences, in the arts and in the humanities as has been achieved by any people on earth? ...

The resolution against Zionism was originally one condemning racism and colonialism, a subject on which we could have achieved consensus, a consensus which is of great importance to all of us and to our African colleagues in particular. However, instead of permitting this to happen, a group of countries, drunk with the feeling of power inherent in the automatic majority and without regard to the importance of achieving a consensus on this issue, railroaded the UN in a contemptuous maneuver by the use of the automatic majority into bracketing Zionism with the subject under discussion.

I do not come to this rostrum to defend the moral and historical values of the Jewish people. They do not need to be defended. They speak for themselves. They have given to mankind much of what is great and eternal. They have done for the spirit of man more than can readily be appreciated by a forum such as this one.

I come here to denounce the two great evils which menace society in general and a society of nations in particular. These two evils are hatred and ignorance. These two evils are the motivating force behind the proponents of this resolution and their supporters. These two evils characterize those who would drag this world organization, the ideals of which were first conceived by the prophets of Israel, to the depths to which it has been dragged today.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Dynamic, vibrant national movement

The key to understanding Zionism is in its name. The easternmost of the two hills of ancient Jerusalem during the 10th century B.C.E. was called Zion. In fact, the name Zion, referring to Jerusalem, appears 152 times in the Old Testament. The name is overwhelmingly a poetic and prophetic designation. The religious and emotional qualities of the name arise from the importance of Jerusalem as the Royal City and the City of the Temple. "Mount Zion" is the place where God dwells. Jerusalem, or Zion, is a place where the Lord is King, and where He has installed His king, David.

King David made Jerusalem the capital of Israel almost 3,000 years ago, and Jerusalem has remained the capital ever since. During the centuries the term "Zion" grew and expanded to mean the whole of Israel. The Israelites in exile could not forget Zion. The Hebrew Psalmist sat by the waters of Babylon and swore: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." This oath has been repeated for thousands of years by Jews throughout the world. It is an oath which was made over 700 years before the advent of Christianity and over 1,200 years before the advent of Islam, and Zion came to mean the Jewish homeland, symbolic of Judaism, of Jewish national aspirations.

While praying to his God every Jew, wherever he is in the world, faces towards Jerusalem. For over 2,000 years of exile these prayers have expressed the yearning of the Jewish people to return to their ancient homeland, Israel. In fact, a continuous Jewish presence, in larger or smaller numbers, has been maintained in the country over the centuries.

Zionism is the name of the national movement of the Jewish people and is the modern expression of the ancient Jewish heritage. The Zionist ideal, as set out in the Bible, has been, and is, an integral part of the Jewish religion.

Zionism is to the Jewish people what the liberation movements of Africa and Asia have been to their own people.

Zionism is one of the most dynamic and vibrant national movements in human history. Historically it is based on a unique and unbroken connection, extending some 4,000 years, between the People of the Book and the Land of the Bible.

In modern times, in the late 19th century, spurred by the twin forces of anti-Semitic persecution and of nationalism, the Jewish people organized the Zionist movement in order to transform their dream into reality. Zionism as a political movement was the revolt of an oppressed nation against the depredation and wicked discrimination and oppression of the countries in which anti-Semitism flourished. It is no coincidence that the co-sponsors and supporters of this resolution include countries who are guilty of the horrible crimes of anti-Semitism and discrimination to this very day.

Support for the aim of Zionism was written into the League of Nations Mandate for Palestine and was again endorsed by the United Nations in 1947, when the General Assembly voted by overwhelming majority for the restoration of Jewish independence in our ancient land.

The re-establishment of Jewish independence in Israel, after centuries of struggle to overcome foreign conquest and exile, is a vindication of the fundamental concepts of the equality of nations and of self-determination. To question the Jewish people's right to national existence and freedom is not only to deny to the Jewish people the right accorded to every other people on this globe, but it is also to deny the central precepts of the United Nations.

As a former Foreign Minister of Israel, Abba Eban, has written:

"Zionism is nothing more – but also nothing less – than the Jewish people's sense of origin and destination in the land linked eternally with its name. It is also the instrument whereby the Jewish nation seeks an authentic fulfilment of itself. And the drama is enacted in 20 states comprising 100 million people in 4 1/2 million square miles, with vast resources. The issue therefore is not whether the world will come to terms with Arab nationalism. The question is at what point Arab nationalism, with its prodigious glut of advantage, wealth and opportunity, will come to terms with the modest but equal rights of another Middle Eastern nation to pursue its life in security and peace."

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

'The embodiment of a unique pioneering spirit'

The vicious diatribes on Zionism voiced here by Arab delegates may give this assembly the wrong impression that while the rest of the world supported the Jewish national liberation movement the Arab world was always hostile to Zionism. This is not the case. Arab leaders, cognizant of the rights of the Jewish people, fully endorsed the virtues of Zionism. Sherif Hussein, the leader of the Arab world during World War I, welcomed the return of the Jews to Palestine. His son, Emir Feisal, who represented the Arab world in the Paris Peace Conference, had this to say about Zionism:

"We Arabs, especially the educated among us, look with deepest sympathy on the Zionist movement.... We will wish the Jews a hearty welcome home.... We are working together for a reformed and revised Near East, and our two movements complement one another. The movement is national and not imperialistic. There is room in Syria for us both. Indeed, I think that neither can be a success without the other."

It is perhaps pertinent at this point to recall that when the question of Palestine was being debated in the United Nations in 1947, the Soviet Union strongly supported the Jewish independence struggle. It is particularly relevant to recall some of Andrei Gromyko's remarks:

"As we know, the aspirations of a considerable part of the Jewish people are linked with the problem of Palestine and of its future administration. This fact scarcely requires proof.... During the last war, the Jewish people underwent exceptional sorrow and suffering. Without any exaggeration, this sorrow and suffering are indescribable. It is difficult to express them in dry statistics on the Jewish victims of the fascist aggressors. The Jews in the territories where the Hitlerites held sway were subjected to almost complete physical annihilation. The total number of Jews who perished at the hands of the Nazi executioners is estimated at approximately six million....

"The United Nations cannot and must not regard this situation with indifference, since this would be incompatible with the high principles proclaimed in its charter, which provides for the defence of human rights, irrespective of race, religion or sex....

"The fact that no Western European State has been able to ensure the defence of the elementary rights of the Jewish people and to safeguard it against the violence of the fascist executioners explains the aspirations of the Jews to establish their own state. It would be unjust not to take this into consideration and to deny the right of the Jewish people to realize this aspiration."

How sad it is to see here a group of nations, many of whom have but recently freed themselves of colonial rule, deriding one of the most noble liberation movements of this century, a movement which not only gave an example of encouragement and determination to the peoples struggling for independence but also actively aided many of them either during the period of preparation for their independence or immediately thereafter.

Here you have a movement which is the embodiment of a unique pioneering spirit, of the dignity of labour, and of enduring human values, a movement which has presented to the world an example of social equality and open democracy being associated in this resolution with abhorrent political concepts.

We in Israel have endeavoured to create a society which strives to implement the highest ideals of society – political, social and cultural – for all the inhabitants of Israel, irrespective of religious belief, race or sex.

Show me another pluralistic society in this world in which despite all the difficult problems, Jew and Arab live together with such a degree of harmony, in which the dignity and rights of man are observed before the law, in which no death sentence is applied, in which freedom of speech, of movement, of thought, of expression are guaranteed, in which even movements which are opposed to our national aims are represented in our parliament.

The Arab delegates talk of racism. What has happened to the 800,000 Jews who lived for over 2,000 years in the Arab lands, who formed some of the most ancient communities long before the advent of Islam. Where are they now?

To build a society

The Jews were once one of the important communities in the countries of the Middle East, the leaders of thought, of commerce, of medical science. Where are they in Arab society today? You dare talk of racism when I can point with pride to the Arab ministers who have served in my government; to the Arab deputy speaker of my parliament; to Arab officers and men serving of their own volition in our border and police defence forces, frequently commanding Jewish troops; to the hundreds of thousands of Arabs from all over the Middle East crowding the cities of Israel every year; to the thousands of Arabs from all over the Middle East coming for medical treatment to Israel; to the peaceful co-existence which has developed; to the fact that Arabic is an official language in Israel on a par with Hebrew; to the fact that it is as natural for an Arab to serve in public office in Israel as it is incongruous to think of a Jew serving in any public office in an Arab country, indeed being admitted to many of them. Is that racism? It is not! That, Mr. President, is Zionism.

Zionism is our attempt to build a society, imperfect though it may be, in which the visions of the prophets of Israel will be realized. I know that we have problems. I know that many disagree with our government's policies. Many in Israel, too, disagree from time to time with the government's policies ... and are free to do so because Zionism has created the first and only real democratic state in a part of the world that never really knew democracy and freedom of speech.

This malicious resolution, designed to divert us from its true purpose, is part of a dangerous anti-Semitic idiom which is being insinuated into every public debate by those who have sworn to block the current move towards accommodation and ultimately towards peace in the Middle East. This, together with similar moves, is designed to sabotage the efforts of the Geneva Conference for peace in the Middle East and to deflect those who are moving along the road towards peace from their purpose. But they will not succeed, for I can but reiterate my government's policy to make every move in the direction towards peace, based on compromise.

We are seeing here today but another manifestation of the bitter anti-Semitic, anti-Jewish hatred which animates Arab society. Who would have believed that in this year, 1975, the malicious falsehoods of the "elders of Zion" would be distributed officially by Arab governments? Who would have believed that we would today contemplate an Arab society which teaches the vilest anti-Jewish hate in the kindergartens?... We are being attacked by a society which is motivated by the most extreme form of racism known in the world today. This is the racism which was expressed so succinctly in the words of the leader of the PLO, Yassir Arafat, in his opening address at a symposium in Tripoli, Libya: "There will be no presence in the region other than the Arab presence...." In other words, in the Middle East from the Atlantic Ocean to the Persian Gulf only one presence is allowed, and that is Arab presence. No other people, regardless of how deep are its roots in the region, is to be permitted to enjoy its right to self-determination.

Look at the tragic fate of the Kurds of Iraq. Look what happened to the black population in southern Sudan. Look at the dire peril in which an entire community of Christians finds itself in Lebanon. Look at the avowed policy of the PLO, which calls in its Palestine Covenant of 1964 for the destruction of the State of Israel, which denies any form of compromise on the Palestine issue and which, in the words of its representative only the other day in this building, considers Tel Aviv to be occupied territory. Look at all this, and you see before you the root cause of the twin evils of this world at work, the blind hatred of the Arab proponents of this resolution, and the abysmal ignorance and wickedness of those who support them.

The issue before this assembly is neither Israel nor Zionism: The issue is the fate of this organization. Conceived in the spirit of the prophets of Israel, born out of an anti-Nazi alliance after the tragedy of World War II, it has degenerated into a forum which was this last week described by [Paul Johnson] one of the leading writers in a foremost organ of social and liberal thought in the West as "rapidly becoming one of the most corrupt and corrupting creations in the whole history of human institutions ... almost without exception those in the majority came from states notable for racist oppression of every conceivable hue." He goes on to explain the phenomenon of this debate:

I stand here not as a supplicant

"Israel is a social democracy, the nearest approach to a free socialist state in the world; its people and government have a profound respect for human life, so passionate indeed that, despite every conceivable provocation, they have refused for a quarter of a century to execute a single captured terrorist. They also have an ancient but vigorous culture, and a flourishing technology. The combination of national qualities they have assembled in their brief existence as a state is a perpetual and embittering reproach to most of the new countries whose representatives swagger about the UN building. So Israel is envied and hated; and efforts are made to destroy her. The extermination of the Israelis has long been the prime objective of the Terrorist International; they calculate that if they can break Israel, then all the rest of civilization is vulnerable to their assaults...."

"The melancholy truth, I fear, is that the candles of civilization are burning low. The world is increasingly governed not so much by capitalism, or communism, or social democracy, or even tribal barbarism, as by a false lexicon of political clichés, accumulated over half a century and now assuming a kind of degenerate sacerdotal authority.... We all know what they are...."

Over the centuries it has fallen to the lot of my people to be the testing agent of human decency, the touchstone of civilization, the crucible in which enduring human values are to be tested. A nation's level of humanity could invariably be judged by its behaviour towards its Jewish population. Persecution and oppression have often enough begun with the Jews, but it has never ended with them. The anti-Jewish pogroms in Czarist Russia were but the tip of the iceberg which revealed the inherent rottenness of a regime that was soon to disappear in the storm of revolution. The anti-Semitic excesses of the Nazis merely foreshadowed the catastrophe which was to befall mankind in Europe....

On the issue before us, the world has divided itself into good and bad, decent and evil, human and debased. We, the Jewish people, will recall in history our gratitude to those nations who stood up and were counted and who refused to support this wicked proposition. I know that this episode will have strengthened the forces of freedom and decency in this world and will have fortified the free world in their resolve to strengthen the ideals they so cherish. I know that this episode will have strengthened Zionism as it has weakened the United Nations.

As I stand on this rostrum, the long and proud history of my people unravels itself before my inward eye. I see the oppressors of our people over the ages as they pass one another in evil procession into oblivion. I stand here before you as the representative of a strong and flourishing people which has survived them all and which will survive this shameful exhibition and the proponents of this resolution.

The great moments of Jewish history come to mind as I face you, once again outnumbered and the would-be victim of hate, ignorance and evil. I look back on those great moments. I recall the greatness of a nation which I have the honour to represent in this forum. I am mindful at this moment of the Jewish people throughout the world wherever they may be, be it in freedom or in slavery, whose prayers and thoughts are with me at this moment.

I stand here not as a supplicant. Vote as your moral conscience dictates to you. For the issue is neither Israel nor Zionism. The issue is the continued existence of this organization, which has been dragged to its lowest point of discredit by a coalition of despots and racists.

The vote of each delegation will record in history its country's stand on anti-Semitic racism and anti-Judaism. You yourselves bear the responsibility for your stand before history, for as such will you be viewed in history. We, the Jewish people, will not forget.

For us, the Jewish people, this is but a passing episode in a rich and event-filled history. We put our trust in our Providence, in our faith and beliefs, in our time-hallowed tradition, in our striving for social advance and human values, and in our people wherever they may be. For us, the Jewish people, this resolution based on hatred, falsehood and arrogance, is devoid of any moral or legal value.

(At this point, Ambassador Herzog tore up the paper on which the resolution was written.)

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Israel: A miracle that renews itself every day

I

Sixty years after the establishment of the State of Israel, a self-interrogation seems in order. What is its place in Jewish history? Its role, its appeal? What does it symbolize? What does it demand of us? Was Ahad Haam right: a spiritual homeland only? Was the great historian Shimon Dubnov wise in refusing in the early '40s to leave Riga and go to Jerusalem?

For a Jew of my generation, Israel represents a miracle that renews itself every day. At times, it is difficult for us to relate to it and to the dream it embodies: we are seized by a strange, yet not so strange feeling that, personally and ontologically, we owe it something. Without Israel, would we have had the motivation and the strength to begin our life again and build on ruins?

Often I wonder: how did the Jewish people manage 60 years ago to rise up so soon from an oppressive state of mourning? Three years after the most murderous Jewish catastrophe in recorded history, it issued a challenge to destiny and proclaimed a new Jewish sovereign state on its ancestral soil. How did it succeed in creating such a dazzling shortcut between the dark tragedy of Auschwitz and the glorious victory of national independence?

Naturally, from a legal viewpoint, one credits the United Nations with this event. The last time, the United States and Stalin's Soviet Union voted in favour of the partition plan recommending the creation of two states, one for the Jews and the other for the Arabs. Six months later the Iron Curtain divided the world and the vote on Palestine would have been different. Thus in many quarters, political scientists and commentators maintain that Israel draws its legitimacy from that United Nations decision.

For Zionists among us, the answer is that we owe the Jewish state to the fervent and imaginative endeavours, all over the world of Zionist visionaries, writers and activists.

Jews were not alone in defending that aspiration. Remember Maxim Gorky's statement? "I am told that Zionism is a utopia. Perhaps. But in as much as I see in this utopia an unconquerable thirst for freedom, one for which the people will suffer, it is for me reality."

Other gentiles – writers and journalists, political personalities, businessmen in the free world – joined the movement. But that was not enough. The heroic underground operations of Zionist movements in Palestine – the Haganah and Palmach, the Irgun and the Stern group played their role in obtaining statehood for our people. They performed the miracle of creating a new nation in an old land.

Is that all? I beg to differ. I prefer to believe that we owe the establishment of the Jewish state also to the Jewish people at large who, in their prayers and dreams, kept Jewish memory and hope alive. Granted, the Baal Shem Tov's disciples made aliyah in the 17th century and were followed by young Zionists who left their families and friends to go to Eretz Israel to work there, build there, live there and fight there. But it was in the name of our entire people, faith and its history that the old fashioned Chassidim and the modern Zionists accomplished the miraculous rebirth of political life in Israel. The recent past embodies distant centuries when David and Solomon ruled there and imposed the will of God.

As a student of history, I love reading descriptions of Eretz Israel in the Middle Ages. There was never a time when the land was empty of Jews. I read Nachmanides' (the Ramban) letters to his family in Spain, Rabbi Nahman's dramatic journey to the holy land and understand why the descendants of prophets, sages and merchants were meant to leave a legacy that became contemporary Israel.

All of us could have joined them at one time or another but we did not. The reasons were varied and often personal. Let us state it frankly: History called us and we have not answered its appeal. We stayed in the Diaspora. Some did more for Zionism, others did less. When Theodore Herzl met the Turkish Sultan, he was offered Palestine for $7 million. He failed to raise them. Today the Jewish response to Israel's needs has vastly improved.

Is it because, in Diaspora, we all feel or must feel morally in Israel's debt? Is our love for Israel fed by frustration and/or guilt? I remain attached to Israel with all the fibres of my being. Is there another land where the distant past dominates changing events to such a degree? Where names of streets bring you back thousands of years? In Be'er Sheva you think of Abraham's faith, in Ashkelon you recall Samson's strength; on Mount Carmel, you hear Elijah's voice.

When Israel goes through crises, we are concerned, almost physically. Whatever happens there affects us. Thus we take part in its festivities and victories as well as in its anguish and sadness. We weep with the mothers who lost their sons in battle. We embrace young orphans and seek ways to comfort them. And when Israel is slandered, as it is now in so many quarters, we feel not only outrage but pain. Israel's wounds are ours. As is Israel's hope.

Thus we should perhaps redefine Zionism. Arthur Koestler once described the movement as "one Jew raising money from another Jew to send a third Jew to Palestine." No more. Today Zionism means love of Zion. It implies total solidarity with Israel. The dream of aliyah may remain valid and even burning but while dreaming, Jews conscious of their Jewishness ought to do whatever they can, and more, always more, to help our people in Israel.

That is why recent events in Israel touch us so deeply. We watch young Palestinians on the screen, their faces twisted with hatred and somehow we know that we too are their target. Their Moslem fanatics don't shout "Death to Israelis" but "Death to the Jews." Iran's infamous President Mahmoud Ahmedinejad again and again threatens Israel with extermination. And I am worried. Not because of their threats but of their implication. Their hatred is so pervasive, so perverse, so fatalistic, that it eliminates all possibility of reconciliation. But although I belong to a generation that learned to trust the enemy's threats more than the friend's promises, with all my heart and soul, I do cling to the ideals of peace, the loftiest and noblest of all.

It is urgent to attain it. There is no substitute to peace. Too much blood has been shed already on the soil of ancient priests and prophets. Too many families remain in mourning. This 60 year war must come to an end. In human relations, hatred must be abolished as option.

The Jew in me loves Israel in its joy as well as in its distress. Like its leaders and citizens, I pray for reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians. That day history itself will participate in celebration.

Israel: 60 Years of Independence

Jerusalem, the place that pulls all Jews together

II

The sound coming from the mountains, a melancholy song, a joyous prayer, a dream, a memory: this miraculous place reaching into heaven, I remember it as clearly and with as much intensity as I remember the child who cherished it. I think I pronounced its name before my own. A melodious name, a lullaby, evocative of a distant, familiar yet unknown past, a name that soothed even as it inspired awe, especially at dusk when children and wanderers are afraid to stay alone.

Seventeen times conquered and destroyed, and as many times rebuilt, this timeless capital of Jewish history has, if we are to believe ancient legends, two faces, two destinies. Earthly Jerusalem and heavenly Jerusalem; the one, visible filled with memories of lamentation and mourning; the other, intangible, promising peace and harmony. The two meet in those who place their faith and fervour in memory.

An image in the Talmud:

When the Roman legions, under the command of the wicked general Titus, prepared to ransack and burn the Temple, four angels descended from heaven and set fire to it, as though to demonstrate the impotence of the enemy when attacking God's city. Then, some young priests emerged from the burning sanctuary, climbed to the roof and addressed the Master of the universe: "We have been unable to safeguard Your dwelling, and so we return its keys to You." Whereupon they threw the keys toward heaven. And a hand of fire appeared, seized they keys and carried them away.

There was a time when I blamed those young priests: why give back those precious and sanctified keys? I would have preferred a more provocative language: "God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, You are free to renounce Your sanctuary, sacrifice your servants and do without Your people. But the keys are ours, they are our memories, and we are determined to keep them."

I remember: it was night. Hungarian Jews in the hundreds and thousands had just disembarked in a weird and accursed kingdom dominated by barbed wire, barking dogs, short commands, demented cries. Men, women and children torn from every land, bearers of every name in Jewish history, representing every facet of the Diaspora - I saw them converge on this place, and suddenly, in what I thought was a dream, a shattering idea crossed my mind: This is a moment of redemption and Kibutz Gahgot, the Ingathering of Exiles. Gone, the time of torment; gone, the era of darkness. The Third Temple, built in flames, was about to receive those who believed in its power to resist destruction. In a crazy way, for a fleeting instant, I wanted to laugh. Now I can die, I thought in my dream, we can all die, happy and at peace. In Jerusalem.

Then we all awoke to reality. We found ourselves in a place that will forever represent whatever Jerusalem is not: the unholy side of humanity, the destructive urge of man, the ugly hatred of those who replaced God with their own idols.

Another image, an exulted memory: Moscow, Simchat Torah 1965. That evening I thought I was delirious, so overwhelmed was my imagination by the unexpectedness, by the dynamic impact of what I witnessing. The event began at dusk. Suddenly the centre of the capital shifted from Red Square to the dusty Arkhipova street. To the alley next to the synagogue. For thousands and thousands of Jewish youngsters that hour, every road led to the same place. College students and labourers, soldiers and musicians, they arrived alone or in small groups, at first hesitant then elated, hair tousled by the wind, balalaikas swung over their shoulders. They came not only from Russia but also from Saragossa in Spain and York in England and Fez in Morocco. Wary but proud as they mingled with the crowd, they were greeted with shouts: "Long live this day, hurrah! Long live the Jewish people, hurrah!" Caught in the frenzy of the dance, they seemed to float on air, transfigured, torn from their shadows, rising above, above the present, as though climbing Jacob's ladder, the one that reaches into the seventh heaven and perhaps higher still.

I had not felt so strong in a long time, nor so proud. Before the courageous and valiant political dissidents, these youngsters dared to brave the brutality of the Kremlin and its secret police by claiming their kinship with the Jewish people everywhere. Watching them, I let myself drift into the past, into the future, into the clouds; luminous waves carried me to a unique place where words become songs: Jerusalem.

Then, still a third memory: Jerusalem 1967. The fighting was still going on at various fronts. Snipers were everywhere. But this did not prevent people in mystical ecstasy from running toward the Old City which had been inaccessible to all Jews while it was still under Jordanian rule.

Warriors and talmudic scholars, Chassidim and grocers, school-children and old dreamers, survivors of every hell, faces of every destiny - I saw them breathlessly running, almost flying, toward the winding alleys, the barricaded buildings, running to meet the wall. And there, incredulous and awed, like children afraid to wake up, they all came to an abrupt halt. Then somebody began to weep, others to pray, still others to dance. The entire country danced. Jewish history danced.

Bursting with joy and gratitude for the privilege of witnessing that moment, I thought: that is Jerusalem, the place that pulls all Jews together, the true city of eternal longing and promise. Never shall I forget that image, that scene, that day. What would my work and my life be without them?

The News in Brief

CANADA

Seifert Extradited

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed news that Canada had extradited convicted war criminal Michael Seifert to Italy, but it urged quicker action on other Nazi war criminals who lied about their past to get into Canada. Seifert was extradited Feb. 15 after a drawn-out legal process. Seifert, 83, was given a life sentence in absentia by an Italian court in 2000 for nine killings during his service as an SS guard at the Bolzano concentration camp in northern Italy in 1944 and 1945. Seifert began serving his sentence Feb. 16 in a military prison near Naples. In January, the Supreme Court of Canada turned down a request to review a decision allowing his removal to Italy.

AMSTERDAM — A 104-year-old Dutch singer who was a favourite of Hitler performed in his hometown amid protests. Johannes Heesters performed Feb. 16 in Amersfoort, 35 miles east of Amsterdam, for the first time since 1963, when he was booed off the stage. Dozens of protesters and a handful of neo-Nazis came to his Feb. 16 show. Heesters was a popular German-language singer and film star who performed for German soldiers in World War II. The singer, who now lives in Germany, has said he knew nothing about the Shoah, despite a visit to the Dachau concentration camp in 1941.

Survivor Raps Sarkozy's Shoah Program

PARIS — A French Holocaust survivor and former European Parliament president slammed Nicolas Sarkozy's new Holocaust education proposal.

Simone Veil told the French magazine L'Express that "her blood turned to ice" in response to the French president's initiative to pair every fifth grader with the profile of a child killed by the Nazis. Sarkozy announced his new idea in a speech this month to the CRIF, the umbrella organization of French Jewry.

"We cannot ask a child to identify himself with a dead child. This remembrance is far too heavy to carry," said Veil, a one-time Auschwitz deportee.

At a Feb. 15 education conference in southwest France, Sarkozy defended his proposal to pair every 10- and 11-year-old in the country with the detailed story of a child killed during the Shoah, saying, "We don't traumatize children by giving them the present of a country's memory."

JCC Attacked

LOS ANGELES — A Molotov cocktail was placed or thrown at a Jewish centre in suburban Los Angeles Feb. 18. No one was injured in the 2 a.m. attack at the back of the Bernard Milken Jewish Community Campus in West Hills, Calif. It's unclear who was responsible. Police are investigating

Israeli Dodged Bullet

LONDON — A retired Israeli general escaped arrest on war crimes charges when he flew to Britain in 2005, due to police fears of a shootout when El Al refused to allow them to board a plane in London and seize him. British police decided against boarding the El Al plane carrying Maj.-Gen. Doron Almog in September 2005 out of concern the plane's armed guards would open fire if they entered, the BBC reported last week.

Almog, an ex-head of Israeli forces in Gaza, went to Britain for a charity event, but was tipped off that a pro-Palestinian group had gained a warrant for his arrest. He stayed on the plane and flew home within hours.

Actor Wins Apology

LONDON — U.S. actor Will Smith received undisclosed damages and an apology Feb. 22 for allegations that he described Adolf Hitler as a "good person." The High Court in London ruled the statement, made in a Dec. 23 article on a website owned by World Entertainment News Network Limited, caused Smith deep distress and embarrassment. He will donate the money to charity.

Israel travel consul optimistic 2008 will be record year

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two thousand and eight is starting just like 2007 ended – at least when it comes to travel to Israel.

Israel's Ministry of Tourism reported a record-breaking figure for travel to Israel in the month of January, as some 182,000 travellers flocked to the country, a 57 per cent increase over the same period the year before.

That continues a trend set in 2007, when a record two million tourists visited the Jewish state.

The January figure has Israeli tourism ministry officials smiling and local tourism consul Oded Grofman confident that a new record for Canadian visitors to Israel can be set in 2008 – helped in part by celebrations of Israel's 60th birthday.

In a media briefing last week, Grofman said the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) has set a target of 65,000 Canadian visitors for the current year, a figure he called conservative, but which would exceed last year's record of 60,153.

The 2007 figure counts only those with Canadian passports who visited the Jewish state. If all travellers from Canada were included – including those with other travel documents – the figure would be 20 per cent higher, he suggested.

Grofman attributed the boost in tourism to an improvement in "the geopolitical situation" and to a strong loony, making it more affordable for Canadians to visit Israel.

Research shows Canadians spend an average of 10 nights and $1,355 in Israel, providing a substantial boost to the local economy, he said.

He added that most take a "classical tour," which includes trips to historic sites in Jerusalem, Haifa, the Dead Sea, Tiberias and Tel Aviv. Most stay in four or five-star hotels as part of organized tours.

While 25 per cent of travellers to Israel are Jewish, the IGTO is hoping to make inroads among Christian pilgrims and "sophisticated travellers," who might visit Israel for the nightlife, spas, restaurants and wineries.

Grofman said the IGTO is devoting substantial sums to promoting travel to Israel. Last year, its efforts included a $250,000 media campaign that ran from July to November. In addition, Israel hosted 24 journalists and two television crews, sponsored community and trade events, and launched a new website, www.goisrael.ca.

This year the IGTO will continue to cultivate relationships in the travel industry and among tour operators while strengthening its pitch to a number of ethnic communities that are beginning to discover Israel as a travel destination.

Grofman noted that Israel's image is improving. People who were once concerned about security now see that terrorism can occur anywhere – including New York, London, Madrid or Istanbul, he said.

In addition, Israel has been getting good publicity in various media. One-third of the high selling Sports Illustrated swimsuit issue was shot in Israel, and other publications feature the fun and cultural benefits of visiting the country, he said.

About $12 million has been allocated to the North American market to promote travel to Israel this year, and on March 4, the French-language version of goisrael.ca will be launched.

Two air carriers seem to share Grofman's optimism for growth. He noted that El Al will offer four weekly flights to Israel in the peak summer months, up from the current three, while Air Canada will increase the frequency of its flights from four to between five and seven.

After severe downturns in the tourism economy due to the Palestinian intifadah, travel to Israel has jumped in recent years.

Suggesting that Israel is enjoying a travel renaissance, Grofman noted that Russia, which used to account for 15,000 to 20,000 visitors per year, many visiting relatives, last year sent more than 100,000 travellers to Israel.

Russia is Israel's fastest growing tourism market, he added.

Greater Toronto Area*Light that will always shine

Four years and some two months ago, on Dec. 11, 2003, Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut's last column appeared in The CJN. To that date, he had been a regular contributor to the paper for more than two decades.

With tender honesty, he announced to his readers that he had been diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease. "I want you, my friends and readers, to know this straight from me," he wrote. "I will continue to do my best, but my best is no longer what it once was."

"How exactly can I do my best?" he asked? "Chazak, v'amatz," he answered. "I will attempt to be as strong as possible and muster up as much courage as possible."

Since he wrote those words, Rabbi Plaut has endeavoured to follow his own prescription. Last November, he turned 95 years old. But his voice, alas, is quiet now and he no longer picks up the pen to record his thoughts.

We miss him.

Moreover, the world is such that we still need him, his insights, his sage counsel and his historical perspective on current events.

Thus, the recent publication of the single-volume anthology of some of the rabbi's writings is a cause for individual and communal gratitude, if not celebration too.

One Voice: The Selected Sermons of W. Gunther Plaut (Dundurn Press, 2007) is a collection of 44 sermons and lectures, edited by Rabbi Plaut's son, Rabbi Jonathan V. Plaut. The Dec. 11, 2003, column in The CJN is also reproduced in the collection.

The filial love and respect of the editor for his father, the task of selecting the material for the book and the deep learning in each of the essays are evident in the book's introduction.

"My father is a Renaissance man – a scholar, a leading authority on Reform Judaism and a passionate supporter of numerous human rights causes. Why then, one might ask, should the sermons he delivered over a period of almost 55 years be now worthy of publication? The answer is simple: because each one of them is as timely and meaningful today as it was when first delivered from a pulpit."

Having read through the book, one can have no quarrel with the editor's assertion.

Jonathan Plaut has organized the works into eight broad categories that deal with religion; faith and God; ethics and values; being a Jew; Reform Judaism; Israel; age and generation; and death.

On which page of this collection do we not find scintillating, inspiring gemstones of wisdom from Rabbi Gunther Plaut? The controlled cadences and elegant vocabulary of his voice echo on every page.

And what is more, the subjects that concerned Rabbi Plaut and on which he offered his insights dealt with the large, ultimate issues of existence. We therefore have an opportunity to read his thoughts on questions such as: The Individual and the Cosmos, How Can I Believe in God?, The Meaning of Life, The Challenge of Freedom, Why Remain Jews?, Our Responsibility to Israel, and so on.

In speaking about the meaning of life on Yom Kippur, Sept. 18, 1972, he told his congregants: "At the roots of my being there is a conviction that merely to be is not enough, merely to live is not sufficient. Merely to breathe and exist is no warrant for true experience. For me, the values of life lie in my acceptance of life as meaningful. And so, when I am asked to make a choice between good and evil, life and death, I find this choice important rather than unimportant, meaningful rather than meaningless. Despite... the doubts in my own soul, I hold that a mitzvah is better than a sin or that doing a mitzvah is better than not doing it. I believe that there is a God who cares about man and who has built this caring into the very structure of life."

In a sermon delivered on Erev Rosh Hashanah, Sept. 22, 1968, on the subject of The Counterforce in Human History, he said: "The world cries 'Zionist' and we know they mean us and we are proud of it, we do not shrink back from it. The world cries 'Jew' and we respond, yes!

God says to us, 'Where are you, My people?' On this eve of another year, we respond with one voice, 'Here I am: Thy ways are dark, the road uncertain, but I believe – and here I am.'

Rabbi Plaut's voice is now silent, but he still has the power to stir our hearts. Sometimes we feel enveloped by darkness, but his words are a light that still shine. I have no doubt that many of us will turn to the pages of this anthology from time to time, seeking, as we inevitably must, the strength and the courage to contend with the struggles and travails in our own lives.

Rabbi Kelman honoured for lifetime of inclusion work

Rabbi Joseph Kelman

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Joseph Kelman is being honoured this week by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for almost five decades of work on behalf of people with special needs. The catalyst for his initial foray into the field, however, was as much happenstance as it was his innate optimism.

"It's a fantastic story," he said in a recent interview in his study at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where he is rabbi emeritus. Fantastic as in unbelievable, not just the kind of story – instructive, a bit humorous – that the rabbi likes to share.

In 1960, when Beth Emeth was a fledgling congregation, a congregant approached Rabbi Kelman to ask whether his developmentally delayed child – in those days they used the term "mentally retarded" – would be able to have a bar mitzvah.

To this day, Rabbi Kelman finds it hard to fathom how little he knew about the issue, having had no experience with special needs children. "You could say I was naive," he recalled. I said, "What are you worried about? We'll get a private tutor."

The father's initial silence was his first clue that there was more to the issue. But that child and others went on to celebrate their bar and bat mitzvahs after the rabbi instituted a bar/bat mitzvah program for children with special needs.

When the rabbi learned of another developmentally disabled boy in the neighbourhood, who was attending a non-Jewish camp, he was motivated to start a Jewish program for "retarded" children.

He contacted a downtown school for special needs children to ask for a list of their Jewish students. After being turned down twice, he called a third time to say that he didn't want to take the school's students away, but just wanted to start a Sunday school program. "I don't give up," he said, his words belying his low-key, affable manner.

"They gave me 20 names. I sent out 20 letters, and 16 came for a meeting." That was the beginning of Kadimah, a school that provided Judaic and Hebrew education for students with developmental disabilities. "Every Sunday we would sit down and map out a program for the following Sunday," he recalled of its early days.

A pioneer in the field, Rabbi Kelman developed a conviction early in his career that a person with a handicap is entitled to the same Jewish experience – or a similar one – as anyone else.

He went on to co-found Ezra, a program for students with learning disabilities; the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, to educate children with learning disabilities; and Reena, an organization that integrates adults with developmental disabilities into the community.

He chaired the North America-wide committee on special education under the auspices of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism for more than 30 years, and he was instrumental in having developmentally disabled children accepted into Ramah camps as part of a program now called Tikvah.

At the same time, the father of three (now a grandfather of 10), was also involved in prison and hospital chaplaincy, and was tending to the needs of his congregation as it grew from 100 families to more than 1,500 at the time of his retirement in 1997.

Kelman, who turned 80 last April, said he "sheps nachas" from his involvement with the various schools and organizations, using the Yiddish term to describe the pride and pleasure Jewish parents derive from their offspring.

At the synagogue, he still teaches, officiates at some life-cycle events and conducts High Holy Day services for non-members. He is also working on a book that will be partly autobiographical.

A recipient of numerous honours, he has travelled as far as Johannesburg to serve as a consultant on special needs.

This week's award ceremony, featuring Ontario Lt.-Gov. David Onley as keynote speaker, was scheduled for Tuesday, Feb. 26, at the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre. The first-time awards, the Community Inclusion Awards of Excellence, are part of the federation's broader Community Inclusion Initiative.

Rabbi Kelman's award is for lifetime achievement. Other recipients are Honey and David Levy for hosting an integrated summer camp program and including people with special needs at their Friday night dinners; Chabad Lubavitch's Friendship Circle, which matches teenage volunteers with children and teens who have special needs; and Camp George for its commitment to inclusion.

She'arim expects to remain at BJCC next year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Leaders of the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School expect it to remain at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre for the 2008-2009 school year, now that plans to demolish and rebuild the BJCC have been delayed until 2009.

Two months ago, parents and staff feared that the school, housed in rented premises on the BJCC's second floor, would be shut down because of funding issues and lack of a home for this coming September.

Sidney Braun, co-president of She'arim, which serves 75 students from Grade 1 through Grade 8 with learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and mild forms of autism, told The C/JN last week that "there will definitely be a school next year."

However, when contacted Monday morning, Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's senior vice-president for the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (known as the Mercaz), said the school's future has yet to be decided.

He expects a decision will be forthcoming next month.

In January, She'arim was notified that the federation's plans to demolish and replace the BJCC have been postponed for a year, a "very significant factor," Epstein said.

Although the school must work through other issues, "we don't have the added burden of having to relocate," Braun said.

"We've been offered the possibility of an extension on our lease, which we have said yes to," he added.

As of last Friday, a new lease had not been signed, but Braun said he had sent Sherry Kulman, the BJCC's executive director, a confirmation in writing. The school's current lease will expire at the end of June.

Braun noted that the school is the only one of its kind in the community and has the highest tuition, at about $18,000, of any Jewish day school.

Earlier this year, She'arim experienced a deficit that its executive director, Faigie Davids, attributed to a decreased number of students because of a large graduating class last year, which resulted in a loss of tuition.

The school approached the Mercaz to ask for cash advances on the annual amount it receives (under $200,000, based on the number of subsidized students) so that it could pay its staff. School fundraising events last year netted about $500,000 toward She'arim's annual $1.5 million budget.

So far, the school hasn't asked the Mercaz for money beyond the amount that has been allotted to it for the current school year.

"We're putting together a whole new budget so that we don't have a repeat situation in the future," Braun said.

He added that there would be no economies of scale if the student population were to increase. Because of the high ratio of teachers to students that's necessary to address the latter's special needs, "the more students you have, the more teachers you need. That's the nature of a special education school."

In addition to its usual fundraising this year, additional fundraising is planned in order to "eliminate the accumulated deficit the school has had, and to ensure that going forward we don't have an accumulated deficit," Braun said.

He said that She'arim is working with a joint management committee consisting of both school and federation representatives, and will be implementing changes in areas such as the curriculum and teaching materials, which were recommended by independent consultants.

"We want to meet the needs of the community, the children and the parent body," Braun said.

Epstein said it's up to the joint management committee to decide the future of the school. Two months ago, Epstein told The C/JN, without being specific, that She'arim was not in compliance with Mercaz funding requirements.

He said this week that he "misspoke" at the time, and clarified that the school "has problems with compliance, but it has not been taken off the list [of funded schools]. They are still in compliance."

Said Braun: "Federation is working with us to make sure we finish this year without any hiccups to ensure that we have a stable financial structure. We are well down the path."

Synagogues join forces for Mitzvah Day

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The six synagogues that form the Bayview Corridor Group are planning their first joint mitzvah day on April 6. To gear up for the project – and as organizers put it, to whet participants' appetites for it – a Mitzvah Day Kickoff Event is planned for next week.

The first event, to be held March 6 at 8 p.m. at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, will feature Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, as well as entertainment by the Beth Tikvah Choir and Yitzhak Argaman. Other speakers will include Rabbi David Eligberg of Beit Rayim Synagogue; Dan Mendelsohn Aviv, director of the Centre for Jewish Living and Learning at Temple Emanu-El; cancer coach Isa Nevsky; and educator Channa Sargon.

In addition to Beth Tikvah, Beit Rayim and Temple Emanu-El, the Bayview corridor synagogues include Kehillat Shaarei Torah, Temple Har Zion and Shaar Shalom Synagogue, representing a total of about 4,000 families in the northern part of Toronto and southern reaches of Thornhill. The area is a few kilometres east of what is sometimes referred to as the Bathurst Street corridor, home to the majority of Toronto's Jewish population.

Mitzvah Day Activities will include car washes; writing postcards to Canadian soldiers in Afghanistan and families of Israeli soldiers who are missing in action; yardwork and painting at the Toronto Community Hostel, which serves homeless people; sorting clothing donations; singing at seniors residences; and building homes for Habitat for Humanity.

The event is the group's main project for this year, but other joint projects have been "quietly" taking place, sometimes with just a couple of congregations, said spokesperson Seymour Hersh. He mentioned a project of Beth Tikvah and Shaar Shalom that involved knitting for Project Linus, an organization that provides blankets to children who are ill or traumatized.

Such projects do not need formal co-ordinating any more, "because the connections have been made," he added.

Formal links date back about four years, when the social action committee of Temple Emanu-El contacted the social action group at Beth Tikvah with the idea of joining forces for a blood donor clinic. The idea was promoted at all the area synagogues and took place in October 2004.

It can be difficult for one synagogue to enlist enough volunteers for a "major" program, Hersh noted.

"I think the essential message, and the heart, is for us to be partners with everyone in tikkun olam," he said, noting that the group, which is run "strictly on a lay level," spans the Jewish denominational spectrum from Reform to Orthodox.

The group has had inquiries from area churches, and Hersh said participants hope that, over time, all religious institutions in the area "can use the concept as a basis to encourage their communities to go out and do good deeds.

"Our hope is that by starting this, this will... create some ripples and will encourage other people to do this."

OUR PROMISE • OUR CHILDREN • OUR FUTURE

It is with great sadness that Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto mourns the loss of our supporter, major benefactor, Life Member of our Board of Directors, alumnus and dear friend

Nathan O. Hurwich ז"ל

Only once in a generation are we privileged to witness the great commitment, generosity and dedication of a man like Nathan Hurwich. Nathan's almost lifelong involvement with Associated began 90 years ago when, at the age of eight, he began attending the Simcoe Street Talmud Torah. He was in fact Associated's oldest living alumnus.

Without children of their own, Nathan and his wife Roey "adopted" the children of Associated as their extended family. With the caring and dedication of a true parent, he provided guidance and support to Associated. Nat was a passionate and active board member but he also understood that without financial resources, Associated could not grow. He was a contributor to every Associated capital campaign and in 1979, he and his wife made a landmark gift and became the benefactors of the Nathan O. and Roey Hurwich Education Centre.

The crown of our elders is the children of their children and the splendour of children is their fathers. Proverbs 17:6

While we gratefully acknowledge Mr. Hurwich's tremendous contributions to Associated, we recognize that it is the Jewish generations secured by his generosity that will be his crowning achievement. His true legacy will be the Jewish children and grandchildren of his "Associated children."

To the students of Associated, Nathan Hurwich is a towering role model. He was a man of and for the community and supported countless Jewish causes. More than that, Nathan was a leader, founding organizations, chairing committees and inspiring others. He was an ardent Zionist and lover of Hebrew language who made dozens of trips to Israel. To truly understand the difference that one person can make, our children need look no further than the tremendous Mesirat nefesh - self-sacrifice and magnificent accomplishments of Nathan Hurwich.

As we at Associated mark our Centennial year, we are proud of Nathan's almost 100-year association with the school. It is with great awe and admiration that we salute his legendary contributions to Associated and the community. He was a legendary figure in our history. For the hundreds of Jewish children that are educated in the Hurwich Education Centre, he is very much a part of the present. And as guarantor of Jewish generations to follow, he will be very much a part of our future.

May his memory be for a blessing.

Eerie, appalling echo

For the last decade-and-a-half, at least, when writing about threats to Israel and to Jews, this newspaper has refrained in its editorials from invoking comparisons to Adolf Hitler and his horrific, racist, genocidal ideology. In the history of nations and of political movements, the ghoulis, murderous obsession of the Nazis and Nazism stands alone. To compare others to Nazis is, in effect, to diminish the singular evil of Nazism.

Nazi pathology, we know, was laden with perverse beliefs about Jews. The Encyclopedia Judaica notes that among his many vile views, Hitler "identified the Jews with microbial infection. He believed that the Jews were 'propagators of infection,' that they 'spread the plague.'" Thus he desired to exterminate the propagators of infection and mobilized his entire military-industrial effort, not to mention virtually an entire society, to that disturbed end.

Hitler's lurid language was the flame by which he first lit the fiery inferno of his genocidal plans. He dehumanized and delegitimized the Jews as human beings. For Hitler and his henchmen, killing Jews was decidedly not about killing human beings, because they considered Jews to be sub-human.

Thus, it is reluctantly, but, nevertheless, with a sense of rising urgency that we point out the appalling echoes of Hitler's fevered voice in the words spoken more calmly last week by the leaders of Iran.

In a televised speech to the nation, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called Israel a "filthy germ" and a "savage beast." Just days before, the commander of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, Muhammad Ali Jafari, referred to Israel as "cancerous germ" and promised that it would "soon be destroyed by the hands of Hezbollah." That same day, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said that even after 60 years, Israel still has "no legitimacy" in the region.

We are not unused to the vilification of Israel, though it remains an offence to conscience and decency. It is, alas, part of the ongoing assault on the right of the Jews to their own sovereign state in the Middle East. As many scholars have pointed out, it is the modern discourse of the anti-Semite, for whom Israel is the surrogate, the Jew among nations.

But the latest verbal salvo against Israel by the Iranians leaders is of a different order of offence. They are repeating the rhetoric of the leaders who ruled Germany from 1933 to 1945. Like the Nazis, they have expressed the desire to wipe the Jews — as embodied in the Jewish state — off the map. And, also like the Nazis, they are developing the weapons by which to try to achieve their desire.

The Supreme Court of Canada has observed that the Holocaust began with words. These latest hateful words of the Iranian leaders must awaken the world to Iran's true intentions regarding Israel and to the vast danger the Iranian regime poses to international peace.

We call on the United Nations to censure Iran and to intervene with every necessary measure to prevent Ahmadinejad from acquiring the weapons he so fervently seeks to implement his Hitlerian scheme.

Israel rejected U.S. president Ronald Reagan's offer to guarantee the security of Israel's northern border, once it had withdrawn from Lebanon. He was vague as to how the guarantee would be accomplished, and in the same statement, he asserted for the first time his support for a Palestinian state.

Canadians who fell in 1948 war

The article "They fought for the nascent Jewish state" (Israel @ 60, CJN, Feb. 21) did not include the Canadian Machal members (Mithadvei Chutz La'aretz) who made the ultimate sacrifice. It is unfortunate that the Machal, who were a significant bond between Israel and the Diaspora, are often not remembered and their sacrifice unappreciated. Here are the names of the 11 Canadian Machal members who fell in the 1948 War of Independence:

• George (Buzz) Beurling of Verdun, Que. — Canada's top World War II fighter pilot. He was killed near Rome on May 20, 1948, in the crash of a plane that was being readied for its ferry flight to Israel. He was buried in the Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Harvey Cohen and Ed Lugech, first cousins, of Toronto, who served in the Palmach Yiftach Brigade. They participated in battles of Nebi Yusha and Malkiyeh. Missing, Cohen and Lugech were believed waylaid by Arab irregulars near Sarafand in late June 1948.

• Reuben Schiff of Toronto, who served on Aliya-Bet ship Paducah. He was killed on July 11, 1948, near Abu J'Ab while looking for his shipmate and Palmach comrade Lou Ball. Schiff was buried in Nachlat Itzhak.

• Sidney Rubinoff, of Toronto, served with the Palmach in battles of Nebi Yusha, Malkiyeh and Operation Danny, and the capture of Lydda and Ramleh. Wounded at Latrun on July 17, 1948, he died en route to hospital. He was buried at Nachlat Itzhak.

• Sidney Leisure, of Toronto, served in 7th Brigade, 72nd Battalion. Killed on Sept. 7, 1948, during Operation Hiram in the battle for Tamra hill in the Galilee, he was buried at Nahariya.

• Leonard Fitchett, of Vancouver, ex-RCAF pilot, served in 103 Squadron. Downed in his Beaufighter by anti-aircraft fire on Oct. 20, 1948, while attacking Egyptian-held Iraq el Suedin police fortress, Fitchett was buried in Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Wilfred Canter (pilot) of Toronto; Willy Fisher (navigator) of Winnipeg; and Fred Stevenson (co-pilot) of Vancouver. The three RCAF veterans served in 103 Squadron. During a night supply run to Sdom, on Oct. 24, 1948, their C-47 exploded in the air after an engine caught fire. Canter and Fisher were buried in Rehovot, and Stevenson was buried in Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

Dangers of chiropractic treatment

I read the article "Kids and chiropractic" (To Your Health, CJN, Feb. 7) with dismay. The article does not address the serious dangers involved in chiropractic neck manipulation, especially in children. More than 60 Canadian neurologists and the Canadian Stroke Consortium have warned that chiropractic neck manipulation can cause stroke and death, and called for a complete ban on neck manipulations in infants and children. Warning signs that include neck pain, visual impairment, nausea, dizziness and numbness, which often don't appear until one to two weeks after the visit, require medical attention. The Canadian Medical Association Journal also indicates that the association between chiropractic neck manipulation and stroke is often under-reported, since the link is often not made by questioning the patient. Your article ignores these important facts and does a disservice to your readers. See the website www.fact.com for comments by families whose members have died as a result of chiropractic neck manipulation. More information can be found on the Internet by Googling "chiropractic" and "stroke."

Regrets that comments offended

I have been reminded, and I concur, that people of position and power have an obligation to educate themselves if their efforts to welcome our growing, diverse population are genuine ("Deputy mayor offended by handshake snub," CJN, Feb. 14).

In my heart, I am genuine about caring for each other; about sharing our opportunities to live well. A misunderstood tradition, a perceived slight, a feeling of rejection or disrespect on either side can lead to continued ignorance and distance. That would be the greater loss.

I regret that my comments offended some people. I know what it is like to feel offended without understanding all of the circumstances.

I look forward to working with Rabbi Mendel Kaplan and leaders of other faith groups to overcome any misunderstandings that we both have regarding our values, traditions, and beliefs.

'France will always stand by Israel'

The following are excerpts from the speech given Feb. 13 at the annual dinner of the Conseil Représentatif des Institutions Juives de France, the umbrella organization for Jewish communal life in France.

By NIKOLAS SARKOZY

Memory has always been a fundamental characteristic of your identity. Because your entire culture and history are rooted in memory – the memory of God's alliance with Abraham, with Isaac and with Jacob. For believers, this is first and foremost the memory of a promise, the memory of a hope, the memory of a Law, handed down from generation to generation, despite the adversity, despite the relegation, despite the pogroms, despite the deportation, despite the persecution.

For each and every one of you, believers and non-believers, practising and non-practising, it is also today the memory of an exceptional and tragic destiny whose most recent chapters have scattered your families, wounded your hearts and sometimes even shaken your beliefs.

Judaism has made a major contribution to the history of humanity. The Jews were not only the first to show how steadfastly a people can stand by their God. They were also the first to show how a God can stand by His people. For the Jewish religion, memory is a trait of God before it is a trait of men.

This revelation changed humanity's perception of religion, since a God who remembers is a God who loves. Never again, after the Torah, did men speak of God as they spoke before...

I want to emphasize this point. France will always stand by Israel because Israel's existence is a major political decision of the 20th century. And this existence is non-negotiable. And as regards Israel's concerns about Hamas' contentions and about the Iranian president's insane assertions, Israel is justified when she is shocked by words we no longer wish to hear in the 21st century. France condemns these statements. And for myself, I will not meet and will not shake the hand of anyone who refuses to recognize the existence of Israel.

Regarding Iran, France's policy is simple and, I feel, easily understood by all: proliferation is a serious threat to international security; we cannot stand by while Iran develops such technologies in breach of international law; it is up to Iran to provide evidence of her intentions and to respect the United Nations resolutions. What purpose does uranium enrichment serve in Iran, a country that has no civilian use for it?

We are proposing a path to Iran, and it is in that country's interest. This path is to renounce military nuclear capacity, and I say this because I think it is right. It would be a serious mistake to consider that civilian nuclear power is reserved for the West and to say to all the Arab countries of the world: the energy of the future isn't for you, it's for us.

May all those who do not want a clash of civilizations between East and West remember this. Wanting to keep the energy of the future to ourselves is tantamount to condemning a certain number of countries to poverty and destitution. And it is in these countries racked by poverty and destitution that terrorism and fanaticism flourish. All the peoples who want to develop it in peace have a right to the energy of the future. It is a serious mistake to postulate that you have to be western to have the right to the energy of the future.

In any case, I will not associate with those who irresponsibly make preparations for a clash of civilizations. Think about it. I know exactly what I'm doing, what I want to do to break these countries out of underdevelop-ment in economic and financial relations with this country. The prime minister and minister for the economy and finance have said this. I have said it to the businesses of France, and may all the European countries do what France has done.

I don't want any doublespeak. There are sanctions against Iran. And I do not accept, even for economic reasons that I can understand, that our firms should do business with a country we are obliged to keep on the fringes of the international community. It's quite straightforward, Mr. President, companies doing so will be in breach of the rules set down by the government of the French Republic. No doublespeak, no double standards, just one...

Nikolas Sarkozy

ment, because underdevelopment means poverty, and poverty means that hatred grows.

When I offer it to Algeria, you know that I don't want us to find ourselves one day with a Taliban government in Algeria. When I offer development to North Africa, it's because I don't want the same causes to produce the same effects. I say it for Iran: let Iran renounce the nuclear weapon, let Iran accept the controls, let Iran keep her word, and then Iran will have the right, like all the other countries, to the energy of the future. Believe me, as a great people and a great civilization, they are perfectly capable of hearing this message. It is a great misfortune for them to have a president who leads them into an impasse...

So from the moment that Iran isn't listening because her leaders aren't listening, we have no other choice than to step up our measures: this means new Security Council and European Union sanctions and, indeed Mr. President, the necessary restraint by business

You spoke about the Durban conference. I'll tell you: the 2001 Durban Conference gave rise to unacceptable outbursts by certain states and numerous non-governmental organizations, which turned the conference into a platform against the State of Israel. No one has forgotten this.

A follow-up conference is planned for 2009. Mr. President, you asked me a question. I'll be very frank with you. France will not accept a repeat of the excesses and extremes of 2001. Our European partners share France's concerns. France will be holding the presidency of the council of the European Union in the last months leading up to the follow-up conference. I tell you, we will withdraw from the process if our legitimate demands are not taken into account. I believe my answer is clear...

Since 2002... we have done a great deal to combat and curb the rise in anti-Semitic acts committed on our soil... I do indeed consider that when a synagogue is set on fire, it is not merely a public building that has been burnt, it is not merely an anti-social behaviour. It is more serious than that, it is an act of racism, of anti-Semitism. I remember stirring up a great hullabaloo when I said that our country had underestimated the existence of anti-Semitism for too long. I said it because I think it is true. I wasn't pointing a finger, but simply stating a reality.

I must say I've always been fascinated by this tendency of ours to explain anti-Semitism. There's extreme right-wing anti-Semitism, then there's anti-Semitism from certain left-wing quarters, and then there's middle-class anti-Semitism, and then anti-Semitism associated with Zionism. But, at the end of the day, what are we talking about? We're talking about madness. We're talking about stupidity. We're talking about hatred. I've always thought that so many debates to explain the different paths that lead to anti-Semitism would come to a conclusion one day, that we would see that some paths are less serious than others, and that explaining this was somehow to trivialize it.

We have stepped up the actions. We have freed up millions of euros to guarantee the security, with the Unified Jewish Social Fund, of a certain number of places particularly at risk, especially schools and synagogues. The government has just renewed the annual agreement that associates it with the community's solidarity fund. Here, by the way, is an action for which a great deal of obstinate opposition had to be overcome, not all of which had anything to do with a narrow conception of secularism. The argument ran that it was totally justified for a local or regional government authority to contribute to the security of a sports club and totally unjustified to contribute to the security of a place of worship. Quite honestly, I fail to see why.

We have obtained results. Acts of anti-Semitism are decreasing in our country. Our international image has significantly improved. Yet I confess that my greatest regret remains the fact that I was unable to prevent, when I was minister of the interior, the brutal murder of Ilan Halimi.

We found him, but it was too late. I assure you that, for me, this remains a deep regret and sorrow. I don't know whether we could have saved his life before. But what happened must not be forgotten. I would add that the struggle against anti-Semitism – I'm sorry to say – is not the business of the Jewish community of France. The struggle against anti-Semitism is the business of the Republic as a whole.

Every time a Jew is struck or insulted, it is not the community that should feel insulted or struck, it is the flag of the Republic that is stained. Every time a Jew of France dies, it is not the Jewish community of France's problem, it is the problem of the entire national community...

I hope, ladies and gentlemen, dear friends, that you have understood that my presence here, as head of state, was important, as I had things to say to you. Thank you.

Hannah can teach us all

Recently, friends chose the name Hannah for their daughter after reading about the character of Hannah in the Rosh Hashanah Torah service.

They thought the name itself was lovely – perhaps the root comes from the word chen, meaning grace. But they were also moved by the biblical Hannah's strength of character, as well as her faith and her presence.

The story highlights

Hannah's ability to stand up for herself. A woman whom many might dismiss as typical in a patriarchal world, Hannah suggests a model of independence and commitment that may have resonance today.

Hannah was the prophet Samuel's mother. That's how most of us know her, if we know her at all.

She wanted a baby but couldn't conceive, a rather common biblical theme. We might discount her conventional desire for motherhood or acknowledge the Bible's clear presentation of a woman with an independent will and a forceful voice.

As she was immersed in despondency, her husband tries to please her. He declares his love for her as being "more than ten sons." This is a mighty declaration from a biblical patriarch, even given the fact he had another wife with sons.

But Hannah was not to be diverted. She went to God's holy place and spoke her mind, and she entered our tradition beyond the mere story of motherhood or Samuel's importance.

Hannah prayed to God. Out of the depths of misery, but immersed in faith, she called to God, and in that moment, she established the pattern of proper prayer for all Jews for all time.

What an accomplishment for a woman!

The priest, Eli, tries to stop her, thinking that she's drunk. Incredibly, she doesn't shrink back in apologies but respectfully stands her ground.

He then blesses her, accepting that he erred. Hannah gives birth and dedicates her son's life to God's work. She also composes a song to God's greatness that's an eloquent part of the Sephardi holiday prayer book.

The Talmud tells us that, among other things, we learn to pray from Hannah. She stood silently with her lips moving. That becomes the authoritative format for the main prayer of every service, the Amidah. She also taught us to pray to God through our needs.

Three biblical women offer songs of praise and thankfulness to God: Miriam, Deborah and Hannah. Many other biblical luminaries offer inspiring prayers to God, but only Hannah becomes the model for prayer.

Hannah freely approaches the holy place of God and speaks to God on her own. A priest acknowledges her rightful place there, a beloved woman standing independently with her own sense of self. She's a woman with strength of faith, self-reliance and determination.

What a wonderful combination of traits and what a wonderful model for today's religious and non-religious world.

'As a community, we can reach heaven'

Ari Goldman, former religion editor for the New York Times and now a professor of journalism at Columbia University, is the antithesis of the gonzo journalist. In an interview, he is thoughtful and insightful, just as in his reporting he sought to get into the skin of the people and events he was reporting on.

To sit with him in discussion is to have hope for the future of the profession of journalism – something that's often in short supply when the airwaves are full of CNN and Fox trivialities.

Goldman was a scholar-in-residence at my synagogue in Vancouver, giving me the chance to interview him about his books, The Search for God at Harvard, Living a Year of Kaddish, and Being Jewish: The Spiritual and Cultural Practice of Judaism Today.

Search for God was written while he was on a sabbatical from the Times at Harvard Divinity School in 1985. His goal was "to understand how people practise religion, in order to be a better journalist."

Did he fulfil that ambition? Yes, "it made me a better journalist" he replied. "It helped me search beyond the familiar, to understand others. That is true for any journalist telling other peoples' stories. To do that, you have to let your ego go. I wrote 1,000 articles before I used the word 'I,' after 15 years."

He added: "Maybe we should wait till we're over 40 to start blogs, like waiting to study Kabbalah. You need experience – maturity behind the voice."

Did it make him a better Jew? "Can't answer that. I did see my Judaism in light of other world religions."

Is the Harvard Divinity School – which in the 1980s was more an academic institute than a theological seminary – relevant in today's religious tumult? "Today it is more a practical place for training pastors, more of a professional school."

In Kaddish, Goldman writes about the year he spent saying Kaddish for his father.

"Do good things come out of death?" I asked. "Yes – when we can take a loss and give it meaning in a positive way."

The year after his father's death healed a breach in his life that his parents' divorce had created. In the process of mourning his father, he no longer mourned his parents' estrangement from each other. "Kaddish," he affirmed, "makes you grow up."

He's currently writing a followup book based on Kaddish stories that he's collected on his travels around the continent.

In Being Jewish, Goldman describes the wide variety of Jewish practices he has encountered in North America over the years. How, I asked, does he react to the oft-made assertion that the many personal choices individual Jews are making will lead to the downfall of American Jewry?

"I think it shows just the opposite," he

Jewish issues are Canadian issues

The columns that appear on this page are intended to present the opinions of various writers from across Canada on issues that they consider to be important to the Jewish community. Sometimes we are inspired, angered or occasionally amused by matters of local, national or even international interest.

But on a typical day, it's not difficult to find issues that should be of concern to members of the Canadian Jewish community. The news media daily report on events relating to our heritage, institutions, religious practice and social conscience. Some days, it can be overwhelming.

Essentially, we face three kinds of issues: those of parochial impact on particular facets of community life, those that should be of concern to all Canadian Jews, and, even further, those that go beyond our day-to-day experience.

In the first category, there are many topics of interest to particular members of our community. For example, we have experienced circumstances in Canada in which our secular society has been asked to reasonably accommodate differences and practices in order to protect religious minorities. This addresses concerns recently raised by some chassidic Jews in Quebec.

Issues that should concern all of us include the prosecution and/or deportation of war criminals in our midst. And as part of our efforts to eradicate anti-Semitism, we must continue to take measures against those who propagate hate. We support the constitutionally entrenched value of preserving and enhancing the multicultural heritage of Canadians. And of course, we must continue to seek safety and security for Jews throughout the world, as well as a vibrant and healthy future for the State of Israel.

Our collective social conscience encourages us to get involved in matters that don't affect our everyday lives, but, if left unattended, serve as an affront to Jewish values, traditions and sensitivities. These include poverty, the plight of the disabled, the recurrence of genocide and other humanitarian issues that are currently unfolding in Sudan's Darfur region and elsewhere in the

Since it's impossible for individuals to champion all of these issues at once, we have community organizations to address these challenges. Jewish federations across Canada deal with local issues. Canadian Jewish Congress is an organization that is described in terms of its two modifying adjectives: Canadian and Jewish. Congress deals with Canadian issues, Jewish issues and Canadian Jewish issues, and it does so in an admirable and effective way. Other Canadian organizations, such as B'nai Brith, also do their share in addressing these matters. To an extent, we can derive some comfort from knowing that such organizations are mandated with the ongoing responsibility of addressing concerns responded. "It shows the vibrancy and endurance of Judaism. It's not strange to say, 'Do what you can.' Chabad has been saying for years, 'Just do one thing,' and 12 years after the Rebbe's death, they're still out there saying it. I say, 'Do what you can.' Make that one connection to Judaism."

What about the current United States presidential campaign, which insists that contestants for the office reveal their inner religious convictions?

"It is fascinating. Everyone thought the Republicans had a lock on the religious right and the Democrats were the party of Satan. Is it harming American political discourse? No, it demonstrates that the issues are not so easy. The Democrats have raised gender and race as issues. The Republicans are still mired in religious issues."

Goldman is a third-generation American Orthodox Jew. How does he feel about Orthodoxy in North America?

"I love [the Orthodox] world, but worry about the move to the right. It is almost a competition. More things are not kosher. To find where the law allows is much harder than just saying no – it takes a great scholar to say yes," he said.

"Take Orthodox feminism. What was once beyond the pale is now normative. Orthodoxy is still healthy. In religion in general, there is a move to the right. No trend is in isolation. There is a healthy debate in the country about religion."

What is the future of Judaism?

"Alone we are great, but as a community we can reach the gates of heaven."

of importance to our community.

But it's not enough to leave all the work to these larger organizations. While it's true that some issues capture our interest more than others, each of us must take a stand and address the issues that we feel strongly about.

For some, it's combating anti-Semitism and bringing to justice those who have violated international norms, including those who perpetrate genocide. Others work to discredit those who try to re-write history and deny the Holocaust. Some individuals give priority to the protection of minority religious rights. Others may, however, approach this issue with caution in order to ensure that the preservation of minority rights does not have the deleterious effect of offending gender equality. Some courageous individuals are actively countering events at our universities that condemn Israel for so-called "apartheid" policies.

Whether it's through education, fundraising, lobbying or other forms of community activism, there is much work for all of us to do.

We bring our Jewish perspective to issues that face us in our daily life, as well as to issues of broader concern. Confronted by a barrage of contemporary issues, we each must identify the issues that have the most personal significance. Although we have to be selective as to how we confront the many challenges that we face, through our commitment to tikkun olam, we must get involved and make a difference in the lives of others.

The Kirshner File

Israel is considering an invasion of the Gaza Strip

Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, recently invited 70 ambassadors posted to Israel for a tour of its volatile border area opposite the Gaza Strip. Her aim was to warn them that Israel can no longer tolerate the "unbearable" fusillade of Qassam rocket and mortar barrages. Sderot, a town about one kilometre from Gaza, has borne the brunt of these attacks, but the neighbouring city of Ashkelon, as well as kibbutzim in the vicinity, have also been struck. These bombardments, which have escalated in frequency and lethality since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in 2005, have been launched by a loose coalition of radical Palestinian organizations from Islamic Jihad to Hamas in the face of official opposition from the Palestinian Authority. Since 2001, the second year of the current Palestinian uprising, these groups have fired thousands of projectiles into Israel, killing 13 civilians and wounding hundreds more.

During the visit, Livni told the envoys that Israel has no choice but "to act in order to reduce these threats." Her message was clear: Israel is seeking understanding, if not actual support, for a major ground offensive into Gaza to obliterate this reign of terror.

Whether Israel unleashes the full might of its armed forces in an attempt to crush this form of terrorism is an open question, since this problem is probably outside the realm of a cut-and-dried military solution.

But in the meantime, the Israeli army is on the offensive, conducting shallow-penetration raids into Gaza on almost a daily basis. These raids are designed to push the Qassam and mortar launching teams further away from the frontier, to prevent Palestinian militants from crossing into Israel and attacking settlements and laying roadside bombs, to uncover and destroy arms smuggling tunnels, and to disrupt attempts to abduct Israeli soldiers. In these operations, Israel has killed some 200 Palestinian fighters in the past few months.

Israel has been here before. Two years ago, after Palestinian gunmen stormed an Israeli border outpost and killed several troops and kidnapped a soldier named Gilad Shalit, Israel launched a series of incursions into Gaza that resulted in the deaths of more than 100 Palestinian militants. These raids had no lasting effect. The bombardments continued and Shalit remains imprisoned in Gaza.

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

Today, confounded by its failure to staunch the incessant attacks, Israel has stepped up the pace of targeted assassinations against key Palestinian figures involved in the design, manufacture, transport and firing of Qassams and mortars. Israel has also gone after key Hamas commanders. Last September, Israeli commandos captured Mahawesh el-Qadi, who is believed to have played a role in Shalit's abduction. More recently, Israel has again threatened to kill the Hamas political leadership. In 2004, Israel killed Hamas' founder and spiritual leader, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, and his deputy, Abdel Aziz Rantisi. Three weeks ago, Israeli Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz, the former defence minister, called for the assassination of Mahmoud Zahar, Hamas' former foreign minister, prompting Hamas leaders to adopt a low profile and go into hiding.

In addition, Israel has arrested 41 Hamas parliamentarians, who acquired their seats in free and fair Palestinian national elections in January 2006. (Hamas won 74 of 132 seats, due in large part to the perception that its chief adversary, Fatah, was hopelessly mired in corruption and cronyism, that its economic policies had failed, and that it was incapable of forming a Palestinian state.)

Having made no secret of its intention to weaken Hamas since its takeover of Gaza last June, Israel has imposed a blockade, closed border crossings, branded Gaza as an "enemy entity," cut off the flow of virtually all goods except food and medical supplies, and curtailed the sale of fuel and electricity. The Israeli government intends to keep Hamas off balance until it ceases attacks and, in line with international demands, recognizes Israel's existence, renounces terrorism and accepts agreements signed by Israel and the Palestinian Authority since the 1993 Oslo peace process.

Israel's policies, which have been described as a "declaration of war" by Hamas and denounced by the Palestinian Authority, have aroused the ire of the United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, who has said that the cutoff of vital services is contrary to international law. Ban contends that, since Israel is still in charge of Gaza's border crossings, air space and coast, Israel is responsible for the well-being of its besieged population.

Ban's deputy, John Holmes, who visited the region two weeks ago, has said that life in Gaza is "grim and miserable" and has urged Israel to lift the closure. Israel is unlikely to comply, given the fact that there has been no letup in Palestinian rocket and mortar attacks and attempted border infiltrations, and that Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister, has reiterated his belief that his movement should never recognize Israel. In light of this situation, Israel is moving closer to invading Gaza.

For the past few months, top Israeli officials have issued unmistakable warnings that an invasion is drawing near. Last October, Defence Minister Ehud Barak said, "Every day that passes brings us closer to a broad operation in Gaza." On Feb. 5, after Hamas, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades took joint credit for a suicide bombing in Dimona — the first such attack in a year — Barak promised that he would crush terrorism. On Feb. 12, he said, "We will be forced to strengthen our military efforts." Yet Barak — whose dire warnings have been echoed by Minister of Public Security Avi Dichter — says that he will not order an invasion unless Israel defines its goals, receives broad support and has an exit strategy. These considerations do not seem to bother Israel's deputy prime minister, Haim Ramon, who has vowed to escalate the war with Hamas and observed that "a combination of steps will bring an end to the Hamas regime in Gaza" within a year. The chief of staff, Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, has weighed in, too, saying that he is "prepared and ready to deepen and expand operations in Gaza as much as necessary." Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, however, has been circumspect, saying "there is no way to put an absolute end to the terrorism in a single blow" and pointedly arguing that "rage is not a plan."

An invasion of Gaza would presumably be modeled after Operation Defensive Shield, during which Israel reoccupied the West Bank in March and April 2002. Israel's reoccupation of Gaza would be costly for both sides. Hamas, having taken a page out of Hezbollah's textbook for waging guerrilla warfare, has constructed a web of fortifications throughout Gaza. These positions would be manned by 50,000 men and hundreds of suicide bombers, says Nizar Rayyan, a senior Hamas official. Thanks to a network of tunnels, Hamas has managed to smuggle advanced weapons — long-range rockets, anti-tank missiles and anti-aircraft missiles — into Gaza, according to Yuval Diskin, the director of Israel's internal security service. Last month, Hamas allegedly smuggled in yet more arms — and Iranian-trained personnel — into Gaza by blowing up parts of the separation wall that cuts off Gaza from Egypt.

Israel does not have to invade Gaza to pacify its southern border. A long-term truce with Hamas might be sufficient. Hamas has generally expressed interest in a ceasefire, but Israel does not want to negotiate with Hamas. In the interim, Israel is working on alternative methods to enhance its security. Israel is fortifying homes in Sderot and developing the Iron Dome, an anti-missile system that may yet neutralize Qassams and mortars. Israel is also building a separation fence along the Egyptian border. But until then, Israel will have to endure a rain of rockets and mortars.

"They are

By FRANCES KRAFT

Zlatko Sarcevic says that, in the gym classes he teaches at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus, he can "figure out who a kid is" more easily than if his students were sitting at desks in a classroom.

The way in which children take part in gym activities and organized games reveals traits such as whether or not they are helpful, their degree of confidence, and how they treat others, he said in an interview in his small office that also serves as a gym-equipment storage room.

Sarcevic — who has a black belt in judo and enjoys camping and horseback riding — showed his own mettle last June, when he rushed his Grade 4 class of 18 students into the school building after a gunman robbed a jewelry store in the nearby Promenade Mall and fled on foot through school grounds. The school went into lockdown, police helicopters were overhead, and shots were fired in the course of the incident.

Sarcevic received a police citation for his bravery.

Downplaying his actions on that day, he told The CJA in a recent interview that any of the staff would have done what he did.

Last fall, the 56-year-old teacher was deeply touched to learn that school parents had honoured him for protecting their children by planting 10 trees in a Jerusalem garden in his name.

Now in his 14th year at the school, Sarcevic — a Serb who grew up in Sisak, Croatia — joined the school on a temporary basis at first, filling in for a teacher on maternity leave.

A graduate of the University of Zagreb, Sarcevic specialized in martial arts at university, earning his teaching credentials at the same time. A former member of the Yugoslavian national kickboxing team, he went on to work as a kick-boxing coach and a self-defence instructor in the army.

Coaching was his original goal as a student; he considered teaching something he could do "on the side." He still coaches outside of school hours.

Parents of three children — two of whom were born after he came to Canada — Sarcevic and his wife initially planned to spend a year here.

He sees himself as a strict teacher. "That's not a secret. I have high expectations from myself and from my students as well, but I always try to be fair."

He said he does not judge students on their ability. "We're all different."

"I tell them, 'You don't have to be the fastest runner or the best soccer player in the school, but you can always show respect and try your best. That's the main focus for me — trying hard.'"

He sees the gym activities that students take part in as "a vehicle for moulding character."

In recent years, Sarcevic noted, there has been an increased emphasis on fitness. The school recently acquired a set of electronic heart rate monitors, and he hopes to begin using them in classes this spring.

The concept of "fun" is not something that drives Sarcevic's classes per se. "I think [students] have fun," he mused. "This is a question parents always ask, because I'm very structured. The class is very structured."

"I like to see that fun is organized," he explained, citing safety and educational considerations. He added that "fun" means different things to different people. "It's not just, 'Throw the ball and go crazy.'"

With a full complement of classes ranging from junior kindergarten to Grade 8 and about two dozen school competitions and tournaments a year, Sarcevic said his biggest challenge is time.

"That's a big challenge," he said, his face serious. "But," he said, brightening, "I like challenges."

Two-state solution out of reach, ex-CIA head says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The former director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, R. James Woolsey, Jr., says a two-state solution to resolve Israel's conflict with the Palestinians is out of reach for now.

Visiting Toronto recently as a guest of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, he said that Iran, contrary to a recent report, has not halted its nuclear weapons program.

Woolsey, as well, declared that a precipitous American withdrawal from Iraq would be disastrous for the United States and Israel.

At a press conference, Woolsey — the CIA's director from 1993 to 1995 — said that a two-state solution will be unattainable until the Palestinian school system in the West Bank and Gaza is reformed and overhauled.

He charged that Palestinian educators, having fallen under the sway of a radical strain of Saudi Arabian Islam known as Wahhabism, demonize Israel, oppose coexistence and churn out suicide bombers.

Later, in an interview, Woolsey cited this factor as one of the reasons why the current talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority will not yield a peace treaty by the end of 2008, as envisaged by U.S. President George W. Bush at last November's U.S.-sponsored Annapolis summit.

"The chances that Israel and the Palestinians will reach an agreement are close to nil," he said, adding that a Palestinian state can only emerge if "a bunch of things change."

Woolsey, a conservative Democrat who supports the presidential ambitions of Republican Senator John McCain and advises him on energy issues, said the Palestinians won't achieve statehood unless they satisfy a number of conditions.

First, they must grant the Jewish inhabitants of Israeli settlements in the West Bank the right to live there as equal citizens and in a state of security.

Second, Fatah — the party of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas — must fully recognize Israel's existence and sovereignty as a Jewish state.

Third, the Palestinians must accept that Israel's demand for border adjustments is perfectly understandable.

Turning to Iran, he suggested that the National Intelligence Estimate, issued by 16 U.S. spy agencies last December, is misleading.

In a startling assessment, these agencies concluded that Iran froze its nuclear weapons program in 2003, but that Iran is nevertheless continuing to produce enriched uranium, the prerequisite component of an atomic bomb.

Woolsey — currently a board member of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy — said that Iran has merely halted the design and fabrication of warheads on ballistic missiles, the least difficult aspect of building a nuclear arsenal.

He said that Iran is still working on the hardest part, the enrichment of uranium.

Advising the United States to ramp up economic pressure on Iran, Woolsey said that Washington should consider cutting off Iranian oil exports and imposing tough sanctions on its Revolutionary Guards.

Claiming that Iran is bent on dominating the Middle East and is suppressing its own population, he urged the United States to leave all options open, including the use of military force.

Woolsey came out against a move by the United States to engage Iran in talks to defuse tensions. "We should weaken Iran and extend sanctions."

He said that McCain, the presumptive Republican candidate in this year's presidential election, would not tolerate Iran's acquisition of nuclear arms.

Woolsey expressed sharp opposition to a fast U.S. pullout from Iraq. "We should only withdraw when Al Qaeda in Iraq is defeated."

He said that the "surge" — the positioning of more American troops in strategic areas of Iraq — is proving useful in dealing blows to the insurgency.

"We have a chance of turning the war around," said Woolsey, who in 1998 signed a letter sent to then-U.S. president Bill Clinton calling for the removal of Iraq's president, Saddam Hussein.

Saying that the United States fought the war "very badly" for the first three years after its 2003 invasion, Woolsey noted that its outmoded, Vietnam-era search-and-destroy methods were a failure. The present clear-and-hold policy can defeat the insurgents, he said.

Warning that an immediate U.S. withdrawal would be an "absolute disaster," Woolsey said it would embolden Islamic radicals and thus damage American and Israeli interests.

On the day Woolsey spoke, the leader of the Iraqi branch of Al Qaeda proposed that Iraq should be used as a launching pad to "liberate Palestine."

Likening the U.S. presence in Iraq to its post-war occupations of Germany and Japan, he said that the United States will most likely maintain a garrison in Iraq for many years to come.

He said the decision to invade Iraq and depose Saddam was sound.

In an analysis of Israel's border war with Hezbollah in 2006, Woolsey said that Israel gained very little from it, and that a second round is possible due to the support Hezbollah receives from Syria and Iran.

He added that Israel should have bombed Syrian military sites in retaliation for Syria's supply of short-range and long-range missiles to Hezbollah.

Woolsey advised Israel neither to resume direct peace talks with Syria nor to relinquish the Golan Heights.

"There is no advantage for Israel to reopen talks. If Israel had deeply wounded Syria in 2006, negotiations would have been a good idea. Now, Israel would be bargaining from a position of weakness. Israel should not give up the Golan. The Syrian government wouldn't abide by any agreement."

On the day he made these comments, Bush ordered new sanctions to punish Syria for allegedly trying to undermine Iraq's stability and undercut Lebanon's independence.

Woolsey applauded the assassination of a top Hezbollah commander, Imad Mugniyah, in Damascus this month.

"Whoever killed him is on my side. He was one of the most rotten bastards in the Middle East."

Woolsey called on the United States to free itself of its dependence on Arab oil, hunt for more oil on its own soil and look for alternative energy sources.

NCJW gets ready for Passover food drive

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Karen Fenwick and Debbie Wasserman have been preparing for Passover since last May.

The two are co-chairs of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJW) Toronto section's 2008 Passover Food Drive, which runs this year from March 26 to April 13.

They've asked agencies, synagogues, schools and community groups to submit recipients' names, and on the April 13 delivery day, they expect to send out about 3,000 boxes to about 2,600 families.

Last year, said Wasserman, about 10,000 people benefited from the drive, and they expect that this year the list will grow.

Recipients include individuals living in poverty, recent immigrants in need, and individuals with disabilities and inadequate financial resources.

The community can help by donating kosher for Passover food – brown shopping bags will be inserted in the March 27 edition of The CJN – at participating grocery stores, schools, community centres and synagogues, “but we desperately need money, because we can purchase food at wholesale costs, so the money goes further,” Fenwick said.

“We also know what we need, so if we're short of a specific item, we can purchase it,” she added.

As well, NCJW needs volunteer drivers to help deliver boxes on April 13.

Boxes include many of the essentials needed for a seder and the week of Passover, including matzah, soup, tea and apple juice, gefilte fish, canned fruit, Passover wine or grape juice, macaroons, tuna, jam, apple sauce and candles.

She said boxes are packed by about 750 students beginning March 26.

“One girl who packed boxes

while she was a student at Associated Hebrew

Schools is now in social work school and has come to us for her placement.

The remembered the good work we do. It has a lasting effect on people. Once you're exposed to the drive, you want to be part of it.”

On delivery day, said Wasserman, volunteers get a “snapshot” into Jewish diversity in the city. “Boxes are delivered to people living in basements or above stores, and most kids have not been exposed to this. Some don't appear poor, but they may be shut-in or ill. All recipients have been referred. No one can call in that they need a box.

“Delivery day is certainly special. It is the highlight of the drive. Volunteers meet people they would never ordinarily meet.”

Running the drive is like running a business, Fenwick said.

“We created a letter and the brown bag, we put together a distribution list, and we organize all the volunteers. We're here two days a week, but we think about it all week. It is an organizational feat.”

The two women have been on the drive committee for a number of years, but this is their first as chairs, “and it has been a learning curve,” Wasserman said.

Volunteer drivers should show up at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St., with a driver and helper at 8:30 a.m., April 13. For information, call NCJW at 416-633-5100.

Chabad Markham plans fashion show fundraiser

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, in partnership with The Bay at Yorkdale, will host a mother-daughter fashion show fundraiser on March 30.

The event, which will be held at the store – the Canadian chain's largest suburban outlet – is being hosted by television personality Erica Ehm and will feature guest speaker Miryam Swerdlow. Her talk is titled, "If Mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy."

A portion of the evening's proceeds will support the L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women. Women at Chabad Markham have been meeting weekly for the past three or four months to say tehillim (psalms) for a woman who was diagnosed with breast cancer.

The girls' and women's clothing – which will include the spring line of Lauren by Ralph Lauren – will all be "modest," in accordance with Jewish law followed by many Orthodox women. Models – "real" women from the community – will wear skirts that cover the knee and sleeves that cover the elbow, said Goldie Plotkin, rebbetzin of the synagogue.

There is no contradiction between beauty and modesty

They are "very sophisticated, smart, stylish, classic looks," said Richard Montgomery, The Bay at Yorkdale's store manager.

There is no contradiction between beauty and modesty, said Plotkin. "You can live by Torah and still enjoy the physical things that God has given us."

"It's important to take care of our inner selves and our outer selves," she added.

Plotkin is one of 25 Chabad rebbetzins in the GTA who will be honoured at the fashion show.

"The women did not want to be honoured, but we're doing this because this is honouring the Rebbe's work," she said, referring to the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. Under his leadership Chabad became an international movement as he sent emissaries – husband-and-wife teams of rabbis and rebbetzins – all over the world.

The fashion show is in its 20th year, but this is the first time The Bay has been part of it. In past years, the event has attracted more than 400 people, according to a news release from the synagogue.

The event is "a great opportunity for us to connect with the community... It will be a very special, very enjoyable evening," said Montgomery.

Tickets are $36, or $54 for premium seating and exclusive gifts. For tickets, contact the synagogue at 905-886-0420, ext. 111.

Aliyah centre becomes part of federation

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Israel Aliyah Centre of Toronto, which is affiliated with the Jewish Agency for Israel, has become the second such centre in North America after Chicago to come under the auspices of a Jewish federation.

Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said that when he became president of the federation in 2004 and saw that the aliyah office was not in the Lipa Green Building – it was on Dufferin Street near Finch Avenue until about two years ago – he thought that it was a strange and unnatural separation.

"Now it is where it should be, and we are synergizing our work."

Federation and the Diaspora have often had a "schizophrenic attitude about aliyah," and "people get uncomfortable when prominent community members [make the move]. We all want a strong Israel, but it is almost taboo for mainstream agencies to promote aliyah," he said.

"Aliyah is not a threat. It is part of our fabric. It has to be part of everything we do."

Susan Steinberg, chair of the federation's new aliyah committee, said that the vision of the six-member committee is to have people see aliyah as an obligation and understand that there are many ways to live in Israel.

"It does not have to be a permanent move – it doesn't have to be black and white. People can go back and forth. They can work in Canada while their wife and family live in Israel. They can keep their business here. They need to be creative."

Liane Sela, director and shlichah of the Israel Aliyah Centre in Toronto, said that aliyah is something that has to be discussed.

"Israel is getting better in every aspect, and it has more to offer [than ever before]. The aliyah centre can help make the move," she said.

"Being part of federation means that aliyah is part of the community. We want to increase awareness about who we are, and we want to acknowledge those who are making aliyah."

ROM displays Mideast religious articles

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The C.J.N.

A new gallery featuring more than 1,000 objects from the Middle East, including a Sephardi Torah donated by the late Ed Mirvish, opened recently at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM).

The Wirth Gallery of the Middle East, named in honour of philanthropist, financier and longtime ROM supporter Alfred Wirth, features objects from Afghanistan, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, the West Bank, Syria, Turkey and Yemen, dating from the Paleolithic Age to 1900.

On Level 3 of the Michael Lee-Chin Crystal are clusters of artifacts arranged by themes: Arms and Armour, Arts in Life, Documents and Writing, Technology, and Ancient Spirituality and Religion. The last is an exploration of religious practices of the Jewish, Christian and Islamic religions seen through burial items and religious objects.

"The Middle East collection used to be on the third floor Centre block in a rather dark area, in the catacombs almost," said William Thorsell, the ROM's director and CEO. "We opened it up and increased the diversity and volume of the collections. Many pieces were largely stranded in the ROM's storage rooms in the 1920s without a permanent home, so it was quite moving to see the cars coming up with artifacts from core religions."

A Torah scroll and cover

A menorah lamp

One of the ossuaries

Entering the Middle East Gallery you'll find burial objects: three Jewish ossuaries (stone boxes) from the Herodian period, circa 100 BCE-100 CE, with gabled lids made of limestone, painted and inscribed with six pointed rosette decorations.

"The circular markings [rosettes] on the ossuaries made with a compass are the simplest way of decorating – the symmetry is visible and the esthetics have continuity," said Krzysztof Ciuk, assistant curator of Islamic history and archeology at the ROM. "Some scholars interpret it as a religious symbol suggesting the [rosettes] predate the star, but the star is not exclusive to Judaism. It is a very common decorative element in Islamic religion as well."

Ossuaries containing the bones of the dead, dating back to the first century BCE in Jerusalem, reflected the belief held by some at the time that the dead will be resurrected when the Messiah comes.

Also on exhibit is a small Syrian ceramic lamp from the fourth century CE, which has a menorah on it representing the one that stood in the Temple in Jerusalem – a seven-branched candlestick. Since Palestine was multicultural, lamps for Jews and Christians were made in the same factory, but with different symbols.

Rounding out the Wirth Gallery's impressive display is a Torah scroll with a beautiful Iraqi embossed silver case. According to the inscriptions, the case was made in 1907 to honour the memory of Ruhama, daughter of Katon, by her son, Rabbi Abraham. The scroll came from an older Torah case of the 17th-18th century.

While at the ROM, visit the Bishop White Gallery of Chinese artifacts tucked behind the central Currelly Gallery on Level 1. When the Kaifeng synagogue was destroyed by the flooding of the Yellow River in 1851, a few stone bowls and architectural pieces were salvaged. The collection includes a lovely Torah case of wood and gold lacquer dating back to the 17th century from the Qing Dynasty, a rare ink rubbing of a stone tablet engraved with the history of the synagogue from 1489 and a stone drain mouth for washing hands carved with monkeys and vines.

The Sir Christopher Ondaajee South Asian Gallery opened in the Michael Lee-Chin Crystal at the same time as the Wirth Gallery. The final two permanent galleries – the Patricia Harris Gallery of Textiles and Costume and the Shreyas and Mina Ajmera Gallery of Africa, the Americas and Asia-Pacific are set to open April 5. ‘KOSHER’ LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency
Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Making a meaningful contribution

By RABBI MEIR ROSENBERG

At one time or another, we have all contributed to a financial campaign. Projects, buildings and institutions call upon us to join with them in their endeavours.

Imagine, if you will, a scene where all of our campaign contributors have been called upon, pledges have been made, but there is still a shortfall. The last name on your list is a well-known philanthropist, and when asked for a pledge, he says: "Let me know how much your campaign is short and I will make up the difference."

What would your reaction be? You would probably thank and applaud him for this most magnanimous offer.

A similar scene can be found in this week's Torah portion of Vayakhel, although with quite a different ending. At the outset of the construction of the Mishkan – the Tabernacle – the nesiim, the heads of each tribe, wait until the completion of construction before volunteering their wealth.

Even though this may seem commendable, the Torah, in rebuke of their attitude, removes the letter "yud" from the word nesiim, which is normally spelled with two "yudin." (see Exodus 35:27).

The obvious question is why? Most probably, what the leadership donated was worth more than the total of all the other donations.

In a related story in the Talmud, in Kiddushin 31a, we see that the sages were willing to pay great sums for the precious stones that adorned the priestly garments. Why then were the nesiim punished?

Perhaps by looking at the rebuke, we can understand the reasoning. When the letter "yud" is added to a Hebrew word, it creates a plural. The nesiim did not share with the multitude of the Nation of Israel in the building of the Mishkan. They hesitated in their fulfilment of this mitzvah and thereby missed it completely.

In a few weeks, we will celebrate a Shabbat known as Shabbat Shekalim. It was given this name, because a special Torah portion concerning the commandment that everyone must give a half-shekel for atonement is read publicly. This obligation was incumbent equally on both affluent and underprivileged during the month of Adar. The prosperous could not give more and the unfortunate could not give less. The commentators explain that this mandatory donation was collected for the benefit of the entire nation since it was used for the purchase of the daily sacrifices of atonement. The shekel was the great equalizer – it had to be given, by everyone, on time, for the benefit of the nation.

The nesiim should have anticipated the possibility that, in their enthusiasm and devotion to HaShem, the people might contribute everything themselves – which, in fact, is what happened in the case of the Mishkan.

Covering a deficit is a wonderful offer if one is concerned about the recipient. But in the case of the Mishkan, the recipient was the Creator of the universe. He did not need the assistance of the nesiim or anyone else. The commandment to donate to the Mishkan was a singular privilege granted to the Jewish people for their own benefit.

Tzedakah is a great mitzvah, but like all other commandments, it is based upon Godly principles and ethics. Perhaps the underlying message is that when it comes to mitzvot that embody kindness and empathy, like tzedakah, we may be receiving more than we are giving.

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg is executive director of Mitzvah Canada and the rav of Congregation Ayin L'Tzion in Thornhill, Ont.

Judaism doesn't offer easy answers

The folks who brought you the thin, double-spaced best-selling book called The Secret are coming to town.

Written by a television commercial producer with a team of "experts" (a feng shui counsellor, a personal coach and a metaphysician – which medical school does one attend to become a metaphysician?) it has a powerfully positive message with a quasi-religious feel, all in a package designed to look like an ancient scroll.

The message of the book – I can have everything I've ever wanted if I just focus on it – comes complete with miracle stories of wealth and finding the partner of your dreams if you just send out the right vibes.

The talk by a member of The Secret team is part of a series by several other "you can get rich by just doing X" speakers, including some of the famous and never-ending series of Chicken Soup for the You-Name-It Soul authors. The series is being touted on the radio and in the news as being able to help you become "a phenomenal you."

These speakers remind me of an old-fashioned tent revival meeting. Selling miracles without religion, guilt or obligation (except buying their books, of course), they promise to grant my every wish.

It's so un-Jewish.

What I really love about Judaism is that it isn't about me fulfilling all my desires, and it's supposed to make me less self-centred and more aware of my responsibility to others. Judaism comes to conquer that selfishness and to constantly remind us that it's not all and always about us.

We matter, Judaism says, because we pull our weight. We matter because we are part of a system, a wheel that turns slowly and surely, and moves toward progress and tikkun olam. We make this world a better one because we are in it – not because we think certain thoughts and get certain things, but because we do things that actively change the world.

We devour books like The Secret in the millions – self-help books are the fastest selling books on the market – not so much because we want to escape who we are, but because we desperately want to be in control of who we will become. We want to believe that we can control our lives as easily as we control our TV remotes. The sad secret of these kinds of books is that when we believe only in ourselves, we will believe in just about anything.

Judaism's secrets go against the popular culture. They aren't easy or self-serving. How I wish Judaism could promise you unending health and happiness, fewer worries and a way to bring you everything you need and want. How I wish Judaism could make you healthy, wealthy and wise (and thin, but not too thin), and could replace all your fears and sorrows with nothing but unlimited simchah and security.

But the Judaism I practise is not that simplistic, and it doesn't have a genie-in-the-bottle God who grants you three wishes and then goes away.

So let's ask ourselves: why does our society encourage this kind of self-aggrandizement, self-conceit and self-centredness? And why have these kinds of books become our new bibles and these TV gurus our new rabbis?

If you can figure out an answer that challenges you, you may have discovered a real secret.

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

Jewish Life

Many people find it demeaning that monetary considerations should play a role in religious teachings. They think religious issues shouldn't be "tainted" by the almighty dollar, by the intrusion of the secular into the holy.

Such an argument is foreign to Judaism on both practical and ideological grounds. Like it or not, most of life's key decisions are affected greatly by financial considerations. We spend most of our waking hours engaged in the pursuit of money – a pursuit that can have much religious value. It should not be surprising that there are more mitzvot related to the economic sphere than to any other. We need much guidance in this crucial area of life.

By examining a person's relationship to money – how they earn it, how they spend it and with whom they share it – we gain insight into a person's true character. And with character development being, arguably, the fundamental goal of Judaism, and considering the role of money in such development, we can readily understand the talmudic assertion that God's judgment begins with an examination of our monetary dealings.

All this should come as no surprise to the religious thinker.

What may be surprising to some is that the way Jewish law is applied varies according to the financial status of the questioner. This "flexibility" covers not only charity obligations or the money that a person should spend to beautify our mitzvot. It also includes such areas as what foods we may eat or even aspects of Shabbat observance.

Torah regulates our relation to money

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

An accidental mixing of meat and milk might be permissible for one person, yet forbidden to another, the determining factor being each one's financial means.

"The Torah takes mercy on the money of the Jewish people" is a hallowed principle of Jewish law. It highlights the fact that Jewish law is both an art and a science.

While technical data and proficiency are the basic building blocks of any legal ruling, socioeconomic, cultural and communal factors refine the ruling so that it's properly applied to the questioner, given that person's particular set of circumstances.

Despite its importance, the aforementioned principle should not be misunderstood. Its applicability is limited to rabbinic law and to cases of biblical law in which a generally rejected interpretation is accepted due to extreme financial hardship.

As well, financial considerations play no role when an explicit biblical law is being violated. Only a potential danger to life can serve as a mandate to override the law.

One should also not be critical of those who, due to financial considerations, give up much of Jewish law – we can't be certain how we might act in a similarly desperate situation. However, the heroic efforts of those immigrants to North America whose refusal to work on Shabbat forced them to look for new jobs every Monday must inspire those of us who, thankfully, can, with ease, take off work for "religious reasons."

Monetary considerations play an even greater role in decisions affecting the people of Israel. Thus many rabbinic authorities have authorized the "selling of the land" of Israel during the sabbatical year (which we are currently in).

Initially, such a sale enabled 19th-century Zionist settlers to remain in Israel, since ceasing to work on the land for a year would have forced them to emigrate. Today, it serves to prevent the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars to the Israeli economy.

Additionally, there is a political factor that must not be overlooked in questions affecting the State of Israel. Without the use of this legal loophole, which allows farmers to work the land and sell the produce that they grow, food would have to be imported from Gaza, thereby providing funds to those who continue to terrorize our people.

In May, Israel celebrates 60 years of independence. But one of the country's most famous symbols is more than twice as old.

Little did Naftali Herz Imber realize that the poem he began working on 130 years ago would resonate around the world and become a defining expression of the aspiration to live in a Jewish homeland.

Imber, a Galician Jew, wrote a poem titled Tikvatuenu (Our Hope) in 1878 to commemorate the founding of the Jewish settlement of Petach Tikvah (Gateway of Hope). Imber moved to Palestine and visited the city in 1882 where a resident, Samuel Cohen, put the poem to music based on a traditional Moldavian-Romanian folk song. Bedrich Smetana used a similar melody as the basis for the classical work Moldau. [tinyurl.com/zyybx9]

Actually, Imber's original poem wasn't quite as succinct as today's anthem. His version had nine stanzas with a refrain that originally went: "Our hope is not yet lost/ Our ancient hope/ To return to the land of our fathers/ The city where David encamped." I came across a fascinating recording of the original lyrics sung by Al Jolson. [www.lookstein.org/resources/al_jolson_hatikvah.mp3] Jolson's Hebrew was quite good and his performance a bit less schmaltzy than the Jolson who I know from "Mammy" or "Swanee." [tinyurl.com/yw0az6]

When the Zionist movement began to look for an anthem, Hatikvah wasn't a shoo-in. During the Fourth Zionist Congress in London in 1900, delegates were asked to consider both Hatikvah and Psalm 126, better known as Shir Hama'alat (Song of Ascents), which is chanted before Birkat Hamazon on Shabbat and on other festive days. [tinyurl.com/2mv6r3] Hatikvah was officially confirmed as the Zionist anthem at the 18th conference in Prague in 1933. [tinyurl.com/33e5oa] Surprisingly, it would have to wait until November 2004 to be proclaimed Israel's official anthem! [tinyurl.com/34ma52]

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first chief rabbi of Palestine in the early 20th century, had misgivings about some of the lyrics of Hatikvah and wrote his own alternative anthem, Ha Emunah (The Faith). Zev Rosenfield has put together a comparison of the two poems. As well, he examines what relationship anthems, flags and similar symbols have to traditional Judaism. Rosenfield points out, for example, that flags are mentioned in the Torah and that each of the 12 tribes had its own banner and precious stone. [tinyurl.com/357tkr]

One of the most moving versions of the anthem was sung three years before the establishment of Israel. In April 1945, British forces liberated the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. BBC reporter Patrick Gordon Walker arrived in the camp on the fifth day after liberation as survivors were planning to usher in their first Sabbath in freedom. Walker said: "During the service, the few hundred people gathered together were sobbing openly, with joy of their liberation and with sorrow of the memory of their parents and brothers and sisters that had been taken from them and gassed and burned. These people knew they were being recorded. They wanted the world to hear their voice." Thanks to Patrick Walker, you can. [tinyurl.com/2kq2qf]

You can find contemporary arrangements at NationalAnthems.us. [tinyurl.com/2k98f5] and at YouTube. [tinyurl.com/2o3wvv] One of them is from 1978 when Barbra Streisand appeared on a TV show, The Stars Salute Israel at 30. Streisand performs Hatikvah after she schmoozes with Israel's then-prime minister, Golda Meir. [tinyurl.com/y7hyll]

Do you have a version of Hatikvah you want the world to hear? This May 7, on Israeli's 60th Independence Day, you'll have a chance to sing out simultaneously with groups around the world as part of the LiveHatikva project. The website has info about how yours can chime in. [livehatikva.org]

My favourite online version of Hatikvah, however, was unexpected and very emotional. It took place at the 2004 Summer Olympics in Athens when windsurfer Gal Fridman captured the first gold medal in Israel's history. Nothing beats the pride on Fridman's face as the first notes of his country's anthem were played. [tinyurl.com/26tc35]

Art show to focus on the Israeli-Canadian experience

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Nineteen young Israelis who live in Ontario will display their artwork this coming Saturday night as part of Artsy, an arts and culture event in Toronto.

"We have 19 artists from various backgrounds, but what they all have in common is the fact that they lived in Israel and now reside in Canada. Their art reflects that," said Orly Cohen, Hillel of Greater Toronto's program associate, who organized the event through Fanan, a group affiliated with Hillel that works to foster a community for young Israeli-Canadians.

"It is a multimedia art show. A majority of the work is... photography and painting, but there are some audio installations, pottery and sculptures," she said, adding that the theme of the artwork is the Israeli-Canadian experience.

She said the event, which is being held March 1 at Designers Walk, will also feature a DJ, a live drummer, and kosher Israeli-style food.

Artsy, a play on the Hebrew word that means "my homeland," features artists ranging widely both in age and experience.

This piece, by Oranit Kedmy, will be on display at the Artsy arts and culture event.

Some are high school and university students who have never dabbled in the arts before, and others are "consummate artists" who are well into their 30s, Cohen said.

One of the artists, Oranit Kedmy, will present works that feature mermaids.

"It's quite interesting. She has tied in the theme to her strong female identity and feeling like a fish out of water," Cohen said.

In a written description of her art, Kedmy said that most of her painting is a tribute to a deep connection she shares with her mother.

"The women I paint are also a homage to all women, especially Israeli ones, who are equal to Israeli men in every way, including service in the army," she wrote.

She added that her artwork depicts "the heartbreak of leaving Israel and knowing that there is no place in the world quite like it, embedded with struggle and loss and endless beauty," and also represents "the courage of the Israeli people, who live life to the fullest, with passion and an unbreakable spirit."

Kedmy wrote that as a Canadian citizen, she does her best to present people with a different side of Israel through her work and to show others "how similar we are to every woman out there who has to find beauty amidst adversity, light through darkness."

Although the event is free to attend, Cohen said she hopes that people will "pay what they can" so that the proceeds can go toward a Hillel initiative to raise money to buy computers for impoverished schools in Bat Yam, a suburb of Tel Aviv.

"This is our most exciting initiative this year for Fanan, in that it is really allowing people from the Israeli community to actively participate in both a Hillel initiative and a community initiative that is not exclusive to the Israeli community," Cohen said.

"It's allowing us to create a dialogue between Israelis and non-Israelis, and we hope to see that reflected in the crowd."

RCMP probes U of T student for Web postings

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Despite being monitored by the RCMP's counter-terrorism unit since September, a student at the University of Toronto's Mississauga campus continued to post online messages that promote the murder of Zionists, as well as Canadian soldiers in Canada.

Although he has yet to be charged, Salman Hossain, a political science student, is being watched for Internet chatroom and blog postings that included calling the killing of Canadian troops on Canadian soil "legitimate" and "well deserved," the RCMP said.

Spokesperson Cathy McCrory told The C/N that "as soon as he began posting, we received calls, because it is not something that would go unnoticed. [The postings are] pretty graphic."

When three Islamic militants were arrested in September for planning to bomb the Ramstein Air Base and Frankfurt International Airport in Germany, Hossain posted the following on an anti-Zionist blog: "I hope the German brothers were gonna blow up U.S.-German bases in their country. We should do that here in Canada as well. Kill as many western soldiers as well so that they think twice before entering foreign countries on behalf of their Jew masters."

Although the postings have since been removed, the National Post reported late last month that Hossain posted other messages targeting Jews and referring to Zionist conspiracy theories about the World Trade Center attacks.

In one, Hossain asked: "When do I get to shoot a few Jews down for attempting to blow up dozens of mosques in America right after 9-11... why f---ing target the Americans when the Jews are better?"

Hossain, a Bangladeshi-Canadian, added that he hoped for "many more merry 9-11s" and said "Jews are literally the most treacherous nation on the face of the Earth," and he claimed that "the filthy Jews carried out 9-11," the Post reported.

McCrory couldn't say if other contributors to the blogs and chatrooms where Hossain posted his messages are also being monitored, or if he is being monitored as part of a group.

When the story broke in January, students at U of T's Mississauga campus (UTM) — which Hillel of Greater Toronto estimates has about 60 to 70 Jewish students — created a Facebook group called "Expel or Suspend Salman Hossain."

More than 700 people have joined the group, with most condemning Hossain's comments and calling for his expulsion based on U of T's student code of conduct, which states that "no person shall engage in a course of vexatious conduct that is directed at one or more specific individuals, and that is based on the race, ancestry, place of origin, colour, ethnic origin, citizenship, sex, sexual orientation, creed, age [etc.]."

Despite word that the RCMP was monitoring his postings, Hossain continued to attack Canadian soldiers and Jews on the Facebook group's wall on Jan. 31 and Feb. 1, and he provided links to some of his blog postings, which have since been removed from the Internet.

"The Zionists are the problem. And we have to root them outta society," he wrote in one posting.

Hossain also made outrageous claims such as "Hitler and top Nazis were Jews," and warned that "if you get seduced to killing others for your masters, then I wish death upon those who do."

UTM spokesperson Jane Stirling said the university can't disclose private information about a student, but she stressed that it "takes matters of this nature very seriously and is co-operating fully with the appropriate police authorities."

Tilly Shames, associate director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said that as soon as she learned that the RCMP was monitoring Hossain, she contacted U of T's anti-racism and cultural diversity office and the director of the vice-provost, students' office to find out how the case was progressing.

"They both informed me that they are complying with police on all matters regarding the investigation. They will inform us at Hillel as the case progresses."

Hillel's director of emerging campuses, Daniel Abramson, said that he first found out that the RCMP was monitoring Hossain's postings two weeks after the Post story appeared.

He said he was at UTM for its Unity Through Diversity Week when student union president Walied Khogali approached him and some Jewish students who were taking part in the event.

Abramson said Khogali told him that "it was stuff that [Hossain] said in class that alerted [the student union] to him. It was students and teachers in his classes that were freaked out by it."

Khogali didn't respond to interview requests from The C/N, but he posted a message on the Facebook group that said "there is a difference between free speech demonstrating disapproval and free speech inciting the killing of others. As a union, we cannot support anyone suggesting the murder of others."

The external affairs officer for UTM's Muslim Students' Association (MSA), Yusuf Bhatia, also distanced his group from Hossain by noting that he is "not a member of UTM MSA... and all its members do not endorse his comments explicitly or implicitly."

Abramson said he's unaware whether U of T is looking into expelling Hossain, but said he's pleased with the responses of the school and the student union. He added he was glad to see the student union took action before being prompted by Hillel.

McCrory said the RCMP can't do much more right now than monitor Hossain.

"The criminal code offence says specifically that you have to publicly incite hatred against an identifiable group where it is likely to lead to a breach of the peace... I don't think he's got that kind of clout at the moment... but I think in this case we have a responsibility to monitor this because we really don't know what markets he's targeting here."

Coast to Coast

Kosovo declaration draws Mideast comparisons

Last week, while other world events took the media spotlight off Israel, Kosovo's declaration of independence found its way into the discourse about Israel-Palestinian peace talks.

In a Feb. 20 report, "Palestinian aide suggests Kosovo a model," Mohammed Daraghmech of Associated Press wrote that Yasser Abed Rabbo, a senior Palestinian official, suggested that if negotiations with Israel don't produce results, "[t]he Palestinians should follow Kosovo's example and unilaterally declare independence."

Rabbo was quoted as saying, "Kosovo is not better than Palestine. If the whole world, the United States, the European Union, the majority of its states, have embraced the independence of Kosovo, why shouldn't this happen with Palestine as well?"

According to AP, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "reacted coolly to the idea, saying in a statement that he remained committed to reaching a negotiated peace agreement this year."

Similarly, "chief Palestinian negotiator, Ahmed Qureia, quickly quashed the idea of a unilateral decision and said such a proposal was never discussed by the Palestinian leadership."

In the Feb. 21 Globe and Mail ("Kosovo has set a precedent, Palestinians say"), Mark MacKinnon noted (in contrast to the AP report) that Abbas was more qualified about the Kosovo model.

MacKinnon wrote: "While other Palestinian officials distanced themselves from the remarks, Mr. Abbas himself appeared to leave the door open for such a move, though not before the Annapolis talks have run their course... Abbas said he was committed to pursuing those talks and ending the conflict at the negotiating table, 'but if we cannot achieve that and we reach a deadlock, we will go back to our Arab nation to take the necessary decision at the highest level.'"

MacKinnon also remarked that the "parallels between the Kosovars and the Palestinians are actually quite thin. Where Serbian troops were driven out of Kosovo by a NATO bombing campaign nine years ago, the Israeli military is still spread throughout the West Bank."

It's also important to note that Israel's military presence is sanctioned by the United Nations itself, in the form of UN Security Council resolution 242, which allows that presence pending peace and security agreements between Israel and its Arab neighbours – precisely what the current negotiating process is meant to achieve.

In any event, since the Kosovo model is likely to crop up in other discussions about Palestinian independence, it's worth taking a closer look at the actual declaration of independence.

For instance, Timothy Garton Ash in "This dependent independence is the least worst situation for Kosovo"

(Guardian, Feb. 21) wrote: "Amid all the kaffuffle around Kosovo's declaration of independence, few have paused to note what an extraordinary document it is. It is so hedged about with conditions, obligations and reservations, many of them concerning protection for the remaining Serbian minorities, so replete with commitments to consult, honour and obey the province's international patrons, that it is also a declaration of dependence."

This raises an interesting question: If the Palestinians did follow the Kosovo model and declare independence, would they build in such guaranteed minority rights for Jewish settlers who want to remain in the West Bank on land they claim adherence to historically and religiously?

Worth noting: the Foreign Press Association (FPA) represents the interests of more than 450 members of the foreign media from 32 countries who cover stories in Israel and in areas under Palestinian control. It has issued repeated warnings about Hamas and other Islamist groups' harassment of journalists trying to report stories from Gaza.

On Feb. 18, the FPA issued an urgent warning: "In recent days the FPA has received a number of separate reports from colleagues in Gaza suggesting a renewed threat to foreign journalists. These threats come from the Army of Islam and there have been reports of gunmen entering hotels and checking for the presence of foreign journalists... we urge all members to be extra vigilant and to consider their profile and exposure while working in Gaza."

Lawyer vows to press Ottawa in Jerusalem passport case

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

A lawyer who lost a two-year battle to list a client's birthplace as "Jerusalem, Israel" in his Canadian passport will pursue the case despite the fact the Supreme Court recently refused to hear his appeal.

"The issue of 'winning' is not finally decided," David Matas said in an interview last week. "The ultimate decision rests with the [federal] government."

He added, "All the [Federal Court] decided was that the government policy was legal, not that it was proper. The litigation made clear, at least to me, that the present policy is unjustifiable. All reasons given for the present policy are flimsy and untenable, verging on the outrageous."

Matas, a Winnipeg-based lawyer, is convinced that the case is far from closed. "I still believe that we can win, in the sense of persuading the government to change its policy."

He represents Eliyahu Veffor, an Orthodox Israeli man from Toronto who immigrated to Canada with his family about 12 years ago and claimed he had a right to add "Israel" after "Jerusalem" in his passport.

Gordon Wiseman, Veffor's lawyer in Toronto, suggested that while Veffor has run out of legal remedies, Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Conservative government may yet come to his rescue.

"It's the end of the present road," Wiseman conceded in a reference to Veffor's appeal. "But Canada's new government is very supportive of Israel. In the political realm, we may see changes. The court decision is definitely not the last word on the issue."

Canada does not recognize Israel's claim to and control of Jerusalem, believing that its status can be resolved only as part of a negotiated settlement with the Palestinians.

In line with this position, Canada's embassy in Israel is located in Tel Aviv rather than in Jerusalem.

In contesting the current policy, Veffor argued that his rights had been violated.

"I feel that the government is rejecting and denying my religious belief in the significance of Jerusalem to the Jewish religion," he wrote in a court affidavit when he launched his case two years ago in April. "My religion teaches me that Jerusalem is the capital of Israel."

Matas failed to convince the Federal Court that Canada permits Canadians to choose which country appears in their passport as their place of birth.

"The general Canadian passport policy is to allow persons born in territories whose sovereignty is not settled at international law to choose the country of birth in their passports," he explained.

"So, for example, as I understand it, persons born in Kashmir can choose either Pakistan or India. Persons born in north Cyprus can choose either Cyprus or Turkey. Persons born in the western Sahara can choose Algeria or Mauritania. And so on.

"The only exception to this policy is Jerusalem. This exception discriminated against Veffor and also, because of his religious beliefs about Israel, frustrated his freedom of religion."

Matas intends to submit a letter to the Canadian government setting out his arguments.

"I [feel] that our position was and is correct," he noted.

Matas described the Federal Court's verdict as "a case-management decision, not a correctness decision. It does not even address the merits of the case. All the court did is say what is legal, not what is wise or sound policy."

Veffor is currently completing his military service in Israel, Wiseman said.

Gov't considering security funding

SIP documentation states it was established "to help enhance the security infrastructure of communities targeted by hate-motivated crime." Funding is available for non-profit organizations associated with a community, to protect places of worship, educational institutions and community centres.

"As far as we're concerned, the program is necessary" and should be made permanent, Rudner said.

"This is not the first time such threats have been directed at the Jewish community. By this time, the Jewish community is aware of the protocols."

American Jewish organizations were also told to be vigilant, particularly after a Los Angeles-area Jewish Community Centre (JCC) was firebombed last week.

The JCC in West Hills, Calif., in suburban Los Angeles, was hit with two Molotov cocktails. No one was hurt.

Israel, meanwhile, put its embassies on alert following warnings from Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah and Mohammad Ali Jafari, the commander of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards who threatened to strike Israeli facilities and Jews abroad.

In recent years, Congress has issued other security advisory as events in the Middle East heightened tensions. Security measures have been implemented at schools, synagogues and community buildings, where guards patrol and electronic monitoring devices have been added.

Congress has maintained close relations with law enforcement officials, and Rudner said that when tensions increase, police in Toronto and York Region are asked to step up their patrols around community buildings. Police have been sensitive to the community's security concerns, he added.

Young Israeli fights to protect endangered species in Africa

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Ofir Drori began researching the illegal bushmeat trade in Cameroon six years ago for an article he was writing, he had no idea that what he learned would move him to found the Last Great Ape (LAGA), the only wildlife law enforcement NGO in Africa.

Throughout his investigation, which was inspired by a quote from primatologist Jane Goodall who said that gorillas and apes could be extinct within 15 years, Drori witnessed the accessibility of gorilla meat in the market, the corruption within the Cameroonian legal system and the ineffectiveness of organizations, including the World Wildlife Fund.

Drori volunteered at an ape shelter and even made connections with people who took him directly to ape-meat dealers, but nothing prepared him for an encounter with dealers who were holding a live baby chimpanzee they were trying to sell as a pet.

He said that when he saw the baby chimp, near death, and chained in a dark, dirty room, he felt that he had to do something.

He went to the local authorities in hopes that it would be confiscated and integrated into a family of chimps, but they weren't interested. In fact, although wildlife laws had been in place since 1994, not a single arrest had been made nearly nine years later.

Drori decided to take the matter into his own hands. Armed with nothing but a book on Cameroonian law, he went back to the hunters, opened the book and told them that if prosecuted, they'd face up to three years in prison.

He told them that he knew as well as they did, that the law didn't hold much water, and that to get out of it, it would cost them no more than a $5 bribe. "But this is my new job," he said, bluffing. "This is my work. And my work is to get this law applied and my work is to make sure that you don't bribe your way out, and you're going to court to be judged and face imprisonment."

The dealers bought his story and released the chimp to Drori, who acted as its mother for five months before it was integrated into a chimpanzee family.

He said that this event transformed him, and rather than continue to write a piece criticizing the existing organizations, he felt that he needed to fill the void himself.

In 2002, Israeli-born Drori, 31, established LAGA, an organization that works to prosecute violators of Cameroon's wildlife laws that protect endangered species, including apes, lions and elephants, and combat corruption within the legal system.

Although Drori said he has had a love affair with Africa since he was a child, he had no idea years ago that his future was in Cameroon.

"When I was 18, all my friends went on small trips before going to the army, maybe spending a week in France, or something like this, before we'd have to spend all our time in the army. I just wanted to go to Africa, and of course, no one wanted to go with me."

After spending only a few days in Kenya on his own, he knew that going on safaris wouldn't scratch his itch to experience Africa.

"I took my backpack and started walking into the bush... I met some tribes and lived with the tribes, and it was a fantastic wonderful experience for me."

He said that after spending six weeks living in the bush, he knew that he couldn't just go through the motions and "continue life in Israel in a way that was expected of me."

After serving four years in the Israeli army as an officer, thinking about what he was going to do with his life after the army, he returned to Africa.

"At this point, I was on the lookout for an adventure, so I looked for the most remote villages, and the most remote cultures out there. I spent months crossing the wilderness... It was amazing. I got a lot from Africa, a lot of love and a lot of beauty."

He said that he was living the life of a nomad, moving from city to city, country to country, volunteering, writing, taking pictures and even teaching.

When Drori started writing about human rights abuses in Nigeria six years ago, he decided he needed a break and travelled to Cameroon to focus his energy on another issue.

When he began to research the illegal bushmeat trade, instead of finding activists who were dedicating their lives to ending the illegal trade, he found staff who were working for organizations that were receiving public funding and living in "a rich man's quarter, with huge villas and SUVs."

"I realized that there was something fundamentally wrong with the way the system is managed. I was full of criticism against a system that is supposed to change something."

Drori assists law enforcement in Cameroon to investigate and arrest a lion skin dealer.

He said that when he discovered that there had not been a single prosecution since a law against the trade passed nearly a decade earlier, he felt something needed to be done.

"The trade of endangered species is the largest illegal trade in the world after drug and arms trafficking, stated by the last UN congress on crime," Drori said.

"I opened LAGA with a lot of criticism against an existing system that doesn't work... [that uses] public money - millions and millions of dollars... I wanted to open an NGO... that would not only take the role of an adviser or lobbyist, but would really go down and do the work, and get the law applied."

Last Great Ape (LAGA) founder Ofir Drori with a chimpanzee he rescued from illegal bushmeat dealers.

In just five years, LAGA has helped move Cameroon from a baseline of zero wildlife prosecutions in 2003 to a prosecution once a week against major wildlife dealers mostly engaged in cross-border trafficking.

He said LAGA, which has received awards for its accomplishments, consists of four departments made up of only 13 staff.

The intelligence department consists of undercover agents who carry hidden cameras and audio recorders in an attempt to gather concrete evidence against the traders.

"Their job is to try to find the biggest fish in this illegal trade - the big ivory dealers, the big ape traffickers."

The staff of the LAGA operations department assists law enforcement to arrest violators and to channel complaint reports to the courts.

LAGA also formed a legal team to assist in the administrative procedures of prosecuting dealers. The biggest obstacle, Drori said, is fighting corruption in the legal system.

"In a place where you have corruption, even when the person is [sentenced to] three years, he may be out of jail after a week because he bribed the prison commissioner. We do jail visits both to examine the human rights conditions and to see that the people who are convicted are behind bars. We had many cases in which they weren't and many cases in which we had to arrest them again and bring them back to prison."

The fourth LAGA department works to show the community through the media that violators of the wildlife laws are now taken seriously.

"The idea is not to put everyone in Cameroon behind bars, but to create a deterrent to entering this illegal trade."

Although dealing with criminals can be dangerous, Drori feels privileged to be in this line of work.

"Every time we have an operation where we fight corruption, where we manage to do justice and get the laws applied, it is very satisfying," he said.

"The whole idea is to show the world that we can do things differently... The message we are trying to push into the existing system is that it is not about money. It is about values. We don't need millions to get things achieved."

Quebecers' view of Jews sets them apart, poll finds

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A recent nationwide poll commissioned in the aftermath of Quebec's "reasonable accommodation" commission hearings on minorities reveals a striking disparity between Quebecers' attitudes toward Jews and those of other Canadians.

The poll, commissioned by the Association for Canadian Studies (ACS) and conducted by Léger Marketing between Jan. 31 and Feb. 4, asked 1,500 Canadians whether they agreed with, disagreed with, or didn't know/had no opinion on a series of statements regarding Jews and anti-Semitism.

According to the poll results, 41 per cent of Quebecers agreed, and another 41 per cent disagreed, with the idea that "Jews want to impose their customs and traditions on others." By comparison, only 11 per cent agreed and 74 per cent disagreed in the rest of Canada. The average nationwide was 19 per cent agreeing and 64 per cent disagreeing.

To another statement — "Jews want to participate fully in society" — 41 per cent of Quebecers disagreed and 31 per cent agreed, compared with a mere eight per cent disagreeing and 72 per cent agreeing among other Canadians. The national average was 16 per cent disagreeing and 63 per cent agreeing.

On the idea that "Jews have made an important contribution to society," 35 per cent of Quebecers disagreed and 41 per cent agreed, compared with only 10 per cent disagreeing and 74 per cent agreeing in the rest of Canada. The Canadian average was 16 per cent disagreeing and 65 per cent agreeing.

The poll sample of 1,500 included 500 Quebecers, and had a margin of error of no more than plus or minus 3.5 per cent 19 times out of 20.

"This is a snapshot of a problem, but it is a problem," said ACS executive director Jack Jedwab. "I have to say, I wasn't jumping to release these results. But it is symptomatic of an issue that has to be addressed."

Jedwab said the reasonable accommodation debates — and some of the intolerant comments about Jews and Muslims that found public voice there — have apparently resonated among a not insignificant number of Quebecers. "Some of the [poll] questions," Jedwab said, "did come out of the hearings."

Jedwab said, however, that even though the Quebec figures represent only a "snapshot" of public opinion in the wake of the hearings, the results still reflect the reality of the day. The poll results, he ventured, could become a "self-fulfilling prophecy" over the long term if the provincial government does not begin to put some "real money" into rapprochement initiatives instead of perpetuating the idea that Quebec has been a model for intercultural and inter-ethnic understanding and coexistence.

"We need to rethink the intercultural approach," he said. "There are four previous polls that do not support the idea that Quebec has had successful intercultural programming. Are we really investing in it?"

Jedwab acknowledged that one possible factor in the disparity between Quebec and the rest of Canada in the question about Jews imposing their customs might be that among francophone Quebecers, the word "imposer" is not necessarily taken to mean "forced upon," but rather has the sense that something has been excessively "in your face."

Still, Jedwab said this does not minimize the overall implication of the Quebec numbers in the three questions he felt reflect the sensibility of average Quebecers in the wake of the hearings.

"It resonated in the public domain," he said.

Among the poll's other results was that 21 per cent of Canadians agreed and 49 per cent disagreed with the notion that "anti-Semitism is on the rise in Canada" (30 per cent of Quebecers agreed, and 38 per cent disagreed).

Montreal institutions increase vigilance

MONTREAL — Local Jewish community institutions received no specific threats in the wake of top Hezbollah terrorist Imad Mughniyah's assassination Feb. 12 in a car bombing in Damascus.

Nevertheless, within a day, Montreal synagogues and educational institutions were advised to step up their vigilance and watchfulness after Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah threatened to fight Israel anywhere in the world.

"We just advised them in the aftermath to be more careful, to update lists, to make sure that all mechanisms are in place," Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of the Montreal Jewish Community Security Coordinating Committee, told The C/JN.

According to a "community security advisory" sent out to local institutions by Federation CJA and released to The C/JN, the community has been "monitoring the situation" and been in "constant contact" with intelligence and law enforcement agencies.

"At this time we have no specific information relating to any threats to Jewish establishments in Montreal," the advisory said. "Given the general threat of retaliation announced by the Hezbollah, and the call from the Israeli prime minister's office to increase vigilance in Israeli and Jewish establishments throughout the world, we urge you to take the time to review your security measures, emergency response procedures and calls lists."

The memo also asked that institutions remain "extremely vigilant and prepared," and that staff "be briefed and instructed to report any suspicious behaviour, person, package or vehicle." —D.L.

Pioneer synagogue to be moved to a Calgary park

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

Calgary's Heritage Park is soon to be the only historical park in Canada that will have a restored pioneer synagogue on display.

"The only other synagogue I know of that exists in a historic park in North America is in San Diego," says Irena Karshenbaum, who proposed the idea to the board of directors of Heritage Park.

"The proposal was to build a replica of a synagogue that we knew had existed in the Montefiore colony of Jewish immigrants who had settled in Alberta in 1910. We had a photo of the Montefiore synagogue, but assumed the building itself no longer actually existed," says Karshenbaum, who is the president of a volunteer group she founded, The Little Synagogue on the Prairie Project Society.

"After the project was approved by Heritage Park, one of our board members, Emanuel Cohen, who was born on a ranch in eastern Alberta, did a lot of research and actually found the Montefiore synagogue that we were proposing to replicate," says Karshenbaum.

The Montefiore synagogue, which is approximately 800 square feet, was built in 1913 by Jewish immigrants from Russia and eastern Europe. It served about 30 Jewish families, not only as a synagogue but also as a school and community centre, and was built near the present-day village of Sibbald, just west of the Alberta-Saskatchewan border.

Due to harsh farming conditions, most of the Jewish settlers abandoned the Montefiore colony by the 1920s. Some settlers moved to Calgary and Edmonton, but most of them went to southern California, where they became chicken farmers.

"The synagogue was abandoned, and during the Great Depression, the government sold it around 1937 to a family for $200," Karshenbaum says. "It was moved to a small town in eastern Alberta and lived in as a house and kept in the same family for almost 70 years. It remained there until Emanuel Cohen tracked it down last year."

"Our society bought it for $55,000. The non-Jewish family living in it didn't know it had once been a synagogue."

Cohen, a 77-year-old real estate appraiser, says that in order to find the synagogue he searched through local school maps, museums, provincial archives and spoke to many local residents.

"I had been on the trail of that

Irena Karshenbaum with a model of the synagogue

ty in Canada will support this unique project, which is such a positive way to educate people about the beauty of Judaism," Karshenbaum says.

Trudy Cowan, a heritage and museum consultant, will oversee the synagogue's restoration.

"The building has an impressive amount of original historical content intact," she says. "We have been able to access the original ceiling behind the drop ceiling that was added. The tops of the original windows are still there. We can even see they had a separate little library, and we have two books stamped 'Montefiore Hebrew Free Public Library.'"

Cohen says that the "front of the synagogue had a Magen David, which is gone, but the amazing thing is that the nail holes for it are still there."

The restored synagogue will have the capacity to host small weddings and bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies. Tour guides in costume will explain Jewish religion and culture to visitors to the synagogue.

The synagogue opens in the spring of 2009, the 120th anniversary of the first Jewish family, headed by Rachel and Jacob Diamond, settling in Calgary. Their great-grandson, Bobby Libin, is the chair of the historical society's fundraising committee.

synagogue for the last 15 years, ever since I wrote my first paper on the Montefiore colony for the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta," he says.

Karshenbaum says there "were lots of little synagogues on the prairies similar to this one, but they have been lost."

"Calgary is a city of a million people and has only about 8,000 Jews. Heritage Park has approximately half a million visitors a year. Most of the people who will go inside this synagogue will be non-Jewish, and for many it will be their first time ever setting foot inside a synagogue."

The Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta, which Karshenbaum founded, has launched a fundraising campaign, with the goal of raising a million dollars, to move, restore and equip the Montefiore synagogue. About $400,000 has already been raised.

Temple Sinai's first rabbi remembered for his intellect

By FRANCES KRAFT

Staff Reporter

Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, founding rabbi of Temple Sinai, died Feb. 19. He was 83.

At his funeral last Thursday, an estimated 700 people heard the temple's three rabbis praise their colleague and mentor for his insights, eloquence and ability to connect with people.

"He would touch us not only with guidance and wisdom, but with wit and humour," Rabbi Michael Dolgin, the temple's senior rabbi, said in a eulogy.

A native of Somerville, Mass., Rabbi Pearlson was raised in a home of modest means, with two parents and four children living in a two-bedroom apartment.

His intellect was apparent at an early age, and his brothers found it "a challenge" to follow him in school, Rabbi Dolgin said.

He added that an early bout with rheumatic fever affected Rabbi Pearlson's health throughout his life, but it also afforded him the opportunity to join every book club he could and "sharpen his love of fine music that he would listen to on the radio, hour after hour."

"Learning was part of his life from the very beginning... He had a powerful mind, and a unique character."

A former religion columnist for the Toronto Star, Rabbi Pearlson also pioneered a daily religious interfaith dialogue on CBC Radio. He was a Canadian member of the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations, and a board member of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, which awarded him its national humanitarian award.

With a background in communication, engineering, psychology and law, Rabbi Pearlson began working as a lawyer before he turned his sights elsewhere.

"The behaviour he witnessed [as a lawyer] was not in the highest traditions of the legal profession," Rabbi Dolgin said. "He had learned from his father that you had nothing if you didn't have morality and standards."

Rabbi Pearlson first came to Toronto as a 29-year-old Hebrew Union College rabbinical student, working with Temple Sinai's 14 founding families. In the years since, the congregation has grown to become Canada's second-largest Reform congregation, with 6,000 individual members.

Rabbi Lori Cohen said that Rabbi Pearlson shared "a treasure" with her every day in the form of a story or insight, opening "windows into the rabbinic and into the souls of people in need."

Rabbi Erin Polonsky, whose family joined the temple when she was four years old, said Rabbi Pearlson set an example by dedicating his life to the welfare of the congregation, the Jewish community and the greater community.

Leo Marcus, executive vice-president of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University, spoke of Rabbi Pearlson's love for Israel and his work as president of the organization over a 10-year period. During that time, he said, they spoke every workday.

Rabbi Pearlson travelled across Canada to garner support for a BGU distance education program that made it possible for young people who had to work for a living to acquire a university degree, Marcus said.

He travelled the world for BGU and also travelled to take part in high-level interfaith discussions, meeting the late Pope John Paul II on two occasions, Rabbi Dolgin said.

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, told The C/N that Rabbi Pearlson had "vision and perseverance" as founding rabbi of Temple Sinai.

The synagogue is "known as a 'heimish' congregation, and he set that tone," Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism & ARZA Canada, said in an interview.

Rabbi Pearlson "wasn't just an intellectual," she added. "He was a people person... He was extremely beloved by his congregation and his community."

Rabbi Michael Stroh, rabbi emeritus of Temple Har Zion, said that Rabbi Pearlson, whom he knew for more than 40 years, had "a very good sense of people, an insight into human situations, and good political sense in terms of the situation of Jews in the world."

Rabbi Pearlson is survived by his brothers Melvin of Boston and Stanley of Connecticut; his children Joshua, Nessa, and Abigail Pearlson-Olyan, and two grandchildren.

AHS benefactor and oldest alumnus dies at 98

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Nathan Hurwich, a benefactor of Associated Hebrew Schools and many other Jewish causes, died Feb. 14. He was 98 years old.

A native of Toronto, Hurwich attended cheder at Toronto Hebrew Free School, a predecessor of Associated. He was Associated's oldest living alumnus.

Its campus on Finch Avenue just east of Bathurst Street was named the Nathan O. and Roey Hurwich Education Centre after he and his wife – who predeceased him in 2005 after 73 years of marriage – became its benefactors in 1979.

The son of Russian immigrants who ran a grocery store, Hurwich, who was one of nine children, dropped out of Harbord Collegiate Institute at age 14 so that he could help support his family after his father became ill.

He began working at Tip Top Tailors and completed high school at night.

Later, Hurwich opened a small automotive jobbing business, which he sold before founding Mobile Automotive Products, a manufacturers' distributor that he sold some three decades ago.

Hurwich's grandfather, a scholar and ritual slaughterer, imbued him with a love of Judaism and Israel, Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation said in a eulogy.

A fundraiser for many Jewish causes, Hurwich received more than 100 awards and honours. He was tireless in raising funds for Israel and travelled there frequently, the rabbi said.

Hurwich co-chaired Canadian Jewish Congress' Soviet Jewry committee and travelled to Russia in the 1970s to learn about the situation first-hand and deliver Hebrew books that he had hidden in his luggage. He was also a founding member of Beth Tzedec, where he held almost every major office.

"I don't know if there was an organization in Toronto that Nat was not involved in," said his niece, Miriam Cohen Freilich, in a eulogy.

Explaining his involvement with Associated in a 2003 C/JN interview, Hurwich, who had no children, said that "without the Jewish schools, we have no future."

Nathan Hurwich

Jane Cooper-Eade, a niece of Roey Hurwich, said in a eulogy that her aunt and uncle acted as surrogate grandparents to her children, buying them treats and taking them to synagogue on some of the Jewish holidays. "Uncle Nat truly loved children," she recalled.

Hurwich leaves two sisters, Anne Cohen Himmel of Toronto, and Ada Altman of Washington, D.C. He was predeceased by his brothers, Reuben, Samuel, Dave and Sydney.

Max Goody was Canadian Zionist stalwart

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Max Goody, a dedicated and committed Zionist, died last week, after a long illness. He was 90.

Goody was a two-time president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, a founding member and twice president of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, and a longtime member of the fraternal Zionist Ajalon Lodge.

His son, Ira, said that together with good friends and fellow Zionists such as Julius Hayman, Goody was a key Canadian advocate for the State of Israel at the time of its creation in 1948. He also made many trips to Israel and raised funds for the nascent Jewish state, and he helped develop Zionism in Canada.

"He was a legacy of days gone by. You can't recreate that," Ira said.

Max Goody was born in Wadena, Sask., to Yitzchok and Rachel Goody, immigrants from Russia. The family moved first to Winnipeg, and later, when Max was in his late teens, to Toronto, so the children could get a good Jewish education.

Ira said his father was proud to be a Jewish war veteran and had served as a wireless operator in the Royal Air Force during World War II.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David, said that Goody was "a good guy.

He was a respected leader who spoke and lectured extensively on Israel and Jewish interests."

He even gave sermons sometimes, Rabbi Scheim recalled.

"He spoke without a note – he had organized everything in his head."

Goody came every morning to daven and to attend study groups, Rabbi Scheim said.

"He always asked questions, and presented what he called a joke de jour."

Goody is survived by Ruby, his wife of 66 years, children Ravia and Haggat Eventhal, Debra and Meir Malki, and Ira; sister Shirley Vernon, sister-in-law Marilyn, four grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. He was predeceased by brothers Nate and Henry, and brother-in-law Murray Vernon.

Conference on Jewish Material

It has failed to fulfill its mandate

By ELI PFEFFERKORN

Founded in 1952, the Conference on Jewish Materials Claims Against Germany – its official name – was mandated to negotiate with the federal government of Germany reparation payments for Holocaust survivors, and transfer the money to them. While successfully fulfilling the negotiation part of the mandate, the conference has failed in the transfer part.

Accusation

This failure of the conference to fulfil its mandate has affected many thousands of survivors in the waning years of their lives. I might have stood on the roll call platz with some of these survivors, or trod the sun-lit asphalt on the Death March with them. I therefore feel morally bound to expose the conference's breaches.

In 2002, I published an article in The Canadian Jewish News documenting the money allocation policy and practice of the Claims Conference. The assertions in the article were based on internal documents generated by the conference. As a result of the article, I was invited, courtesy of the Canadian Jewish Congress, to the conference's office.

Two top officers greeted me.

Gracious, articulate and computer literate, they laid out before me the good deeds performed by the conference. At lunch, Gideon Taylor, the CEO and vice-president, joined us and reinforced his lieutenants' claims. To lend credence to their activities, there was a survivor on hand who nodded in agreement with Taylor's assertions. Through the entire session, a weird feeling came over me that I was being led down the primrose path.

A year later, I went to Israel, on my own initiative, to follow the trail of monies said to have been allocated by the Claims Conference to survivors' organizations.

I chose two organizations out of hundreds that were reportedly recipients of money earmarked for specific enterprises. From 1995 to 1999, the Glianski Home was reported to have received $5,840,000; and Irgun Olej Mercas Europa (The Organization of Immigrants from Central Europe), known as flight refugees to Palestine, to have received $19,307,910.

Danny, a former student of mine and a grandson of a survivor, drove me to the Glianski Home early in the evening. The seven-storey edifice built in 1966 was situated in a rundown neighbourhood south of Jaffa. The ground level accommodates a series of stores. The intent of my visit was to get shelter for the night so that I could gather first-hand information from my fellow survivors.

Hobbling on crutches, dressed fittingly for the occasion and wearing a two-day stubble, I introduced myself as a survivor who needed lodgings for a few nights. The lady who let me in said she had no authority to admit people without the approval of Keshet, the non-governmental organization that administered the "home."

The following day, we went to the Keshet offices. Our attire exuding affluence, we introduced ourselves as donors to Holocaust-related causes. What we heard at this meeting belied Taylor's claims.

Originally built as a hotel and later sold to Amidar, a building company owned by the Jewish Agency, the "home" was converted to affordable housing in the earlier '60s. Its residents pay rent from their welfare checks. Amidar invested about NIS 50,000 ($14,076 Cdn) to build air raid shelters, and another NIS 100,000 ($28,150) for light repairs. The social worker was not sure whether any of the residents were survivors, except for one Belgian woman. The Keshet people knew nothing about money transfers from the Claims Conference, nor did the people of Amidar know. So where has all the money gone?

Next, I visited the offices of Irgun Olej Mercas Europa in Haifa. A luxurious building on the eastern Carmel was in the planning stage, allegedly with funds given by the Claims Conference to the Mercas. Since the money came from the Claims Conference, I assumed that the facility was intended for survivors.

I presented my survivor's credentials and asked how to apply for residency there. The cheapest entrance fee was between $75,000 and $90,000, and the fees went up to $155,000; monthly maintenance fees ranged from NIS 7,300 to 7,800.

My question to them – how could an average survivor afford such expenses? – was met with a shrug of the shoulders. Again, the office had no information about money transfers from the conference.

On the advice of the office staff, I called Yossef Gush-Halav, the former president of the Mercas, and presented my case to him. Yes, during his tenure the Claims Conference transferred $2.6, but not $19 million. He was sorry he could not help me.

So where did the money go? He did not know.

I asked a lawyer whether one could trace the money flow from the Conference through the banks and the tax authority. I was told it could be done – through the courts, but that it was extremely expensive to do so.

A year ago, a majority of the board of directors decided to allocate 20 per cent of the restitution money for education and research. This is a further example of blind allocation. It demonstrates the rubber-stamp character of this institution.

Education aside, I would like to put the following question to the conference's board of directors: had you lived in a tenement in Brooklyn or Jaffa or Toronto, having to carve up your monthly income between buying adult diapers, paying rent and buying food, would you be willing to have funds spent so that your suffering could be recorded in the annals of history at the cost of your well-being? Or would you rather say that you have already made history by staying alive, and it is for others to pay for the recording your history?

Eli Wiesel was enlisted by the Claims Conference to persuade the hesitant board of directors to vote in support of the 20 per cent education proposal. By now a retired spokesperson for the survivors but still having an independent mind, Wiesel stated that we must remember the dead and not forget the living. Touché.

Claims against Germany

Criticisms are misguided

By JULIUS BERMAN

Eli Pfefferkorn raises issues of crucial importance to Holocaust survivors in his piece on the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference). Unfortunately, he misses the mark because the "facts" upon which he bases his charges are either insufficient or incorrect.

While acknowledging our successes in negotiation, Pfefferkorn claims that we have not distributed the funds to survivors, saying,

Defence

"While successfully fulfilling the negotiation part of the mandate, the conference has failed in the transfer part." Not mentioned anywhere in the article is the fact that in the last few years alone, the Claims Conference has transferred directly to Holocaust survivors more than $360 million (all figures US) each year.

We are in full agreement with Mr. Pfefferkorn that Holocaust survivors, an aging population, have increasing medical and social services needs. But to understand how the Claims Conference successfully helps to meet those needs, one must know some of the history of the conference.

As a direct result of negotiations in the early 1990s by the Claims Conference, Nazi-confiscated Jewish property in the former East Germany that went unclaimed by the rightful owners or their heirs has been returned to the Jewish community. Under the governing German law, the Claims Conference is the legal successor to these properties.

If not for the Claims Conference, any Jewish assets that remained unclaimed would eventually have remained with the German owners at the time or would have reverted to the German government.

Therefore, due to the efforts of the Claims Conference, we are able to sell or receive compensation for this real estate. The proceeds – more than $700 million to date – are allocated overwhelmingly to social welfare agencies that assist the neediest and most vulnerable Jewish victims of Nazi persecution.

Mr. Pfefferkorn's criticism of organizations we help to fund in Israel are misguided on several levels.

One of the charges made by Pfefferkorn against the Claims Conference relates to the Galiany Home in Jaffa. Here are the facts: More than 10 years ago, we allocated funds for the renovation of the facility and establishment of a seniors day centre. (That the night-time attendant or social worker at the Galiany Home did not know of the decade-old contribution toward its renovation is not important to us – what we care about is that the poor residents are housed in a proper facility.) And, contrary to what Mr. Pfefferkorn states, many of those poor residents are, in fact, Nazi victims.

Another "fact" cited by Mr. Pfefferkorn relates to the Galiany Home, but needs correction. The seniors day centre at the Galiany Home is run by Keshet, an organization that provides programs for people with special needs. Thus, our allocation goes to Keshet; from 1989 to 2006, the Claims Conference allocated $3.9 million to Keshet for nursing homes, day care centres, medical equipment, psychiatric hospitals, etc., throughout Israel, all of which serve victims of the Nazis.

As with all the previous misconceptions, Mr. Pfefferkorn is wrong again when it comes to the Irgun Olej Mercaz Europa. First, as noted above, the funds allocated come from the sale of unclaimed property of Jews of East Germany; yet, they are overwhelmingly used to assist Holocaust survivors worldwide. And unlike many other restitution agreements, these specific proceeds, with the support of the organization of Jews originating in Germany, are used to assist Holocaust survivors in need wherever they may live.

It stands to reason, therefore, that we hold German Jewish housing institutions and organizations such as Irgun Olej Mercaz Europa (a largely German Jewish group) in special regard.

More specifically, Mr. Pfefferkorn is also totally mistaken in stating that the Claims Conference funds the planned luxury residences in Haifa. We do not fund housing for the wealthy, neither in Haifa nor in any other place in the world. Rather, the Claims Conference allocates monies to Mercaz Europa's nursing facilities across Israel – in Haifa, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. And, contrary to the comment by Pfefferkorn, there is no entry fee at any of these nursing facilities. Over an 18-year period, we have allocated a total of $13.8 million for these facilities, which have housed hundreds of survivors. Further, over the past decade, we have allocated an additional $4.5 million to Mercaz Europa's social welfare fund, which makes individual grants to low-income survivors.

The Claims Conference's reach in Israel extends well beyond the survivors we help in these two institutions. We have worked closely with government ministries and national agencies to develop a strategic plan providing a wide range of services for Holocaust survivors in the Jewish state. Because approximately one-third of elderly individuals in Israel are victims of the Nazis, the development of infrastructure to support geriatric services such as old age homes, psycho-geriatric institutions, seniors day centres and geriatric wards in hospitals has been a priority for the Claims Conference. Since 1995, the Claims Conference has allocated about $500 million for social services for hundreds of thousands of victims of the Nazis across Israel.

In addition, the Claims Conference has provided home care for the poorest and sickest victims in Israel for a decade. In 2007 alone, the Claims Conference spent more than $40 million to provide home care to nearly 14,000

Nazi victims throughout Israel.

Despite Mr. Pfefferkorn's accusation that he can't "trace the money flow from the Conference," all our financial activities are audited by the international accounting firm of Ernst and Young and then included in our annual financial report, which is available on our website (www.claimscon.org), as is a list of every allocation that we make: organization, amount and purpose.

Mr. Pfefferkorn is welcome to contact our offices in Israel the next time he visits. We would be delighted to answer any additional questions and show him first-hand how the Claims Conference has helped Jewish victims of Nazi persecution live with an added measure of dignity.

Julius Berman is the chair of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Fast and tasty food ideas from Nigella Lawson

By MARCIE SOMERS

Special to The C.J.N.

She may be the British bestselling author of Feast: Food to Celebrate Life, Forever Summer, Nigella Bites, How to Be a Domestic Goddess and How to Eat (which have sold in excess of 2.8 million copies worldwide), and she may be television host of a popular cooking series, but whatever you do, don't call her a chef.

"I am not a trained chef," says Nigella Lawson, speaking on the phone from London. "I'm just someone who loves to cook and have been fortunate enough to build a successful career around my two great loves: cooking and writing."

Lawson's plan was to "write a great novel, but when it became apparent that I wasn't going to write a great novel, I found that I really enjoyed writing about food."

Prior to her current incarnation as cookbook author and television host, Lawson was deputy literary editor of the Sunday Times, but in 1989, she left to pursue a freelance career. She wrote for a variety of magazines and newspapers, including the Sunday Times, Evening Standard, Guardian, Daily Telegraph and Observer, and in the United States, for Gourmet and Bon Appétit magazines. She originated the restaurant column in the Spectator and wrote the food column for British Vogue for several years.

However it was with the release of her first cookbook, How to Eat, that Lawson was thrust into the spotlight and began to garner her international acclaim.

Like many public figures, Lawson has been the object of criticism. Some have attacked her for presenting very well-resourced cooking as a guileless, amateur pursuit. And far too often, journalists write about her voluptuous body and her looks instead of focusing on her success as a cookbook author.

"I don't take what is written about me personally," Lawson says. "I think that if you believe all the good things that are written about you, you would be a monster, and conversely, if you believed all the bad things that are said, you'd be a wreck, so I find it's much better to not care what is being said about me. It also helps that growing up, my father was a public figure [Her father, Lord Nigel Lawson was chancellor of the exchequer], and so I was somewhat prepared on how to deal with the loss of privacy."

Today, Lawson is keeping busy with the release of her new cookbook, Nigella Express, and her Food Network TV show of the same name. Nigella Express offers meals one can make quickly and easily, with vital tips on how to keep your cupboard stocked, and freezer and fridge stacked. Nigella Express presents great food that can be prepared in an instant, but cooked slowly in the oven, leaving you time to have a bath, a drink, talk to friends, or do the children's homework.

"However little time or effort I can expend on the day's supper, I have to know it will deliver nothing less than pure pleasure," she says. "The recipes in my new book satisfy that most necessary of edicts."

Our interview is coming to a close, which conveniently happens to be around lunchtime in London. Lawson admits that she's constantly thinking about food and finding new ways to do things.

"I try to remember what I did last time with a certain meal and come up with way to make it different by mixing up small things, such as adding a different herb or adding a new ingredient to a tried and true recipe."

And with that, she's off to — where else? Her kitchen to create herself a fantastic lunch.

NIGELLA'S PASTA

50 g favourite short pasta
1 tomato, chopped
1 cucumber, chopped
1/2 cup fresh corn from the cob or frozen corn handful of snap peas or snow peas, chopped few tinned baby beetroots, quartered handful of fresh herbs of your choice, chopped (flat-leaf parsley, thyme, sage, oregano, marjoram) handful of baby spinach, shredded sea salt and freshly ground black pepper lemon olive oil or olive oil if you can't find the lemon white wine vinegar
6 tbsp. mayonnaise

Basically all you have to do is cook the pasta until al dente, drain it and then while it is still in the colander, rinse under cold water, moving it around with your hands when it is cool enough to touch. Place it in a really big bowl with all of your chopped vegetables and herbs, then stir together with some seasoning, a couple of good lugs of the olive oil, one slosh of the vinegar and the mayonnaise. Taste it when you've finished stirring, because it might need more of one of the dressing ingredients.

EU calls Iran's remarks on Israel 'unacceptable'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — The European Union on Monday denounced statements by Iranian leaders about Israel last week as "unacceptable, damaging and uncivilized."

The EU's Slovenian presidency referred to remarks by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, parliamentary Speaker Gholamali Haddadadel and Revolutionary Guard commander Mohammad Ali Jafari.

"Their comments pointed against Israel are unacceptable, damaging and uncivilized," it said. "The EU calls on Iran to stop hostile rhetoric and refrain from all threats towards other states, members of the international community."

In remarks broadcast Feb. 13 on Iranian television, Ahmadinejad called Israel a "filthy germ" and "savage beast" established by western states in their bid to dominate Middle East nations.

The comments came just days after a top commander in Iran's Revolutionary Guard called Israel a "cancerous germ" that would be wiped out by Hezbollah, Army Radio reported.

Iran does not recognize Israel and Ahmadinejad has often predicted the imminent demise of the Jewish state.

The EU comments followed last week's promise by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to respond "firmly" to Ahmadinejad's verbal attacks on Israel, which he called "intolerable."

Ban made the pledge to Israel's ambassador to the UN, Dan Gillerman, who requested a meeting with Ban following the Iranian president's televised remarks.

The Revolutionary Guards commander-in-chief, Mohammad Ali Jafari, was quoted by the Pars News Agency as saying: "In the near future, we will witness the destruction of the cancerous germ of Israel by the powerful and competent hands of the Hezbollah combatants."

Jafari made the comment in a letter to Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, offering condolences after the recent killing of terrorist mastermind Imad Mughniyah, which Iran has blamed on Israel.

Israel's Foreign Ministry sent a letter of protest to the United Nations over Jafari's remarks.

Also last week, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said that even after 60 years, Israel still has neither legitimacy nor any role in the Middle East, the ISNA news agency reported.

"The West has tried to impose a fabricated regime on the Middle East, but even after 60 years, the Zionist regime has neither gained any legitimacy nor played any role in this region," Mottaki said.

Calling United States policies in the Middle East a failure, he predicted the collapse of Israel.

Iran also urged the UN Security Council to condemn Israel and demand that it stop threatening to use military force against Iran's nuclear program.

In a letter to the council, Iran's UN ambassador, Mohammad Khazaei, referred to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Jan. 14 warning that all options are on the table when it comes to keeping Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons.

Khazaei insisted that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful and called Israel's threats unjustifiable. He said they're also a flagrant violation of international law and the UN Charter, which calls on countries to refrain from threatening or using force against other states.

Gillerman called the letter, which was also sent to Ban, "disgusting and dangerous."

"For a country whose leader describes a member state of the United Nations as a dirty microbe and a savage animal, to complain about others' statements is the height of hypocrisy," he said.

Israel called for a diplomatic crackdown on Tehran before it acquires the means to threaten its existence.

A time of uncertainty for Kosovo's Jews

By DINAH SPRITZER

JTA

PRIZREN, Kosovo — On a forlorn road dotted with half-built houses, Ines Quono reflects on her struggle in a land so remote to most North Americans it might as well be Oz.

But instead of a yellow brick road, there is crumbling, mud-drenched pavement piled high with garbage.

"The only thing that works in Kosovo is the banks; we all have to borrow money to do something — anything," says Quono, 28.

Quono is among the last Jews of Kosovo, a southern province of Serbia about half the size of New Jersey that declared independence earlier this month.

Unemployment in Kosovo hovers at 50 per cent and the average wage is $350 a month. "We all worry how we will get by," says Quono, a university student, wife and mother of a toddler.

The future of Quono and her family is uncertain, as they decide whether their destiny is in Israel or in southeastern Europe, where their roots go back to the 15th-century Spanish Inquisition, when thousands of Sephardi Jews fled to the Balkans.

There are some 50 Jews left in Kosovo. Belonging to three families, or clans, they all live in the city of Prizren, a rare gem of ancient architecture amid a landscape devastated by war, poverty and Communist-era concrete.

The United Nations took over the administration of Kosovo in 1999 after a brutal conflict between Kosovo Albanians seeking independence and Serbian troops controlled by strongman Slobodan Milosevic.

Ethnic Albanians account for 90 per cent of Kosovo's population of 2.2 million. The Albanians are Muslim, but largely secular.

Corruption, criminality and a lack of foreign investment have marked life in Kosovo over the last nine years, during which final-status negotiations between a now democratic Serbia and Kosovo's ethnic Albanian leaders failed.

On Sunday, Feb. 17, Kosovo's prime minister declared independence, with support from the United States and most of the European Union, and with fierce opposition from Serbia, whose position is backed by Russia.

Distressed by a war they watched from the sidelines and facing an uncertain future, the Jews of Prizren are gloomy. When the war started, the other Jews in Kosovo — the 50 living in the capital city of Pristina — fled to Serbia, where they spoke the language and felt a part of the culture. But those in Prizren, where Jews speak Albanian and Turkish — there is a large Turkish population there — stayed.

Now, with Kosovo having broken away from Serbia, those like Votim Demiri, Quono's father, who made a decent living under communism, find it hard to leave the homes they built, despite fears of growing tensions with their neighbours.

"There wasn't anti-Semitism in the past, but with the Saudi charities here now, we are seeing a Wahabi influence for the first time," Demiri said, referring to the fundamentalist Islamic ideology Saudi Arabian clerics have tried to export, with little success, into the Balkans. "I think the newspapers these days are not portraying Jews in such a positive light."

The greatest concern for Jews here, however, is the concern shared by all Kosovars: feeding their families. In this regard, they are both at an advantage and a disadvantage.

They are helped by the American Joint Jewish Distribution Committee (JDC), which provides them with social services, hosts celebrations on Jewish holidays and tries to help with employment. On the negative side, Jews are outsiders in a state controlled by ethnic Albanians who mete out the few jobs there are to friends and family, said Robert Djerassi, the JDC official responsible for the organization's activities in Kosovo.

"Ninety per cent of Jews in Prizren are jobless," he said.

Earlier this month, the JDC held a brainstorming session on job opportunities with 25 Prizren Jews aged 40 and under.

"I said, 'If you can think of a shop or service, like giving English lessons, I find some capital to get you started,'" Djerassi told JTA. "They tried to explain to me why it cannot happen; they are very pessimistic."

There are also obstacles in connecting Prizren's Jews to other Jews in the region.

"My idea is to make them part of something bigger, to bring them to events in Skopje or Belgrade. But the small children, 15 and under, they don't speak Serbian and that's a problem," Djerassi said.

"Our spiritual life, like our economic life, is a disaster," Demiri said, pointing to his rotting roof. His children, it seems, are preparing for an eventual move to Israel.

Quono's sister, Teuta Demiri, 22, recently spent a year at a kibbutz, where she studied Hebrew. A bank teller in Prizren, Teuta is thinking about aliyah but is not confident she can find work in Israel. Her brother is studying Hebrew and is also nervous about his job prospects.

"I have been thinking for eight years whether to go or not to go to Israel," their father, Votim Demiri, said.

He shows off a 20-year-old picture of his mother talking to Shimon Peres in Ashdod, Israel, where she moved after World War II while her children opted to build a socialist state in the heart of Europe. But they always knew about their Jewish roots.

Religion, however, was far from their lives.

Votim Demiri is from a generation of Jews who fondly recall life in Yugoslavia, of which Kosovo was a part.

A former textile factory director, Demiri has been mostly out of work for the last two decades, and his prospects of employment are dim. What he does have is a beautiful, 19th-century, three-storey home, albeit one he cannot afford to maintain.

For some of Prizren's Jews, aliyah is complicated by more than employment worries.

Ulvi Zhalta, 59, looks decades older than his cousin Demiri, 62, because of health problems that include heart disease and an eye clouded by blindness.

Like nearly all Jews who stayed in Prizren after World War II, Zhalta's mother married a non-Jew, in her case an ethnic Albanian.

"She was buried in a Muslim cemetery. There are no Jewish cemeteries here, but she was registered as a member of the Jewish community in Belgrade," he said.

Zhalta said he applied for permission to immigrate to Israel in 2000, but has not yet received permission from the Jewish Agency for Israel. He suspects the question of his mother's Jewish identity is the source of the delay.

In response to queries on Zhalta's case, an Israeli representative of the Jewish Agency said the details of individual applications are private.

"Everyone in my family wants to go to Israel," Zhalta said as the lights went off in his cousin's living room during one of the daily power outages that have gone on for so long in Kosovo that few can remember life without them.

Proposal still in 'embryonic form'

while it may begin with Jews, it does not end with Jews. Anti-Semitism is the canary in the mineshaft of evil."

According to Cotler, the coalition — a combination of scholars, activists and parliamentarians — will fight anti-Semitism in several ways.

It will promote Mann's parliamentary inquiry as a template for other parliaments; develop an inventory of indices of anti-Semitism; and encourage nations to develop their own national coalitions to combat global anti-Semitism and organize task forces "built around the thematic templates" of the Global Forum for Combating Anti-Semitism.

"This proposal is in its embryonic form," Cotler added. "We hope that when this global forum convenes again next year, it will be activated and active."

In related developments at the forum, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni announced last week that Israel plans to boycott next year's "Durban II" UN anti-racism conference, and she specifically cited Canada's "courage" in doing the same.

Last month, Canada declared its intention to boycott the conference over concerns of repeated anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic motifs.

The 2009 World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance is slated to take place in the South Africa city where its predecessor was held in 2001.

That event was marked by fierce anti-Zionist and pro-Arab agitation, which led Israel to watch preparations for the upcoming conference with concern.

"Israel will not participate and not give legitimacy to the United Nations follow-up conference on racism... unless it is proven that the conference will not be used as a platform for further anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic activities," Livni told delegates to the forum.

Terror victims hope to win Iran's French assets

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — In a case that may set a precedent for seizing funds from terrorist sponsors, attorneys are fighting to have Iranian assets in France confiscated and handed over to American victims of terrorism.

A French appellate court was due to consider on Feb. 25 whether to continue holding $117 million (all figures US) in Iranian funds that have been frozen in France's Natexis Banques Populaire.

At issue is whether these funds, part of the Central Bank of the Islamic Republic of Iran, are state funds, which are immune from seizure, or commercial funds, which may be subject to seizure.

The fight to obtain the money follows two U.S. court decisions, on Sept. 16, 2003, and March 24, 2006, in which U.S. district judges in Washington ordered Iran to pay damages and interest of $87.5 million to 12 U.S. citizens injured in terror attacks in Iran in 1995 and 1997.

The courts in Washington determined that Iran was liable for the damages due to its sponsorship of Hamas, which orchestrated the attacks. The incidents included the 1995 bombing of an Israeli bus in Gaza and a 1997 triple suicide bombing in downtown Jerusalem by Hamas terrorists.

Iran never sent a representative to the court to provide a defense.

The lead plaintiff in the 1997 case is Jenny Rubin, who was injured in that attack. The lead plaintiff in the 1995 case is Seth Klein Ben Haim. His was the same bombing that killed Alisa Flatow, whose father, New Jersey attorney Stephen Flatow, collected about $26 million of a separate, $248-million judgment against Iran for its sponsorship of the Palestinian terrorists who perpetrated the attack.

In the Rubin case, Judge Ricardo Urbina found in favour of the victims, noting that Iran's Ministry of Terrorism "spends between $50 million and $100 million a year sponsoring terrorist activities of various organizations such as Hamas."

Unable to find qualifying Iranian assets in the United States from which to collect, the plaintiffs' attorneys turned their sights overseas. The question now is whether they can collect from Iranian assets in France.

"We have been seeking to enforce the judgment in many countries for several years," said attorney David Strachman, a Rhode Island-based lawyer representing plaintiffs in the case.

In the United States, plaintiffs have had some successes collecting on judgments against Iran for sponsoring terrorism. In perhaps the most famous of these cases, Flatow collected the compensatory portion of the judgment against Iran for his daughter's death.

To pursue Iranian assets, attorneys in the cases stemming from the 1995 and 1997 bombings are relying in part on precedent set in the Flatow family's legal fight. One notable development of that fight was the passage in the U.S. Congress of the Flatow Amendment to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. That legislation removed sovereign immunity, which protects states from lawsuits in foreign courts, in cases of state-sponsored terrorism.

Iran has responded harshly to efforts to freeze its assets overseas.

Last fall, Iranian Central Bank Governor Tahmasb Mazaheri called such actions "psychological warfare."

He was quoted by Reuters as saying: "The world is big, and having no co-operation with one country does not stop Iran's banking activities."

In December 2007, Christoph Martin Radtke, the Paris-based lawyer working with Strachman's firm, succeeded in having funds from the Central Bank of Iran frozen at Bank Melli and Natexis Banques Populaire. Today, only the funds at Natexis remain frozen.

Radtke told JTA that banking secrecy laws present a major obstacle in determining the nature of transactions and whether the assets in the bank qualify for seizure. He argues that the Central Bank of Iran's assets qualify because the bank is controlled by Iran's president and regime, does not have a floating currency, and exists merely to collect debts, receive payments and issue letters of credit to Iranian companies.

The bank "is in reality not a central bank or a bank that has normal commercial operations," he said.

Maintaining the current freeze on assets would bring "security for our clients that they will get paid once we have the U.S. judgment enforced in France," Radtke said. "Of course, if the money is unfrozen, it will probably leave France and go back to Iran or somewhere else. And then it will be difficult or even impossible for the victims to get paid."

The Central Bank of Iran has demanded through French attorney Bertrand Moreau that the freeze be lifted. Moreau told JTA in an e-mail that he couldn't comment on the case.

Radtke said this is the first time Iranian funds have been frozen in French banks for as long as several months. The case could become a precedent in Europe for holding a non-EU country accountable for terrorist acts, he said.

In late December 2007, the French Justice Ministry argued on Iran's behalf — the U.S. Justice Department has done the same in cases in which U.S. citizens have tried to seize Iranian assets in the United States — and on Jan. 24 the French court decided to lift the freeze, based on the argument that central bank funds are diplomatic assets and therefore entitled to immunity from civil lawsuits.

But Radtke appealed the decision Jan. 27, and the next hearing in the case was scheduled for Feb. 25.

Darfuris get Israeli ID cards and start new lives

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Yassin Musa, a refugee from Darfur, removes his Israeli identity card from his worn leather wallet and holds it like a prize.

Musa is one of more than 600 Sudanese refugees from Darfur who have been granted temporary residency in Israel. He and his fellow Sudanese fled the genocide in Sudan and passed through Egypt on their way to the Jewish state.

Their new status here constitutes a major victory for the small Darfuri community in Israel and the non-governmental organizations that have been lobbying for them.

"I've now started to feel both Israeli and Darfuri," said Musa, 30, who fled Darfur five years ago after his village was attacked by the Janjaweed, Arab militiamen who have killed an estimated 200,000 people in Darfur over the last few years.

During the attack, Musa fled to nearby mountains but was tracked down by the fighters. He was arrested, beaten and eventually released, but the Janjaweed shot his father, brother and a cousin to death.

The Darfuris' path to receiving Israeli temporary residency status — the first were granted last month — has not been easy. Most refugees first spent months in prison for entering Israel illegally and then were released under house arrest to work mostly on kibbutzim, in small towns or at hotels in the Israeli resort city of Eilat.

Now they are newly free and are official residents of the Jewish state, thanks in large part to intense lobbying by NGOs, Knesset members, figures such as Elie Wiesel, and even Aliza Olmert, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's wife.

The Darfuris already have launched a networking and social welfare organization to help each other find work and places to live. They have also established a soccer league and even started a music group.

Musa, who was an architect in Darfur and hopes to continue in his profession in Israel, is the head of the new group, called the Sons of Darfur.

For now, the group is based in the one-room library of Hotline for Migrant Workers, one of the NGOs most instrumental in assisting them, and is a group that's funded by the New Israel Fund and others. The Sons of Darfur hope soon to find their own space where they can hold workshops, computer classes and meetings. For that, Musa says, they need to raise funds.

The Darfuris in Israel are mostly men, though there are women and children among them. Some are educated, having studied and worked in Sudan's capital, Khartoum, and speak decent English. Others are uneducated farmers from small villages who were never far from home until they were chased out by the Janjaweed.

More than 50 of the refugees already are enrolled in ulpan Hebrew language classes in Tel Aviv, and the children are in Israeli schools in different parts of the country.

Though many Darfuris come to Tel Aviv, the government is considering sending them, and migrants from other African countries to the country's more rural north and south, where the government says there are more jobs suited to them. Many African immigrants already work in the hotel industry in Israel's southernmost city, Eilat.

In Tel Aviv, the Darfuris help each other out, offering to share small apartments with newcomers until they find work and can pay their own rent. They often work nights, in restaurant kitchens or as cleaners. They share work leads and on the weekends gather to play traditional Darfuri music.

Musa has received a scholarship at a local college to study an architecture software program that is the basis for most architectural work in Israel. He says his goal is to return to Darfur one day and rebuild the villages destroyed by the Janjaweed.

But he says he wants to do it in a "smart" way: to use better materials and more modern structures that would withstand possible future attacks and generally be more functional.

At his apartment at night, Musa sketches drawings of these homes and buildings.

"All the time I am thinking about rebuilding Darfur," Musa told JTA. "Villages there still look as they did hundreds of years ago. I think when there is peace we need to sit together and think about how to rebuild the region."

Musa says he and other refugees here are also thinking about ways to bring Israeli refugee relief to Darfur — both to deliver aid to home and to boost Israel's reputation in Sudan, a Muslim country.

He says he's discussed the subject with Aliza Olmert, who has become an advocate on behalf of the refugees.

Musa said he has been moved by the response of the Israeli public to the plight of the Darfuris.

"Here there are really amazing people," he said. "If I wasn't seeing it with my own eyes it would be difficult to believe it."

Israel warned Syria: report

Israel reportedly warned Syria last week that it will step up attacks against Hezbollah and Hamas. Defence Minister Ehud Barak, on a recent visit to Ankara, asked his Turkish hosts to urge Syria to scale back ties with Hezbollah, the London-based Al-Hayat reported. The newspaper said Barak made clear that Israel had the Lebanese guerrilla group in its sights and also planned to widen military operations in Hamas-ruled Gaza. Barak's trip to Turkey coincided with the assassination in Damascus of Imad Mughniyah, Hezbollah's terror chief. Barak declined comment on the killing. He confirmed speaking of Hezbollah and Hamas with his hosts, but didn't elaborate on what was said.

Lawyer defrauded survivors

An Israeli lawyer got jail time for defrauding Holocaust survivors of $240 million (US). Tel Aviv District Court sentenced Yisrael Perry to 12 years in jail and another 5½ years suspended sentence. He also was fined $6 million. Perry was found guilty of defrauding dozens of survivors who he represented in postwar government insurance claims in Germany. Perry has denied wrongdoing and plans to appeal.

No Israel reference in game

Monopoly, the iconic game of capitalism, has been drawn into the dispute over Jerusalem. The game's maker, Hasbro Inc., issued an apology recently after an employee, responding to complaints from pro-Palestinian groups, eliminated the word Israel after the name of the capital in an online contest to select names for a new edition of the game, Monopoly Here and Now: The World Edition. The company also pulled all country names from other cities on the site when even more people complained because Jerusalem was listed as the only city without a country. The Pawtucket, Rhode Island-based Hasbro is asking people to vote at the Monopoly website on which cities will be included in the new edition. Until two weeks ago, every city on the site listed a country, including Jerusalem, Israel.

Financial firm sued for aiding Hamas terror

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Toronto native Scott "Chezi" Goldberg was reading one of his favourite books on Egged bus 19 when a suicide bomber stood up behind him, slapped the book out of his hand and detonated the explosives he was carrying.

Goldberg, 41, was killed instantly along with 10 other victims. Fifty were wounded, 13 seriously, in the Jan. 29, 2004, attack for which Hamas and the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a Fatah affiliate, claimed responsibility.

Now Goldberg's widow and seven children are suing UBS AG, a Swiss wealth management firm, for indirectly contributing to the attack.

In documents filed recently in United States District Court in eastern New York, Goldberg's family claims that UBS AG provided financial services that benefited Hamas, contrary to U.S. law.

UBS AG has rejected the claim. Corporate spokesperson Karina Byrne said, "UBS believes the claims made in this case are without merit and we intend to defend ourselves vigorously in this matter."

The court documents allege that UBS AG provided financial services to the Association de Secours Palestinien (ASP), "a Hamas fundraising entity" that was proclaimed a "specially designated global terrorist organization" by U.S. executive order in August 2003.

Masquerading as a charity, ASP collects funds in Switzerland at mosques and Islamic centres and transfers them to Hamas-affiliated agencies, the documents allege.

U.S. President George W. Bush and the Treasury Department "publicly linked ASP's activities... with attacks carried out by Hamas," the court documents allege. "The bombing that injured the plaintiffs [the Goldberg family] is attributable to Hamas."

The court documents state, "UBS transferred funds to institutions that belong to Hamas' financial infrastructure in the (Palestinian territories), including many entities declared unlawful by the government of Israel."

U.S. law permits victims to sue sponsors of terrorist groups. There are several cases in the U.S. Eastern District similar to the Goldberg case, the New York Post reported.

Goldberg's wife, Karen (Shifra), and children are all American citizens, as well as citizens of Israel.

Their claim asks for unspecified damages, as well as an order declaring that UBS AG violated the U.S. Antiterrorism Act.

Carrie Devorah, one of Goldberg's sisters, said "no amount of money is going to bring him back. No amount at all... If anything is collected, it will go to the kids."

The Goldberg family is doing its best to support Shifra in raising her children, but they have been hit hard by the loss of their husband and father. "You have a widow left with seven children, from infancy to teenager. She relied on her husband to do everything for her," Devorah said

A well-known psychotherapist who worked with at-risk teens, Chezi Goldberg worked at three jobs to make ends meet.

He met Shifra at a "Purim mixer" in Israel and "he immediately wanted to marry her," Devorah said. "They were perfect. The loss of her one and only love broke and devastated all of us."

The Goldberg family is entitled to compensation payments from the government of Israel for terrorism victims, but that doesn't compensate for the trauma they have suffered, Devorah continued.

Her nephew is afraid to sleep alone, and he and the other children gather in the living room, where they sleep on sofas "because they just miss their dad tremendously. My brother was larger than life."

The bus in which Chezi Goldberg was killed was taken to The Hague to show onlookers the horror of a bus bombing.

Prior to the suicide attack that claimed his life, Goldberg had narrowly escaped three other bombings. On the morning of his murder, he was running late, as a special bus serving the Orthodox community — notorious for its unreliability — hadn't arrived. He decided to take the public Egged bus instead.

Devorah said her brother was sitting near the back of the bus, directly behind the bomber. He was reading a book when the bomber stood up and slapped it out of his hand. A flash of light then engulfed the bus.

"On the day he was murdered, he had back-to-back clients all day. Shifra found out when clients began calling. She remembers talking to him on the bus seconds before it happened."

The wrecked bus, meanwhile, has had something of a second life. It was put on display in The Hague when the International Court of Justice held hearings about Israel's West Bank barrier, which is designed to prevent terrorist bombings like the one that tore apart bus 19.

The bus was later put on display at various American universities where it was used to raise money for ZAKA, an Israeli organization that removes human remains from terrorist sites, and for Christians for Israel.

It is currently located permanently at Camp Shores in Adamstown, Md.

When Canadian writing was young

Robert Weaver: Godfather of Canadian Literature by Elaine Kalman Naves, Véhicule Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

It's easy to forget that English Canadian literature – as a major industry, based on local publishing venues and styles – is just over half a century old. Before World War II much of what was read in this country came from the United Kingdom or the United States, and there was little publishing, printing or editorial culture of any real note.

Norman Ravvin

The influential Massey Commission Report, the result of a federally appointed committee, tabled proposals in 1951, which foresaw the creation of a range of cultural institutions that included CBC Television, the Canada Council and the National Library in Ottawa. The report took account, as well, of the meagreness of Canadian literary output in the immediate postwar years. While U.S. and U.K. fiction publications in 1948 each numbered over 1,000, their Canadian counterparts numbered only 14. Included in this small offering was Henry Kreisel's young man's novel The Rich Man, notable for its direct and sensitive treatment of Jewish themes in Canada and Europe.

If the venues for Canadian mainstream writers were this slight, imagine how unlikely – or outright miraculous – was the appearance of a book on Jewish themes in the immediate postwar years. It's difficult to regain a sense of how a Jewish Canadian literature in English came into being in this context. But the recent publication of Elaine Kalman Naves' Robert Weaver: Godfather of Canadian Literature contributes to our understanding of these developments.

Robert Weaver's unparalleled importance for Canadian literature included his creation at CBC Radio, in 1954, of the literary program Anthology, which became a key venue for Canadian writing. In 1956, he founded and became the longtime editor of the The Tamarack Review, which remained, into the early 1980s, an influential "little magazine" supporting Canadian writers.

Later in his career he created the still-influential CBC literary competition, which Kalman Naves herself won for her memoir of postwar Hungarian and Canadian Jewish lives.

Remarkable for their earliness and regularity are the appearances in these venues of key figures from what would become the first generation of English-language Jewish Canadian writers. In 1954, Weaver paid a 23-year-old Mordecai Richler $75 for the broadcast rights to a story titled The Secret of the Kugel. In his letter of thanks to Weaver, Richler announced his marriage plans to "a French-Canadian, and my family – a sternly Orthodox bunch – are taking it pretty hard. I've been cut off, in fact."

Weaver's Tamarack Review published Léonard Cohen's early poems, but the most noteworthy encounter between the two followed a letter from Cohen, mailed from his mother's Westmount address in 1957. Covering a selection of poems Cohen submitted to Weaver, the letter includes this pitch: "I've put a few of these poems to music and accompany myself with guitar. Perhaps you are interested in putting them on the air in this way. I'm coming to Toronto this week around Thursday with Irving Layton and if you have a minute we can discuss it."

Weaver took Cohen up on this offer, and as Weaver's recent obituaries have noted, Cohen's performance of his poetry on Anthology in 1958 was among the first public venues for the art that would make him world famous a decade later. In talking about these two offers of early recognition to writers who would become central to the Canadian scene, Weaver was notably modest.

Richler "discovered me," he told a Victoria paper in 2002. "He walked into the CBC studio in Montreal and there was a woman there whose area was current affairs and she got in touch with me and said: 'A young man named Mordecai Richler was in because he had an idea the CBC paid money for stories, so I told him to contact you."

It may be that writers and performers are best placed to recognize how crucial such opportunities are.

Kalman Naves, herself a journalist and writer of memoir and fiction, is perfectly placed to tell this peculiarly Canadian story. Through excellent interviews with Janice Kulyk Keefer, Alice Munro, Margaret Atwood, Weaver and others, she makes it clear how a singular personality like Weaver, along with the influential venues he created, transformed the country's literary culture.

Singer-songwriter optimistic despite cut-throat industry

By JOSEPH SERGE

Arts Editor

Mark Feldman brimmed with self-confidence in 2004 when I interviewed him to promote his first CD.

"I think I'm a very talented writer," he said then. "Recognition on a global scale is my ultimate goal."

Now, at 27, he's still as confident, but his edge has been dimmed a bit by the reality of the cut-throat industry he's in.

"I realized that magic isn't going to happen without working for it," he said recently, while promoting his second indie-released CD Extended Play. "I was under the illusion that my manager would break me by signing me up with a major label. But the industry has changed and I realized that I've neglected the grassroots level, and that's not a good thing."

In the four years since then, he's been travelling around Japan and Australia where he wrote lots of new songs. He recorded Extended Play in Nashville with a complement of seasoned musicians, including two-time Grammy Award-winner Rebecca Lynn Howard on backing vocals and with top producer Elisha Hoffman (Dixie Chicks, Shania Twain).

Feldman was introduced to Hoffman through Hoffman's father, Baruch, chazzan sheni and ritual administrator at Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto, Feldman's former bar mitzvah teacher.

Mark Feldman's confidence is a bit more grounded these days.

"Elisha came up to Toronto and saw me play and loved Cabin (the third track on his new album). So I went to Nashville and cut some songs with him."

Disillusioned with pursuing a major label and realizing that the industry is no longer dominated by corporate deals, he decided to save his pennies and finance his own CD. "It's a huge dent in my pockets, but I would be the sole beneficiary if it works out."

Extended Play has a much more full sound than his Dylan-inspired acoustic/folk debut. It begins with Save Yourself, a bluesy rocker in a Spin Doctors/Blues Traveller style and is followed up with a radio-friendly catchy number, I Propose, which shows hints of Red Hot Chili Peppers.

Despite Feldman's prolific writing capacity, the CD only contains six songs due to budget restraints. However, they all mark a mature improvement in his singing and songwriting abilities. There's certainly some radio potential here.

On his first album, Feldman says, he almost pigeon-holed himself and has been consciously looking to be more versatile.

"I discovered another element to my voice. I can be a rock 'n' roll singer, too." He recently got inspiration from a Neil Young concert he went to. "I see myself having the capacity to do what he does — start out playing with just an acoustic guitar and then getting the band behind me and make people dance."

Feldman's confidence is a bit more grounded these days. If his performing skills don't pan out, he's got a Plan B — songwriting. In Nashville, he hooked up with writers in Hoffman's production company, Murrah Colton Entertainment (a Billboard Top 10 publisher), and refined his songwriting skills with some of the industry's best.

He points out that American alt-country/rock singer-songwriter Ryan Adams recently made half a million dollars in the last quarter of 2006 through royalties. "Songwriting is the gift that keeps giving. If you write one hit song, it can put your kids in college. Royalties never stop. One song — one moment — can change your life. It's exciting that one big break can change my life. That's what keeps me going."

Feldman is also going to take an innovative approach to selling his CD — one that follows the Radiohead model. "I will sell my CDs for whatever they want to pay me. If I sell 20 CDs for $1, that's 20 people who go to hear my music. I think it's a brilliant marketing technique."

For now, Feldman gigs frequently with a full band in and around the Greater Toronto Area but is in the process of searching for a new manager and tour agency with a plan to tour extensively in Canada and the United States.

Plans are underway to get his album up on iTunes shortly. You can sample and download some of his songs, check out his gig calendar on his MySpace page: myspace.com/markfeldman1. You can contact him at Markfeldman@hotmail.com

CANADIAN FILMMAKER ATOM EGOYAN SHARES $1-MILLION ISRAELI PRIZE WITH AMOS OZ, TOM STOPPARD

Israel's Dan David Prize Foundation will soon bestow a lucrative prize upon Canadian filmmaker Atom Egoyan "for his superb modernist filmmaking which explores Armenian history and culture."

Egoyan, who was singled out in part because his 2002 film Ararat "was the first motion picture to deal directly with the Armenian genocide," shares the annual $1-million prize (all funds U.S.) with Israeli novelist Amos Oz and British playwright Tom Stoppard.

The trio of cultural artists are being honoured for their "creative rendering of the past" in literature, theatre and film. The foundation is also awarding two other $1-million prizes, one to former U.S. vice-president Al Gore for his work with global warming, another to a trio of scientists (one British, two American) for their scientific research.

Israel's president, Shimon Peres, is slated to attend the awards ceremony at Tel Aviv University on May 19.

Established in 2001 by international businessman and philanthropist Dan David, the foundation annually awards three $1-million prizes for achievements that have an outstanding scientific, technological, cultural or social impact. The prize winners or laureates, in turn, annually donate 20 scholarships of $15,000 each.

In 1961, as a young immigrant to Israel from Romania, David developed a new instant photography technology. He subsequently created the prize "to devote some of my fortune to rewarding and furthering the work of the eminent figures who have increased our knowledge of our past, improved our present, and helped us forge a better future."

Jewish Playwriting Competition: The cultural arts department at Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and the Toronto Jewish Theatre Committee (chaired by Ralph Wintrob) invite submissions for the 2008 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition. The winner receives a professionally acted and directed public workshop.

Plays should have a Jewish focus, depicting some aspect of Jewish life, and should be between one and two hours in length. Playwrights must be Canadian or have a strong Canadian connection. Send submissions to Esther Arbeid, Film and Theatre Co-ordinator, Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave., Toronto M5S 2J2. Deadline is May 31. For full submission guidelines, phone 416-924-6211, ext. 606, or e-mail esthera@mnjcc.org.

Three previous contest winners have been published and commercially produced: Einstein's Gift by Vern Thiessen, Sara's Cave by Don Molnar and Yahrzeit by Alex Poch Goldin. Last year's winner, The Bleeding Season by Brandon Marlon of Ottawa, is to be presented on July 6.

Winchevsky Purim Party: Children, parents and grandparents are invited to "put on a costume and get ready to tap into your inner silliness" for the Wacky Winchevsky Purim Party, featuring musician Brian Katz performing YidRhythms, an interactive Purim happening.

The inter-generational program also includes Dr. Seuss-shan, a twist on the Purim story performed by the Winchevsky Wits and community members, and various carnival games and activities. $10 for adults, $6 for children, discounted rates for members. 585 Cranbrook Ave., Sunday, March 9, 11 a.m. 416-789-5502

Josh Raskin doesn't look so overwhelmed with the Oscar nomination for his short film, a still of which is pictured left.

Toronto filmmaker nominated for an Oscar

By PAMELA CHELIN
Special to The CJN

Toronto filmmaker Josh Raskin received an Oscar nomination for his animated short film I Met the Walrus.

The soundtrack of the five-minute film, produced with a Bravo!FACT Foundation grant, is a 14-year-old boy's interview with John Lennon.

"It's pretty overwhelming," said 27-year-old Raskin, who spoke over the phone from an airplane in Toronto, which was about to fly to San Francisco for screenings of his film. "It was entirely unexpected, so it's a strange chaotic state of excited disbelief constantly."

From San Francisco, Raskin travelled to New York for more screenings, and his final destination was Los Angeles, for additional screenings and the 80th annual Academy Awards ceremony on Feb. 24.

In 1969, 14-year-old Jerry Levitan, who is now a Toronto lawyer, snuck into John Lennon's hotel room in Toronto, armed with a reel-to-reel tape recorder, and interviewed Lennon. This was while he and his wife, Yoko Ono, were promoting peace with their honeymoon "bed-in." After sitting on the tape for decades, Levitan decided it was time to do something with the recording and, about a year ago, approached Raskin.

"I thought Josh was bright, creative and witty. He loves John Lennon and loved my story, so we hit it off. Josh had a great idea to take my 30-minute tape, edit it down to five minutes and animate it. Before he finished the sentence, I said, 'Great, let's do it.'" Levitan said.

Raskin says the images in the film, pen sketches by James Braithwaite and digital illustration by Alex Kurina, represent the visual equivalent of what it must have felt like inside a 14-year-old boy's mind while he was interviewing his favourite rock 'n' roller.

Raskin submitted the film to international festivals and won several awards, including one for best animated short at the AFI (American Film Institute) Film Festival.

It was while he was in Utah, attending the Sundance Film Festival, that Raskin learned he had received an Oscar nomination.

Raskin was realistic about his chances of winning and joked that he hadn't cleared any space on his mantel for the gold statuette.

However, Raskin was excited about some good news he had just received. "We just got word, two hours ago, that Yoko Ono is fully supportive of the film, so that's the best news we could ever get," he said. "It's miraculous that we managed to get through to her."

Raskin said that he avoided interpreting Lennon's message of peace and tried not to be too heavy-handed as a filmmaker. "People can draw their own connections and conclusions from it. To me, it's pretty clear that what John Lennon is talking about is more important now than perhaps when he spoke the words 39 years ago."

Play encapsulates trials, tribulations of 20th-century Jewry

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The 20th century was one of the most tragic and heroic periods of all time in Jewish history.

How fitting is it then that the Harold Green Jewish Theatre (HGJT) opens its inaugural season with the critically acclaimed play Rose, the story of a Jewish woman whose life experience in many ways encapsulates the trials and tribulations of 20th-century Jewry.

"I find Rose's journey very compelling," says veteran Canadian actress Lally Cadeau, who plays the part of Rose in the play.

"She is a thoughtful and very emotional person who has been through an enormous amount in her life."

Born in Ukraine in 1920, Rose grew up in a shtetl during unstable, revolutionary times. Her life was further turned upside down when she moved to Warsaw, where she ended up in the Nazi-imposed Warsaw Ghetto.

Like many Jews after the Holocaust, she attempted to start anew in Palestine, but was unfortunately a passenger on the infamous Exodus ship in 1947, which was barred from entering Palestine.

Eventually, she landed in Atlantic City and later, Miami Beach.

Although she never made it to the Holy Land, her son did.

"There are a whole lot of interesting things that happened in her life," says Cadeau, a mainstay of Canadian theatre and television perhaps best known for portraying the role of Janet King in the Road to Avonlea series, for which she won a Gemini award.

"In the play, she reflects back on all of the twists and turns of her life, and it is a thrill for me to be inside this character."

Lally Cadeau

The play was written by Martin Sherman and directed by Diana Leblanc, and will be performed from Feb. 29 to March 29 at the newly renovated Jane Mallett Theatre at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

Previous productions of Rose were well received in England, the United States and Montreal, with reviewers describing it as "moving" and an "extraordinary tour de force."

The play has also garnered an Olivier Award nomination.

"Rose touches on all the key parts of 20th-century Jewish history in a funny, poignant and beautiful way," says HGJT co-artistic director David Eisner.

"It's a great way to start the season fittingly in the same year as Israel's 60th anniversary."

Born in Burlington, Ont., Cadeau began acting when she was a child.

She continued to hone her craft as a young adult in theatre productions.

"When I started, I was playing lead parts, which was terrific," she says. "It provided a wonderful training ground for a young actor."

Cadeau eventually moved on to television and film roles, including performances in Deadly Matrimony, Rossini's Ghost, Happy Christmas, Miss

King and Anne: Journey to Green Gables.

She was a member of the cast in such TV shows as The Raes, Bizarre, Hangin' In and Kane & Abel, and lent her voice to X-Men and The Silver Surfer.

The mother of three lives in Stratford with her husband, Robin, and has been in numerous Stratford Festival productions.

Shahar Peer makes tennis history in Qatar

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.
and CJN news services

DOHA, Qatar — Shahar Peer got as far as the third round of the most recent WTA tour event before Chinese tennis star Na Li eliminated her in two sets, 6-1, 6-3.

More significant than the on-court contest, however, was that she played Li at all, given the location of the match.

Last week, Peer made history by becoming the first Israeli to play a WTA tour event in the Persian Gulf region when she took part in the Qatar Open.

She started strong, defeating Slovenia's Andreja Klepac 6-3, 6-4 in the first round and then went on to beat Virginie Razzano of France with a tough 6-1, 7-6 victory in extremely windy conditions at the Khalifa International Tennis complex in Doha.

Speaking after her first game, Peer said, "When I came here I was a little bit excited, because I didn't know what to expect, like every new tournament, every new place you go. But I really got a warm welcome from the tournament, so I'm really happy being here.

Shahar Peer

"When you go on the court, you don't think about politics. You just want to play your tennis. I'm really happy to be playing here and hope to keep it going as long as I can."

The impact of the occasion barely made a ripple. Played as the first match of the week and away from centre court, the only sound that greeted Peer on to court was birdsong.

The spectators in the stands when the match began were almost outnumbered by the number of officials on court, and the subdued atmosphere matched that of any opening round tennis contest.

The quality of the match did little to enliven the occasion.

The first three games, consisting of long baseline rallies, took 20 minutes, and after Peer held the first game there were seven consecutive breaks of serve before Peer held again for the set.

In the second set, after an early break each, Peer broke for 5-4 when Klepac netted a forehand and she then served out the match to love. Peer said she was pleased at the way she was welcomed at the tournament.

"I was talking with the security in Israel about if I could come, and right away the answer was positive," said Peer, who visited a shuk (market) and dined in a Moroccan restaurant while in Doha.

"It wasn't a problem, and everything is good here with the relationship and I think by me being here everybody can understand that we are also human and everybody's the same in the world. It doesn't matter if you are Jewish or Muslim or Christian," she said.

"I find the people are really nice here, and everything is normal. It's even nicer than some other tournaments. I'm not coming here to help the politics of course, but if by me playing in this tournament it can help anything in the world, for peace or anything, I'll be really happy."

Peer is not playing at a tournament in Dubai this week because of a long-standing commitment to an event in Memphis.

Chelsea's Israeli soccer coach gets anti-Semitic death threat

Ha'aretz and CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — British police are investigating an anti-Semitic death threat sent to Chelsea's Israeli soccer coach Avram Grant and his wife.

Grant was in Greece for his team's Champions League match against Olympiakos last week when a parcel arrived at Chelsea's training ground in Cobham, 53 kilometres west of London.

A Chelsea staff member opened the package and found a note to Grant claiming an accompanying amount of powder was lethal.

Local police closed the training ground before the powder was tested and found to be harmless.

According to the Daily Mail, one note read: "You are a back-stabbing Jewish bastard. When you open this letter, you will die a very slow and painful death."

Another message made sexual threats against his wife, Tzofit, a famous Israeli television personality.

vision personality.

"Specific actions are being put in place to ensure Mr. and Mrs. Grant are safe," a Chelsea source said in response to the threat.

Grant arrived at Stamford Bridge in July 2007 as director of football and became manager in September, following the departure of the hugely popular Jose Mourinho, who led the team for three years.

The anti-Semitic element among the team's fans is relatively small, but even moderate fans view Grant's appointment against the backdrop of his nationality and his religion.

While many fans disagree with former Conservative heritage minister David Mellor, who said the only reason Grant was appointed is because he is a Russian Israeli at a club owned by a pro-Israel Russian, some believe the Jewish presence at the club's highest echelons and Grant's personal relationship with club owner Roman Abramovich were the reasons for his appointment.

The chairman of Chelsea FC, Bruce Buck, condemned some fans' use of anti-Semitic taunts against the club's manager.

"We welcome all constructive points of view. But there have been a few which could be viewed as racist and anti-Semitic, and that must stop immediately," Buck said. "This is one thing we will not tolerate, whether in written correspondence, on the chat pages, on posters or banners, or through singing and chanting."

Late-life romance

By MICHAEL GORDON

I was reminded of a couple of experiences I had in my geriatric practice and role as clinical ethicist when I saw the movie, Away from Her, on a recent transatlantic flight.

The movie is about a couple whose marriage is tested when a woman begins to suffer from Alzheimer's disease and moves into a nursing home, where she loses virtually all memory of her husband and begins to develop a romance with another nursing home resident.

The events I experienced almost 20 years ago occurred while I attended, on a regular basis, a music program that my wife, Gilda, provided to residents of Baycrest's Jewish Home for the Aged. I attended the programs with my then-young daughter, Talia, rather than being at home with her and missing the musical program.

Over a number of weeks it became apparent that there was a gentleman with Alzheimer's attending the program. I had seen him as a patient when he lived in Baycrest Terrace, the centre's retirement home. His reputation at the Terrace was of a very sociable, charming and attractive man – a snazzy dresser and talented dancer. I noticed that during these music sessions he favoured a particular female resident, and they usually danced together whenever there was an opportunity. Between dances they sat together and held hands and clearly demonstrated affection.

One evening his wife, still a Terrace resident, attended the music session. She observed the interaction between her husband and his lady friend. She spoke to her husband momentarily, and he did not seem especially moved by her presence or indicate that she was especially related to him. She left before the program ended. Her husband and partner continued to dance until the program wound down.

I spoke to a couple of the nurses who said that this had been going on for a few months and that the wife had told them that "he was a wonderful friend, companion and husband. He was always very charming and sociable, and if this makes him feel good, that is fine. I had more than 60 wonderful years with him, and I do not take this as a slight against me and what we had together. I know it is part of his dementia, and in many ways, he cannot help it."

The Senior Side of Life

Some nurses were uncomfortable with the situation, but others accepted it and understood that their patient's wife was a loving and remarkable woman in how she understood and accepted his current state and actions.

The movie reminded me of this situation and another one for which I was consulted on at a nursing home, where a male and female resident developed a romantic relationship. This caused distress and dismay to the woman's children, who took the action as an act of betrayal to their late father, despite the fact they recognized their mother's cognitive impairment and the positive effect the new romance was having on her sense of well-being.

It was, therefore, with great interest that I read an article in the Nov. 18 edition of the New York Times, by Kate Zernike, with the headline, "Love in the time of dementia." The article reveals that former U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's husband, John, who is suffering from Alzheimer's disease, has a romance with another woman, and the former justice is thrilled – and even visits with the new couple while they hold hands on the porch swing – because it is a relief to see her husband of 55 years so content.

This issue of late-life romance is complex, as is dementia and its effect on one's personality. The issue of nature of romance and love is a complex one at any stage in life. But with the growing elderly population, this aspect of life and relationships must be faced and explored with great sensitivity, affection and respect for those we love, whose lives we want to be as full as possible.

I have been a Toronto Maple Leafs fan since I was knee high to a grasshopper. As a kid, my father and I watched Hockey Night in Canada in our cozy Kitchener home, cheering on the mask-less Johnny Bower as he recovered from a puck to the head.

Those were the days of the victorious Leafs. We remember those times with great nostalgia, when life was simpler and being a fan was easy.

Where has it all gone? What of the fanfare and the glorious feeling of being a winner?

It has been so long – 41 years – since Toronto hockey fans have walked tall in triumph and achievement.

Loss after loss has turned us into forlorn fans, walking with eyes down and with few happy-tales to share.

When a Montreal fan says to us, "The Leafs suck," we can only pretend to stand on guard for Mats, Darcy and Wade, because we know that the Leafs really do suck.

But do they? Are we really so downtrodden, depressed and mournful about our hobbled and tattered Leafs?

I'm not so sure.

URBAN WRITER

Is there not the possibility that on some very deep psychological level, the Toronto Maple Leafs, a team in a city with more hockey talent than bagels on Bathurst Street, might be exactly what we want and need? Could it be that, subconsciously, we have created a Stanley Cup Free Zone for some very good, if neurotic and complex, reasons.

Consider this: the Toronto Maple Leafs are, and will forever be, great in the eyes of the true fan.

Schools should heed the big picture

Epi on Education

Most would assume that the proposed Africentric public school in Toronto is yet another opportunity for the day school community to assert its right to a more inclusive public system that would grant funding to faith-based schools.

The obvious argument is that if the Ontario public system can harbour aboriginal schools, gay-friendly settings, Catholic institutions and now Africentric classrooms, it should be open enough to house the religious/ethnic schools of all minority communities. That fact was true before the Africentric argument was made, but because there is a flaw in the Africentric idea, I would not want to base our struggle on this latest development.

What we need is Gaia-centric schooling – based on the so-called "Gaia hypothesis" that living and non-living parts of the earth are a complex, interacting system that can be thought of as a single organism – not Eurocentric, Africentric or Inuit-centric education.

Seymour Epstein

Of course, any ethnic group can stress pride in its own cultural and spiritual heritage and will want to broaden the knowledge of its students in the literature, history, and values of its past, but the small, damaged world we all share demands a holistic, not a narrow view.

To illustrate my point, consider the year 1492. Literate Europe was amazed at the potential of moveable-type printing, but it had actually been invented much earlier in the Orient. And most Europeans could not read in 1492. Who knows how important Jewish publishing houses were in the early days of European printing? Columbus "discovered"

America, but it was already inhabited by its aboriginal population and was probably explored much earlier by northern Europeans.

For us Jews, 1492 was the dark year when we were expelled from one of our richest Diaspora cultures, our long sojourn on the Iberian peninsula. The expulsion was the equivalent of a 15th-century Holocaust, and it changed the face of both world Jewry and much of Europe and the Middle East.

All of these 1492 facts are important, as are many others from all over the globe. The fact that I have given no Africentric information on 1492 betrays my personal ignorance and attests to the fact that my knowledge contains gaps that need filling.

Considering them together, however, is much more educative than separating out certain cultures and ranking them by some specious methodology. See Chapter 2 of Isaiah for a method of combining the particular with the universal.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Our Leafs are champs – of a sort to hold four Leaf tickets in their hands, to have the chance to take their beloved family to watch an opening faceoff at the Air Canada Centre and to hear the thud of Alexei Ponikarovsky being checked into the boards – despite their team being mired at the bottom of the standings.

Ask any junior player who is drafted by the Leafs how they feel. The inevitable response is: "I grew up on the Leafs. This is a lifelong dream."

Our Leafs are icons. They are our Greek Olympians – strong, mighty and standing high on a mountaintop with sticks aloft. In our minds, it's therefore insignificant whether they win or lose. The fact is, we are satisfied that the Leafs exist at all. We are content knowing that we're able to celebrate our Canadian-ness through them and have a relationship with the only true royalty that our country has – pro hockey players.

Coupled with that is the wearisome reality that Torontonians, and perhaps Canadians in general, harbour a very well-developed sense of mediocrity in which we expect the cream to sink to the bottom. In some strange and tragic way, we actually celebrate our losses and stomp on excellence – except in one area: money!

We Torontonians just love money. Cash is what makes our city so appealing, not our warmth and not our greatness. And the fact is, the Toronto Maple Leafs are making bushels of coin, so why should they become more competitive. Leaf investors have gone straight to "Go" with bags of gold in hand. They've already won – perhaps not the Stanley Cup, but the economic Holy Grail: an unimaginable return on their Leaf investment.

Yet, on some very deep level, everyone in Leaf Nation is happy, and there's really no need to change anything. The Leafs satisfy our desire to bow to something greater, the owners are filthy rich, and our sense of mediocrity is only strengthened by the fact that our team sits at the bottom of the standings.

Hail the Leafs: they're truly the best team in the NHL, on some very deep psychological level. avrumrosensweigideas.blogspot.com, avrum@veahavta.org. Sderot/Sudan?

CANADA

Not Guilty Plea

REGINA — A former University of Saskatchewan lecturer charged with promoting hatred against Jews for Internet postings made from 2004 to 2007 pleaded not guilty Feb. 25, telling reporters later he's taking a stand against Jews "inordinate amount of power" in Canada. Terrence Tremaine, 59, faces up to two years in jail. In 2007, a human rights tribunal fined him $4,000 for other hate postings, and the university fired him in 2005 after learning of his posts on a white supremacist site. Tremaine asked the court to reverse an order barring him from the web, saying he needs to do research for his defence, the Regina Leader-Post reported.

$8-Million Gift

TORONTO — Theatrical promoter and philanthropist Aubrey Dan and his wife, Maria, last week gave $8 million to the high-risk birth program at Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre. The gift — plus $4 million raised from a benefit concert last week by Bryan Adams, Sarah McLachlan, Jann Arden and Josh Groban — will help build a 150,000-square-foot neo-natal facility and be honoured by naming the Aubrey & Maria Dan Program for High Risk Mothers & Babies. The Dans said they wanted to give back to the hospital, where their daughter, now 15, was born weighing less than two pounds.

Costa Rica Criticized

WASHINGTON — U.S. Jewish groups criticized Costa Rica for recognizing "Palestine" as a state last month, saying it undermines Mideast peace efforts. Costa Rica was long a pro-Israel stalwart in Latin America and until 2006 was one of only two nations with an embassy in Jerusalem. Few non-Arab and Muslim states recognize Palestine.

Families Settle Suit

BALTIMORE — Two Jewish families have settled with a Delaware school board over pressure on their kids to become Christian. The suit against the Indian River School District was settled in a deal filed Feb. 21, Jews on First, a website that follows the case, reported. The deal provides compensation and orders schools to change practices. The problem started in 2004 when a pastor singled out a girl at a high school graduation to pray for her conversion. When her family complained, they were harassed, and a younger son was bullied at school with anti-Semitic epithets. The son in the other family was pressed to join a middle school Bible club. One of the families moved to avoid harassment.

Muslims Reach Out

LONDON — U.K. Muslim leaders issued an unprecedented appeal to world Jewry to help bridge the gap between the two faiths. The letter came from the Muslim-Jewish study centre at the Woolf Institute of Abrahamic Faiths in Cambridge, England. Woolf Institute lecturer Sheikh Michael Mumisa said the letter is the first in modern times to be sent with the backing of Muslim leaders and scholars. British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks has reportedly seen it and is expected to respond soon.

Obama Rejects Farrakhan's Support

CLEVELAND — Barack Obama rejected the support of Louis Farrakhan during a presidential debate last week.

The Illinois senator and U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton met Feb. 26 for the 20th debate in the run for the Democratic nomination for the U.S. presidency.

Moderator Tim Russert of NBC News pressed Obama on Farrakhan's praise for him the previous weekend, noting that the Nation of Islam leader had often made anti-Semitic remarks, once calling Judaism a "gutter religion."

"This young man is the hope of the entire world that America will change and be made better," Farrakhan said of Obama at a rally in Chicago on Feb. 25.

"I have been very clear in my denunciation of Minister Farrakhan's anti-Semitic comments," Obama told Russert. "I think that they are unacceptable and reprehensible. I did not solicit this support. He expressed pride in an African-American who seems to be bringing the country together. I obviously can't censor him, but it is not support that I sought. And we're not doing anything, I assure you, formally or informally with Minister Farrakhan."

Pressed by Russert to reject Farrakhan's support, Obama said: "Tim, you know, I can't say to somebody that he can't say that he thinks I'm a good guy." Russert then noted that Obama's pastor had expressed admiration for Farrakhan. Obama countered by noting his pro-Israel record, his denunciation of anti-Semitism in the black community and his strong support among Jews nationwide.

Clinton then interjected, saying "there's a difference between denouncing and rejecting," and that she believed Obama was sincere, but "we've got to be even stronger."

Obama didn't see the difference, but added, "I'm happy to concede the point. And I would reject and denounce."

diplomat David Ben-Rafael, who died in the 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Argentina. The Feb. 25 ruling held Iran liable for the attack, which killed 29 people. Iran's Lebanese proxy, Hezbollah, took responsibility. The ruling is one of a number in recent years holding Iran liable for Hamas or Hezbollah attacks against Americans. Iran doesn't acknowledge the rulings, the result of judgments in the absence of an Iranian defence. Plaintiffs have had limited success collecting on judgments by seizing Iranian assets.

Federation sets new schedule for BJCC construction

Costs rise as start date on new facility pushed back;
set to finish on time

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Contrary to plans that were announced last fall at the annual meeting of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, the facility will remain open until June 2009 before it's demolished to make way for a new JCC building.

"It's really for the convenience of members," said UJA Federation of Greater Toronto spokesperson Howard English, who added that he "wouldn't classify [the change of plans] as a delay," because the anticipated completion date for the redevelopment of the entire BJCC site is still November 2011.

In a Jan. 11 letter to members, Sherry Kulman, the BJCC's executive director, wrote that the change means, among other things, that they can "confidently renew" their memberships and register their children for day care from September 2008 to June 2009.

The BJCC's summer day camp, Centre Camp, will be held on the grounds of two public schools in the Lawrence Avenue and Avenue Road area this summer, as announced in the fall.

Demolition of the 46-year-old BJCC was originally scheduled to start in January 2009. However, the federation still anticipates that the site's redevelopment – part of the federation's "Tomorrow" project, which includes the renovation of the Miles Nadal JCC and the construction of a new community campus in Vaughan – will be completed in November 2011, the original projected completion date.

English said the parking lot next to the Lipa Green building, which was expanded as part of the first phase of the overall project, was finished earlier than expected, allowing the original completion date to be maintained.

In the spring, work will begin on the Lipa Green building, which will undergo extensive renovations and additions, Kulman wrote.

Also, she wrote, a pavilion will be constructed as the first phase of the new JCC. The pavilion – which is expected to take a year to complete after construction begins in April – will house a seniors' centre, a children's centre (including day care) and BJCC administration offices. It will also serve as the temporary home of the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

The revised construction schedule will affect the cost of the project, which was estimated at $150 million in the fall. English said the estimated cost is now $160 million, of which $85 million has already been raised in cash donations.

Membership fees for the new centre have not been determined, English said.

During the JCC construction period, members will be able to use the facilities of six other clubs. In addition to the Columbus Centre, eight kilometres southwest of the BJCC, which was announced at the annual meeting, arrangements have been made at Garnet A. Williams Community Centre, the Richmond Hill Country Club, Mayfair Racquet & Fitness Clubs, the Miles Nadal JCC, and the YMCA of Greater Toronto at Bayview Avenue and Sheppard Avenue.

Partially subsidized memberships will still be honoured through the United Way, Kulman said.

Barring unforeseen circumstances, English does not anticipate further delays. "We're committed to this schedule."

Hamas always wins

In a recent correspondence from Israel, CJN columnist Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, piquantly noted that "Hamas never seems to lose a battle against Israel, irrespective of the outcome."

He was referring to the fact that media coverage of Palestinian life in Gaza essentially confirms, reconfirms, emphasizes and re-emphasizes an entrenched negative image of Israel in the hearts and minds of most of the people in the world.

He made his observations in relation to a failed effort by Hamas early last week to orchestrate a march by masses of Palestinians against Gaza's border with Israel.

"It would have been a coup if Palestinians from Gaza had managed to breach the fence with Israel and invade in large numbers, as they did on the Egyptian border last month," Rabbi Marmur noted. "But even though they didn't [breach the fence], the fact that the media could photograph school-children (commandeered from schools, of course) demonstrating, made it all worthwhile."

In the contest for the sympathy of the world, Rabbi Marmur astutely points out what many others have often painfully noted. "Hamas invariably wins hands down, because the world likes the kind of victim it presents itself as, while shunning the Israeli 'bullies.' Old anti-Semitism, no longer in vogue, can now be recycled as passionate care for the Palestinian underdog."

Palestinians-as-victims and Israelis-as-bullies was the razor sharp image projected across all manner of media airwaves and through and into electronic switches in countless millions of computers around the world.

Israel is at war with Hamas. The reason for that, which many commentators and of course critics of Israel always ignore, is that Hamas wants to destroy the Jewish state.

"Destroy the Jewish state" is not merely a slogan, a catchword, a rallying cry or an organizing principle for Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh in Gaza or exiled leader Khaled Meshal in Damascus, the self-appointed leaders of Hamas. It is the holy of their holies. It is the pre-eminent ambition they have. Building a Palestinian state is secondary to destroying the Jewish one. Indeed, the Palestinian state that Hamas purports to want to build, will be built, according to their national plan, upon the ashes of the Jewish one.

Abu Obeida, the spokesperson for the military wing of Hamas makes this very explicit: "The Zionist settlement of Sderot, which perches on our occupied land north-east of the Gaza Strip, will continue to constitute a legitimate target for the holy warriors of the Izzadin el-Qassam Brigades."

But ashes of Jews will never again be the billowy foundation for the structure of other people's ambitions.

As of this writing, some 100 Palestinians have been killed by the IDF since last mid-week in fierce fighting with Hamas in an effort to protect the lives of Israeli citizens. It is horrible, it is terrible that civilians – women and children – are among the Palestinian dead. But the responsibility for their deaths lies squarely with Hamas.

Two IDF soldiers, 20-year-old Doron Asulin from Be'er Sheva and 20-year-old Eran Dan-Gur from Jerusalem were killed in the fighting. Forty-seven-year-old Ron Yichyeh was killed by a Qassam rocket the week before.

The IDF incursion into northern Gaza was aimed at trying to bring an end to the daily barrage of rockets into Israel.

Hamas decided to aim its death at "legitimate targets" farther into Israel than the Jewish communities adjacent to Gaza. On Sunday alone, some 40 rockets were fired against Israel, including two Grad-type missiles, which struck the city of Ashkelon.

The European Union on the weekend joined the United Nations in condemning what it referred to as "disproportionate" use of force by the Israel Defence Forces in Gaza, after more than 60 Palestinians were killed last Saturday in fighting.

Earlier in the day, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon condemned what he called Israel's "excessive and disproportionate" response to Palestinian rocket fire.

To be sure, the European Union and the secretary general also denounced the ongoing rocket attacks against Israel. But the thrust of their comments were levelled against Israel because, in the gruesome calculus of dead bodies, Israel's count was far less than that of the Palestinians.

But the call for proportionate use of force is meaningless, absurd and unfair against an enemy such as Hamas. Israel is correct to do all within its power to prevent the rocket fire, to save and protect the lives of its citizens. Israel should not apologize for acting against terrorists, for wanting to live.

The tragedy for Israelis and for the innocent Palestinians is that the IDF can win only temporary respites from the murderous rocket barrages against Israelis. In truth, only Palestinians can stop and prevent the bloodshed. Herein lies the other, more devastating tragedy: there seem to be no Palestinians capable of doing this or even wanting to do it. For, as Rabbi Marmur sadly points out, even when they lose, they win.

HELP FOR SDEROT

Senior kindergartners from Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus present a cheque to Alon Davidi, chair of the Sderot Defence Council, to buy art supplies for the children of Sderot. The money was raised through a silent auction of artwork created during a unit on famous artists, and by the children themselves through various fundraising activities. Sderot a town 'under trauma,' says spokesman

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

"We want to wake up to a peaceful tomorrow," says Alon Davidi, chair of the Sderot Defence Council.

Davidi, whose grassroots advocacy organization raises awareness about Sderot's plight as a town under constant Palestinian rocket and mortar fire, plaintively expressed hope that its long nightmare will soon end.

For the past seven years, particularly since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in 2005, Sderot has endured an almost-daily succession of Qassam rocket and mortar attacks.

More than 7,000 Qassams and mortars, launched mainly by Hamas and Islamic Jihad, have landed in Sderot and surrounding communities, killing 13 civilians, injuring hundreds more and damaging many residential and commercial buildings.

Israel has retaliated, striking rocket launcher crews and their bases in Gaza, but to no avail.

"This is a town under trauma," said Davidi, who was in Toronto late last month as part of a North American tour to highlight Sderot's vulnerability.

In an interview, he said that the bombardments have driven away some 4,000 residents from beleaguered Sderot, which had a population of 24,000 until quite recently.

"The people with money have left," he said, adding that the situation has depressed real estate prices. "If the firing doesn't stop, thousands more will leave."

He warned that if Israel fails to take much stronger military steps to end the terrorism, Ashkelon, a neighbouring city with a far larger population, will find itself in the same boat as Sderot.

"There is a big war in Sderot," said Davidi, whose appearance was sponsored by the Toronto Zionist Council. "Hamas wants to kill Jews and harm Israel."

Declaring that Sderot needs the moral and financial support of the Canadian Jewish community for what may be a prolonged siege, Davidi said, "We're a big family. We're in this together."

Davidi, 34, has lived in Sderot for the last 12 years. Shortly after a Qassam struck his home in 2006, breaking windows, splintering furniture and traumatizing his wife and children, he founded the Sderot Defence Council.

"I thought we could live with the Qassams, but then I realized we have to deal with them."

The council, which is politically non-partisan, has taken the lead in lobbying the Israeli government for help.

It has organized rallies, marches and demonstrations, including vigils in front of the homes of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Ehud Barak.

It has also assisted families that have been physically, mentally and economically victimized by the bombardments.

And it has forced the Israeli government to reinforce thousands of homes in Sderot. Two weeks ago, Israel allocated more than $90 million to fortify 3,600 homes within a four-kilometre range of Gaza. Homes beyond that range will supposedly be protected by an anti-missile defence system due to become operational within approximately two years.

Davidi was critical of the fact that the government has not set aside funds for the additional fortification of about 3,500 homes in Sderot.

"We feel like we're struggling to convince the government to protect us. Why? Why?"

Claiming that Olmert has grown timid since the Second Lebanon War in 2006, Davidi complained that the prime minister has visited Sderot only twice, and only after midnight. "He's afraid to see the people of Sderot suffering."

As well, he voiced disappointment that Barak has broken his promises and not "fixed the problem."

According to Davidi, Israeli tactics have not worked. Neither pinpoint raids into Gaza nor the partial cutoff of fuel and electricity supplies to the territory have been effective in deterring terrorists.

Calling for tougher measures, he urged the Israeli army to reoccupy the northern part of Gaza and the Philadelphi Route, the strip of land between Israel and the Egyptian border, from where, among other locales, Palestinians launch rockets and mortars.

"You need to blow up their homes and kill their leadership," he said. "Unless we do this, Sderot will suffer."

He dismissed the possibility of an Israeli truce with militant Palestinian groups that have taken responsibility for the bombardments.

"Hamas will not honour a ceasefire. It has not honoured previous ceasefires. They bring only short-term relief. You need to break the evil. A normal country can't allow its citizens to be hurt."

Davidi described Israel's unilateral pullout from Gaza as "a very big mistake," and he had nothing but scorn for a recent European Union call for Israel to cease military operations in Gaza, lift its blockade of Gaza and refrain from inflicting "collective punishment" on Palestinian civilians there.

Dershowitz headlines rally for Sderot

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

"What would you do if it were you? If it were your family? If it were your city? If it were your country and Qassam rockets were raining down with the names of your children on the ends of them, if not literally, then figuratively?"

That was the question asked by Alan Dershowitz, the Harvard University law professor and outspoken defender of Israel, in his keynote address to the Rally for Sderot, held Feb. 25 at the Sheraton Centre.

The event – organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and co-sponsored by more than 100 Jewish community groups – attracted some 2,500 people who gathered to support the southern Israeli town of Sderot, located a few kilometres from the Gaza border, which has suffered thousands of Palestinian rocket attacks over the past seven years.

"As a human rights lawyer, I tell you this: Israel has every right, legally and morally, to do whatever it takes to prevent more rockets from raining on Sderot," Dershowitz said.

Before Dershowitz took to the podium, federation chair David Koschitsky commended the Toronto Jewish community for sending a strong message of solidarity to the residents of Sderot.

The evening's program was broadcast live via satellite feed to a community centre in Sderot.

Despite the fact that it was 3 a.m. in Israel, about 100 Sderot residents gathered to be a part of the rally, and some had the opportunity to communicate their frustrations and fears.

A 16-year-old girl said she doesn't feel free living in Sderot, because when she goes out, she needs to plan her route based on where the bomb shelters are located.

"Your challenges are our challenges," Koschitsky said. "And your right to a peaceful future is just as strong as our right to a peaceful future... Sderot today is a symbol of Israel's determination to survive, to thrive and to prevail."

Israeli Consul General Amir Gissin spoke briefly about the frustration that both Israelis and Diaspora Jews feel regarding the "civic problem and the military problem" in Sderot.

Gissin was booed by some when he said that patience is needed, as it will take time to find the right solution to the Qassam problem, but he was applauded when he pledged that Israel will find a way to end the constant threat of rocket attacks, just as it was able to dramatically decrease the number of suicide bombings.

Alon Davidi, the head of the Sderot Defence Council and a father of five, spoke about the hardships that his family and the rest of his community have to face on a daily basis.

"You see children who are afraid to go outside because they are so afraid that a Qassam rocket will hit them. And they are right. You know why? Because it happens," Davidi said.

In fact, earlier that day, a 10-year-old boy nearly lost his arm when a Qassam rocket landed near him while he was on his way home from school.

"The only fault of that little kid is that he didn't run fast enough into one of the shelters," Yossi Tanuri, director general of the UJA Federations Canada's Israel office, said via the live video satellite feed.

Just two days later, a 47-year-old Sapir College student was killed when a rocket landed in a parking lot adjacent to his school.

Dershowitz, who praised the Toronto Jewish community for setting an example for the rest of the Diaspora communities in North America, offered words of encouragement for the people gathered in Sderot who were listening to his address via satellite.

Alan Dershowitz

"You are our heroes. We love you, we support you, and we will never let you down."

Dershowitz, who met with students for a question-and-answer session prior to the rally, said the international community imposes a double standard on Israel when it defends its citizens.

"The world is waiting for one of those rockets to hit a school bus, God forbid, to hit a school room, God forbid, to hit an ambulance, to hit a hospital, to hit a group of children. Then the world will say it's OK for Israel to respond. As long as it's proportionate, and as long as no civilians are killed, and as long as it's done in a way that will have no impact on preventing it in the future. What other democracy in the world would wait until that horrible disaster occurs?"

Israel's options in Gaza

The dire situation along Israel's border with the Gaza Strip grew far worse last week as Hamas bombarded Sderot and Ashkelon with a deadly barrage of rockets, mortars and Katyushas. During the course of these indiscriminate bombardments, which may rightly be described as war crimes, a man in Sderot was killed, bringing to 14 the number of Israeli civilians killed by these projectiles since 2001. Sderot, located one kilometre from Gaza, has borne the brunt of these attacks. But in an ominous and unprecedented development, 20 Katyushas struck residential neighbourhoods in Ashkelon, 17 kilometres away, scoring direct hits on homes and injuring several civilians. Israel believes that the Katyushas were made in Iran and smuggled into Gaza via the Sinai Peninsula in Egypt. In the face of this blatant aggression, Israel retaliated fiercely, and unfortunately, Palestinian civilians were killed in the crossfire. Hamas – which seized control of Gaza from Fatah last summer and deliberately and cynically fires missiles from civilian areas – is to blame for their deaths.

As it considers what to do next, Israel basically has four options at its disposal. Israel can put up with the blood-soaked status quo, which means enduring further casualties and challenges to its sovereignty. By the same token, Israel can launch more reprisal raids and continue its blockade of Gaza until Hamas recognizes its existence and renounces terrorism. This option, ultimately, is of no value. Alternatively, Israel can launch a major ground offensive. Defence Minister Ehud Barak has warned that this remains a "real and tangible" possibility. But such an operation would be costly in terms of lives and perhaps force Israel to reoccupy all or parts of Gaza, an unpalatable solution. Barring an invasion, Israel can agree to a long-term ceasefire with Hamas, but previous hudnas have broken down. Still, it is worth recalling that Israel and Hezbollah laid down their arms in a United Nations truce that ended the Second Lebanon War in 2006. As a last resort, Israel can agree to the presence of an international peacekeeping force in Gaza. It just might work, as it has so far in Lebanon and on the Golan Heights. Certainly, a diplomatic solution would be preferable to all out war. – S.K.

Wise words

Hassan Rowhani is a key Iranian official, and when he speaks, we should prick up our ears. Formerly Iran's top nuclear negotiator, he is a member of the Assembly of Experts – an elite Islamic body – and a representative of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, on the National Security Council. Last week, Rowhani launched an important verbal broadside against the current president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, declaring that his "coarse slogans" are not in Iran's national interests. Two weeks ago, Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction, borrowed a phrase from the Nazi era in Germany and branded Israel as a "dirty microbe." This was too much for even Rowhani, who warned that Ahmadinejad's miserable rhetoric may bring Iran more trouble than it can handle. "We must act in such a way that the world understands that we are ready for more flexibility and more dialogue," he said. These are wise words for Iran's leadership to ponder. – S.K.

Conservative Jews are not in 'discomfort'

The opinions expressed by Rabbi Yehiel Ben Ayon ("Why Sephardim shun non-Orthodox movements," CJN, Feb 7) are interesting and provocative, if not incendiary to the Jewish Conservative community. The mere title of his column is negative and suggests that the Conservative movement is somehow a diluted form of Judaism and a step down for our Sephardi brethren. Further, the notion that we are in any "discomfort" and that Conservative Jews find this "dichotomy unbearable" are ludicrous and unfounded statements.

I have been a practising Conservative Jew for more than 30 years, and I am not anguished by the supposed compromises of my movement to traditional Jewish practice. The Conservative movement is founded and continues to be based on Halachah. Moreover, the three different Conservative congregations to which I have belonged have had a significant number of Jews of Sephardi origin, including Moroccans, Iraqis, Tunisians and Persians. The opinions of Rabbi Ben Ayon serve to propagate the idea that there are different types of Jews who can be delineated by their choice of religious affiliation. I would like to respectfully suggest that the good rabbi recognize that Jews have enough external criticism around the world and that opinions such as his are divisive and create animosity among our people.

Response to Held (1)

I read Daniel Held's column, "We need to create our own shuls" (CJN, Feb. 7), with interest, hoping to gain insight into one of my burning questions, "Where have all the Jewish youth gone?" As a middle-aged member of a "big-box establishment" synagogue, I am often among the younger attendees at Shabbat services.

In defence of these establishments, it has taken generations of hardworking Jews and their financial contributions to build these fine synagogues as a tribute to the maintenance of the Jewish religion and culture. If we, of the older generation, choose to worship in clean, well-decorated surroundings while seated on padded chairs, we've paid dearly for that comfort!

Friday night, the synagogue president makes announcements for events that, according to Held, "bear little relevance to me." These events take a lot of effort to prepare, all of which is expended by volunteers. The volunteers appeal to their peers, knowing that others with similar interests will attend. The synagogue president will be thrilled to add young adult events to his Friday night announcements if only they would take action to organize functions of interest to them. Our synagogues have space that is not being used and excellent staff who are happy to help with the logistics for new events. It just takes some effort to prepare a Jewish-themed event.

Held uses B'nai Beshurun in New York as a model progressive synagogue. If this congregation of 1,900 families can attract a large number of young adults to Shabbat services, then surely we can learn from their efforts. If this age group wants a 5 p.m. Shabbat service in a stark basement environment, please meet me at my synagogue, as I would be happy to help you clean an unused basement area, whitewash the walls, install electrical outlets and haul amplifiers for your modern liturgy. I'm sure the rabbi would not be opposed to pausing his sermon in the main sanctuary so we all can enjoy your electrified musical strains reverberating throughout the building! I look forward to seeing dozens of young adults gracing the steps of my synagogue, coming for their own service in their own space.

We have created our own shul, as Daniel Held has suggested ("We need to create our own shuls," CJN, Feb. 7)!

The Annex Shul is a vibrant and inclusive grassroots community in downtown Toronto that serves the spiritual, educational and social needs of a diverse variety of Jews through lively and participatory Carlebach-style Friday night services, learning opportunities and social gatherings ranging from Shabbat dinners to holiday parties.

Although the majority of Annex Shul participants are graduate students and young professionals, all are welcome, regardless of age or affiliation, to join us for weekly davening and biweekly Shabbat dinners.

Isaac Abarbanel: 500 Years of Memories

By ERIC LAWEE

This year, 2008, marks 500 years since the death of one of the most remarkable figures of the last 1,000 years of Jewish history, Isaac Abarbanel (1437-1508). Most famous as a leader of Spanish Jewry at the time of its 1492 expulsion, Abarbanel was also a major figure in several Mediterranean courts. His intellectual reputation rests on an immense corpus of Jewish scholarship, mainly expressed in the form of biblical commentary, that cuts across numerous religious-literary lines. Rather than revisit details of Abarbanel's career or scholarly legacy, however, this essay commemorates the quincentenary of his death by considering various Jewish "memories" of Abarbanel that have developed over the ages, paying special attention to one image of Abarbanel that has an especially strong contemporary resonance.

Interesting Times

Abarbanel's life bears meaning in part due to the consequential and turbulent period in which Abarbanel lived. It bears heightened significance in our own day due to his times' striking resemblance, in several notable ways, to our own. Abarbanel's epoch saw the devastating destruction of Europe's largest Jewry, resident in Spain, a momentous event that left post-1492 Spanish Jews pondering why it happened and what it meant.

This same era saw the rise of a revolutionary invention that transformed human communication: the printing press. When three of his books were printed in 1505, Abarbanel became one of the first living Jewish authors to have his writings disseminated through the great leap forward in "information technology."

Abarbanel's day also saw the astonishing advances in overseas discovery, most notably Columbus' voyages to the Americas. While he never mentions him, Abarbanel may have met Columbus in Lisbon in the mid-1470s, when the prospect of sailing west to Asia was first being imagined.

Finally, Abarbanel's lifetime witnessed Christian-Muslim military confrontations that shook the world, with the 1453 fall of eastern Christendom's capital, Constantinople, most notable among them. For Abarbanel and others, these battles nurtured expectations of history's imminent end that mirror some of the apocalyptic scenarios that play out in our own morning headlines.

Abarbanel's Life: From Tranquility to Tribulation

Born in Lisbon in 1437, Abarbanel passed most of his life in relative tranquility in Portugal, where he served in the inner circle of King Afonso V. He fled to Spain when he was 46 years old after being implicated (wrongly, he claimed) in a noble conspiracy against Afonso's son, João II. He soon joined the retinue of Spain's "Catholic monarchs," Fernando II and Isabel I, contributing extensive loans to their campaign against Islam's last Iberian citadel, Granada, which fell in January 1492.

Whether Abarbanel celebrated Granada's fall like other Spanish Jews is unknown. What is clear was his failure to foresee what came as a bolt out of the blue: Fernando's and Isabel's attempt to solve Spain's "Jewish problem" by expelling (in a charter dated March 31, 1492, but issued only a month later) Spain's "Jews and Jewesses" from their kingdoms, with the stipulation that they "never return."

Choosing departure from Spain over the only other option, conversion to Christianity, Abarbanel spent his last decade-and-a-half in Italy, arriving in Naples and ending his life, after living in several Italian centres, in Venice. In a late-in-life retrospective, he lamented days squandered in "futile pursuit" in the "palaces of kings." Yet soon after landing in Venice, he devised a plan to resolve a major international commercial dispute. The India trade in spices and other materials was the backbone of the Venetian economy. Following Vasco de Gama's 1498 landing in India, however, the Portuguese no longer had need of the Venetian entrepôt between east and west. As the republic's patriots sought to avert financial disaster, Abarbanel developed a pitch for the Portuguese. Venice's rulers assured him of the state's "customary gratitude" if all went well, though the plan came to naught (the Portuguese had little reason to negotiate).

Memories of Abarbanel

With a basic outline of Abarbanel's life and times in hand, we may turn to some of the diverse ways in which Abarbanel has been remembered by Jews over the past 500 years.

Sephardi Images

Echoing his self-representations after 1492, Sephardi images of Abarbanel coalesce around the theme of the "hero in exile." In particular, Abarbanel is depicted as the "last of the galaxy of stars shining in the Spanish sky" who led Spain's beleaguered Jews from the land their ancestors called home for more than a millennium.

The characterization just cited is that of Ovadia Canby, editor of Le Judaïsme Sephardi, the official organ of the World Confederation of Sephardic Jews, who devoted a whole issue of his journal to Abarbanel in 1937 to mark the 500th anniversary of Abarbanel's birth. Canby vividly recalled his first encounter with the Sephardi great in a play titled Don Isaac Abarbanel. The figure who appeared on stage, he observed, "exuded a fluid magnetism that dominated and carried away the wavering herd of poor exiles." Little wonder that Abarbanel became a significant subject of eastern Sephardi theatre in modern times. In one Judeo-Spanish production, he appeared as the financier of Columbus' fateful voyage in 1492.

A Sephardi folkloric tradition that has come to light recently casts Abarbanel in a slightly different role. Instead of leading "poor exiles" into dispersion, he plans to organize them to fight their enemies (the plan is scuttled by a converso turncoat). Though this tradition appears uniquely in a responsum of the Sephardi chief rabbi of Tel Aviv (beginning in 1942), Yaakov Moshe Toledano, it seems to have been widespread. It retains the image of Abarbanel as a hero of the expulsion, but with a Zionist twist.

Abarbanel in Germany

By 1937, the year marking the quincentenary of Abarbanel's birth, modern German Jewry's romance with medieval Sephardi Jewry had been long in the making. Throughout the 18th and 19th centuries, German Jewish modernizers bled up Spanish Jewry as a model worthy of emulation, not least because of the marriage of Jewish learning, sophisticated rationalism, and worldly engagement displayed by Sephardi leaders such as Abarbanel. As their darkest hour closed in, German Jews again summoned models and images from the world of Sephardi experience to provide comfort and clarification.

In 1937, the Jewish Museum in Berlin mounted a major exhibition to commemorate the quincentenary of Abarbanel's birth. In an article on "The Strange Career of the Abarbanel Family" (published in Aufklärung und Skepsis, a volume devoted to the Jewish-born German poet and essayist Heinrich Heine, 1797-1856), Jonathan Kolnik lists reasons why Abarbanel served as a touchstone for German Jews in the 1930s and before. (For his part, Heine had included a figure named Isaac Abarbanel, a Jewish apostate, in an unfinished part of one of his novels.) One is that, as the Nazis entered their fifth year in power, German Jews apparently saw parallels between their own dire situation and that of Spanish Jewry on the eve of 1492.

Meanwhile, for their own reasons, various German Jewish thinkers and writers were also drawn to Abarbanel. One was a young rabbi named Abraham Joshua Heschel, who published a German volume on Abarbanel in 1937. Another was the German-Jewish exile Hermann Kesten, who published a novel the year before that featured Abarbanel at its dramatic centre.

The Netanyahu Connection

One may ask – and it's a question I routinely urge students to ask – who cares about any of this? One answer to this question in the current context is: Netanyahu does. No, not the former Israeli prime minister and current leader of the opposition, Benjamin Netanyahu (or at least not him in the first instance), but Benzion Netanyahu, his father.

In the late 1940s, the elder Netanyahu, a diehard of the "Revisionist" wing of the Zionist movement led by Vladimir Zev Jabotinsky, wrote a doctoral dissertation on Abarbanel's political and messianic teachings. He conducted his study in the shadow of the Holocaust and in the wake of the successful struggle to found a new Jewish state. Ruminations on Jewish history's ups and downs inexorably imposed themselves.

In his dissertation, subsequently turned into a book that became the standard 20th-century reference on Abarbanel, Netanyahu displayed considerable ambivalence towards his subject. Following in the time-honoured Sephardi tradition, Netanyahu celebrated Abarbanel's communal devotion as reflected in his struggle to secure the edict of expulsion's withdrawal and, when his efforts failed, choice of exile over conversion. Yet regarding Abarbanel's leadership overall, Netanyahu was, to say the least, far from wholly sanguine. In essence, he alleged that Abarbanel had failed to apply the political acumen and ambitions that he placed in the service of gentle potentates to the condition of his own people. It was a failure that Netanyahu understood in terms of Abarbanel's messianism, which encouraged Jews to breathe "the atmosphere of dreams rather than reality" when what was needed was a "realistic course."

What would such a course have entailed? For Abarbanel's Revisionist Zionist biographer, the answer was clear: propagation of a plan for "regaining the Promised Land." Had he addressed a proper call to his people (along lines that Netanyahu associated with the mid-16th century Iberian-born Ottoman Jewish statesman, Don Joseph Nasi), the entire attitude of Jews toward their "national problem" might have changed. As it was, Abarbanel fell victim to a "falsely optimistic view" and contributed much to its spread in the Jewish world through his messianic teachings. So while Netanyahu's Abarbanel remained a hero of the exile, he also became the embodiment of, on the Zionist reckoning, premodern Diaspora Jewry's worst sin: political passivity and impotence.

If this brief sketch of Benzion Netanyahu's image of Abarbanel summons things Benjamin Netanyahu used to say about Shimon Peres and his messianic dreams of a "New Middle East" (and that he now says about failures of the Olmert government), this is obviously no coincidence. Bibi Netanyahu learned his politics from his father, who, when Benjamin was yet a toddler, wrote a book that cast Abarbanel's failures as a paradigm of "the blindness manifested by the Jews in the Diaspora for developments laden with mortal danger," a blindness that Bibi's father deemed "nothing short of proverbial."

Though many other images of Abarbanel generated over the ages could be summoned, the ones sampled above must suffice to remind us how evocations of great figures from the Jewish past often reflect circumstances in which they were fashioned and the views and sensibilities of those who created them. We should also remember that, at times implicitly and at times with full self-awareness, images such as these help to shape visions of the Jewish future as well.

Day schools promote integration

The British government seems to have a much better understanding of education than the province of Ontario. Britain's faith-based, state-aided schools, serving different religions, put Ontario to shame.

Rabbi Dov
Marmur
in Toronto

In a recent interview in the London Jewish Chronicle, the minister responsible for schools in Britain said that "Jewish schools play a very important part in our education system, and I absolutely want that to carry on." He added: "They are, in many ways, leading in showing other parts of our school system how you promote communal cohesion."

Last month, I was privileged to participate in the celebration marking the Akiva School in North London joining the British state system. The change has enabled the school to move into a new building and double its size.

I had helped to start Akiva almost three decades ago as the first Jewish day school in Britain under the auspices of the Reform movement. Other such schools, including Leo Baeck Day School in Toronto, were already in existence, and many more have been established since then.

At the time, most Reform leaders objected to segregated schools out of fear that they would ghettoize Jewish children. But one leader thought otherwise and provided us with the wherewithal. It's a mark of his character that he would not allow the school to be named after him. Today, it's one of several liberal Jewish day schools in Britain. Soon, a non-denominational secondary school, also state-aided, will be added.

Over the years, we have seen how students in Jewish day schools can be much more comfortable in their Jewish skins than their peers in the general system. Also, Jewish day schools often provide a better secular education and thus make students feel very much part of the society in which they live.

Not having to go to supplementary schools on Sundays and weekdays gives them opportunities for leisure activities with their non-Jewish friends and neighbours. What was feared to be segregationist has become a potential path toward integration.

The Reform movement had to create its own schools, because other institutions, invariably under Orthodox auspices, discriminated against children from Reform families. Orthodox leaders in Britain are said still to be trying to sabotage the efforts of the Reform movement in the ominously mistaken belief that Orthodoxy is owed the sole franchise on Jewish education. Mercifully, the British government refuses to collude.

In keeping with the liberal tradition of openness and tolerance, Akiva and its sister schools welcome all Jews. In line with many forward-thinking women and men, their leaders rightly believe that the future of Judaism is post-denominational and non-partisan – inclusive not exclusive. The entire Jewish world could do well to learn from them.

Time to expose the hypocrisy of Israel's enemies

For the last few years, we have become accustomed to hearing about Israeli Apartheid Week on Canadian campuses, and for just as long, our community has struggled to come up with an answer for the seven-day assault on the only true democracy in the Middle East.

The most common solution has been to complain and describe the organizers as hatemongers who are blinded to the truth by spite.

This has not been good enough. We will never be able to prevent Israel's detractors from yelling at the top of their lungs about perceived crimes against humanity. We live in a country where free speech is highly valued, and this is a good thing. We shouldn't be surprised when people stretch this freedom to further their own radical agenda. It happens all the time.

For years, our campus leaders have assumed that since Israeli Apartheid Week is based on faulty premises, students would clue in and discount its message, despite having heard Israel being associated with the word "apartheid" over and over again.

It hasn't worked, and now, finally, an effective response has been formulated. Four words have changed everything for Israel advocates on campuses across the country: Islamic State Apartheid Week.

Ben Feferman, a former president of the Alpha Epsilon Pi Jewish fraternity in Ottawa and currently the Canadian campus co-ordinator for the Hasbara Fellowship program, is the architect of this initiative. Ben put the idea into motion because he understands the need to shift the focus of the Middle East debate and make sure the public relations battle is waged on our terms.

Mark Masters in Ottawa

The first Islamic State Apartheid Week was held recently at York University in Toronto. It consisted of a few events and tabling sessions aimed at pointing out the terrible discrimination against women, homosexuals and other minorities that exists in Islamic countries. Every other nation in the Middle East has a human rights record that's worse than Israel's, and all of them have been given a free pass for far too long.

Islamic State Apartheid Week is not meant to excuse any mistakes that Israel has made. Instead, it's meant to shine a light on the horrible atrocities being committed by countries whose defenders are all too eager to single out the Jewish state as being the cruellest of them all.

Speaking to Ben after the event, he told me stories about angry students who approached him at the events, but didn't have plausible arguments against the content being presented. They couldn't respond, because there is no excuse for what goes on in these countries. Most of the angry students simply muttered something about how unfair the events were.

How nice to hear the other side saying that for once.

When Ben was planning Islamic State Apartheid Week, he heard a lot of the usual criticism. "Why are you doing something you know will cause trouble?" "Why are you doing something that risks making our community look bad?" "Why light a match under the powder keg that is the debate about the Middle East?"

Ben understands, however, that in order to win the public relations battle, we must show the world that Israel is by far the most progressive, free and democratic nation in the region. Israel is like Canada, and these other countries are not. Period.

We can't give other countries a free pass.

But so far, campus leaders have decided to emphasize Israel's good side rather than highlight the double standard that Israel is being held to.

I recently attended a lecture at Carleton University given by Benjamin Pogrud, a South African-born Jewish journalist. The event was part of Israel Week sponsored by the Jewish Students' Association in Ottawa. Pogrud did a tremendous job of explaining why Israel is not an apartheid state. However, the event attracted only a handful of students and didn't even come close to filling the lecture hall where it was held.

Simply put, the message did not get out.

Next year, Islamic State Apartheid Week should be held in Ottawa, where it's guaranteed to garner a lot of attention.

Islamic State Apartheid Week must become a staple at campuses across Canada.

It's time to expose the hypocrisy of the anti-Israel movement once and for all.

India and Pakistan hold lessons for Mideast

When The CJN asked me to write a monthly column, I must admit I was rather puzzled about the direction I should take. Realistically, there is little wisdom – aside, perhaps, from insights into today's slang or popular music scene – that a third-year university student with a limited Jewish education can hope to impart to the general public. Yet, a letter to the editor in response to my last column ("Israel should re-think policy in Gaza," Feb. 7) proves that I've made at least one person evaluate (or possibly re-evaluate) their convictions.

It's with that letter in mind that I write this month's column.

The Feb. 21 edition of The CJN contained two seemingly unrelated news stories: one discussed the similar issues facing Israel and Jews on the one hand and India and Hindus on the other. The second article was about the Israeli group Peace Now and the possibilities for a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

While the articles may seem unrelated, a closer look reveals otherwise.

Undoubtedly, there are many similarities between Jews and Hindus, and by extension, Israel and India. Both religions are the subject of misconceptions and stereotypes, both countries face a similar threat from "radical Islam," and both are similarly chastised for defending themselves against it.

The similarities, however, don't end there. While the article on Jews and Hindus did not make specific mention of it, any two-state solution – the same one that's discussed at every Mideast summit meeting and is the goal of the much-touted "road map" peace plan – would be similar to the one employed in the partitioning of India and Pakistan in 1947.

It was thought that India then, like Israel now, would either be divided or destroyed. Therefore, the British partitioned India into India and Pakistan according to the Mountbatten Plan, essentially demarcating the newly formed countries along religious lines, leaving a majority Muslim Pakistan and a majority Hindu India.

This, essentially, is the basis for a two-state solution in the Middle East – creating a Jewish Israel and a Muslim Palestine.

What advocates of the two-state solution rarely mention, though, is what ensued after the partition of 1947.

While some of the blame for what happened can be placed on the British, nearly one million people died in the riots and chaos that stemmed from the religious division itself. Since then, four wars and innumerable skirmishes have been fought between the two neighbouring countries, with one such conflict resulting in a serious nuclear scare.

The origins of the hostilities lie in the ill-conceived partition plan, which left whole communities "stranded" and fostered antipathy and enmity on both sides.

This column is not intended to discredit a two-state solution, which is the light at the end of the tunnel of Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts. It's endorsed by leading political figures on both sides, and its defended by prominent writers such as

Jesse Mintz
in Halifax

Alan Dershowitz.

However, the pursuit of a two-state solution must be tempered by lessons learned from the missteps of history.

There are issues that need to be addressed before any solution – one-state, two-state or six-state (i.e., bringing surrounding countries into a body modelled on the European Union) – can be reached.

First and foremost, a profound and genuine respect for each other's sovereignty and safety is needed.

But thinking beyond respect, if Pakistani-Indian relations have taught us anything, it's that the sovereignty of the two countries that emerge from a two-state solution must be tempered by some kind of interconnectedness.

Regardless of how the partition is accomplished, undoubtedly some communities will become religious minorities in a veritable sea of otherness. A certain level of disconnection will affect not only those who are left on the "wrong" side of a partition. People who have been transplanted as a result of a peace deal will feel it as well. The two resulting countries, therefore, must share cultural and economic exchanges, as only such links will foster genuine care for the other's well-being.

An ardent pursuit of a two-state solution cannot preclude an awareness of its possible ramifications. We must learn from the mistakes of history.

Israel may have much in common with India before the 1947 partition, but the resultant enmity between India and Pakistan is not something Israel should seek to replicate in pursuing its own two-state solution.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Be'er Sheva

Be'er Sheva, the capital of the Negev Desert region and Israel's sixth largest city, is a work in progress.

Once a seat of Judean kings and much later a dusty Ottoman outpost inhabited mainly by Bedouin Arabs, Be'er Sheva was allotted to the Palestinians under the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan.

But having rejected a two-state solution, Arab states invaded the newly created state of Israel, hoping to throttle it.

Israel fought back. Its first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, was guided by the credo that the best defence is a good offence. Be'er Sheva, held by the Egyptian army, fell to Israeli forces on Oct. 21, 1948, almost exactly 31 years after British, Australian and New Zealand troops routed its Ottoman Turkish defenders.

During that battle, the Australian 4th Light Horse Brigade, consisting of 800 troops and commanded by Brig.-Gen. William Grant, charged the Turkish trenches in what was supposedly the last successful cavalry charge in British military history.

Two previous attempts to dislodge the Turks had failed.

The battle, which turned the tide of the war in the Middle East, is recreated in a 1983 Australian feature film, The Light Horsemen.

Hundreds of soldiers, still in their bloom of youth, were killed in these raging battles. Today, they rest quietly in a manicured Commonwealth cemetery on the edge of Be'er Sheva's old town, filled with low, dun-coloured Ottoman buildings, shops, a mosque and a renovated Turkish railroad station.

A handful of Jews lived in Be'er Sheva after World War I, but as Arab-Jewish violence flared in the 1920s and '30s, they left.

During the War of Independence, the Israeli army advanced from Mishmar Hanegev and Hatzertim and captured Be'er Sheva in Operation Yoav.

By then, Beit Eshel, one of three settlements founded in the vicinity in 1943, had been destroyed by the Egyptians.

Be'er Sheva, whose most famous resident was Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon, developed in fits and starts, nurtured by the arrival of new immigrants from Europe and North Africa.

Its neighbourhoods were named after the letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

Sheldon Kirshner
in Israel

For many years, the old town, with its atmospheric open air central market and its quaint stone-clad structures, was the city's commercial hub. But in the late 1990s, the centre of gravity shifted to a new indoor mall near the bus and railway station.

The Kanyon HaNegev, where Jews and Arabs mingle easily, was the brainchild of Canadian architect and developer David Azrieli, a Polish Jew who fought in the 1948 Arab-Israeli war and lived in Israel before settling in Montreal in 1954.

The mall has its detractors, who complain of business drawn away from the gentrified old town. Yet like the Soroka medical centre and the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the mall is widely regarded as a tonic for Be'er Sheva.

Nevertheless, as Israel prepares to mark 60 years of statehood, Be'er Sheva, with a population approaching 200,000 thanks to fresh infusions of Russian and Ethiopian immigrants, is generally viewed as something of a backwater, at least in comparison to Israel's big three, Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Haifa.

If the Jewish National Fund has its way, Be'er Sheva will be transformed.

The JNF, through its Blueprint Negev initiative, has begun building the Be'er Sheva River Park, a $60-million, 350-hectare project.

Its manager, Itai Freeman, hopes it will mark a real turning point in Be'er Sheva's history.

It is rising up along and around the banks of the Be'er Sheva River, which originates in the Hebron mountains of the West Bank and is usually a dry river bed when not inundated by flash floods in late autumn and winter.

Until quite recently, the eight kilometre stretch of the river in Be'er Sheva was an eyesore and an ecological hazard, used as a sand and gravel quarry and as a dumping ground for castoff construction materials and hundreds of derelict cars.

"The city turned its face away from the river," said Freeman, a 37-year-old environmental and urban planner from Kfar Bilu, a moshav near Rehovot.

The plan to rehabilitate the riverfront was in the works for two decades before the first steps to clean it up were finally taken by the JNF and the government eight years ago.

"Historically, Be'er Sheva doesn't have well-developed green spaces," Freeman explained. "Not even a city park. No one thought it was a priority, and the city didn't have the means to build one."

As envisaged by Freeman and his colleagues, the park will consist of a promenade, an artificial lake, an amphitheatre, a cluster of playing fields, walking and running paths and a War of Independence memorial site at Beit Eshel that will serve as a logistics center and entry point.

The promenade, conceived as the backbone of the park, is currently under construction. Five kilometres long and intended to be planted with fruit and shade trees and desert vegetation, it will appeal to strollers, joggers and cyclists.

The lake, which will be filled with treated waste water from the city's sewage treatment plant, will be surrounded by one or more restaurants and will accommodate recreational sports from rowing to water pedalling.

The amphitheatre, expected to be located in middle of the park, will seat 8,000 and may yet be Be'er Sheva's cultural centre.

The playgrounds will have space for a football field and basketball and volleyball courts.

The promenade, lake and amphitheatre will be built during the first phase of construction, which is expected to take seven to eight years to complete.

"We have to raise nearly $40 million for that," said Freeman.

He does not know when the second and probably last phase, featuring an exhibition centre and a reconstructed biblical city, will be ready.

"Parks are never really finished. They're ongoing works. We're still trying to determine what the annual maintenance costs will be. This is the key issue, a sustainable maintenance system. We take this very seriously."

Working on the assumption that a vital waterfront district will attract new businesses and visitors, the Jewish National Fund regards the project as an engine for the city's rebirth and as a catalyst for a population jump to 400,000.

The park is designed for both the city and outlying communities such as Omer.

In Freeman's estimation, it should be instrumental in improving Be'er Sheva's quality of life.

As he put it, "Water in the desert adds value and attracts new residents."

The last point is of crucial importance.

Freeman hopes that the park will convince two classes of Israelis to settle in Be'er Sheva: students from Ben-Gurion University — one of Israel's most dynamic and innovative institutions of higher learning — who currently commute from out of town, and career army officers, whose bases in central Israel are scheduled to be moved to the Negev in the near future.

"The government wants to develop the Negev," said Freeman. "The park is a window of opportunity."

The existing Montreal Oasis Park, a pleasant patch of green funded by JNF Canada, will be a component of the new park.

Both will doubtless help Be'er Sheva progress forward to a greener future.

B'nai Brith expels members for 'conduct unbecoming'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) has expelled some of its most vocal critics for what a disciplinary committee found to be "conduct unbecoming a member."

Eight of 21 members facing discipline were expelled – including BBC's most senior member, 68-year veteran Lou Ronson – one month after a four-hour hearing into their status. The expelled members received unsigned letters last week saying they had been stripped of "all rights and privileges of membership."

A letter addressed to Hermie Gimpel, who was expelled along with her husband, Henry, stated, "Your behaviour amounts to a persistent disregard or violation of established B'nai Brith Canada policy and code of conduct and other such disreputable behaviour that is contrary to the interests of BBC have been made out."

"It is the panel's finding that documents presented have clearly identified you as a member of the group calling itself Concerned Members of B'nai Brith Canada and that there is sufficient evidence of conduct unbecoming a member."

BBC launched the expulsion proceedings in November 2007 after several high-profile members, including past presidents, raised concerns over governance and what they described as a lack of transparency at the 132-year-old organization.

Montreal lawyer Harvey Crestohl, one of those expelled, said he was "a little aggravated" by the decision.

"It has to have been the most undemocratic, dictatorial procedures ever produced by a human rights organization in the free world," he said.

"There was no opportunity by our counsel to cross-examine anybody. No witnesses were called. Documents were filed with the [disciplinary] panel and not given to our counsel" until the end of the hearing.

"There was no indication of who it was who voted for the procedure to start, who filed the complaint, what the complaints were even about. None of this information was made available."

Crestohl, a former BBC president, said the entire procedure was fraught with procedural irregularities and violated longstanding Canadian legal requirements of "natural justice" in administrative hearings.

He said that despite the disciplinary committee's ruling, he has "absolutely no idea" what he did to warrant expulsion.

He said he and the other expelled members plan to appeal and exhaust all legal remedies, including those in the civil courts.

B'nai Brith Canada responded with the following statement: "After a thoughtful and careful process of deliberation, the disciplinary committee of B'nai Brith Canada unanimously decided to expel a handful of disgruntled individuals for 'conduct unbecoming a member of B'nai Brith Canada, contrary to the best interests of the organization.' These eight individuals who received expulsion orders represented the most blatant cases of members seeking to undermine and bring harm to the organization."

"In the remaining 13 cases under review by the disciplinary committee, five were dismissed, whereas the other eight voluntarily came forward to disassociate themselves from Concerned Members [of BBC] and reaffirmed their B'nai Brith membership."

"This peer-to-peer internal review process was conducted in full compliance with B'nai Brith International's governing structure and Brith Canada's constitution."

"B'nai Brith considers this matter now closed and is moving forward with the good and important work that it has always done in service to the community."

Those facing expulsion were sent a letter last November warning they could face removal from the organization. The letter, alleged members circulated information at the 2006 annual general meeting that "contained serious and unsubstantiated allegations against the organization and leadership."

In addition, BBC documents alleged a group called Concerned Members of B'nai Brith Canada circulated e-mails that included "defamatory allegations of wrongdoing, both financial and otherwise."

Lawyer Rochelle Cantor, who represented Crestohl and 11 others, said that members of the disciplinary committee "have not specified what the conduct unbecoming is. They haven't defined it, outlined what the conduct is."

She said the disciplinary committee departed so far from procedural norms that it expelled one member, Sid Isenberg, who had not even been served with notice that he was subject to expulsion. Isenberg learned that his membership was in question only after he arrived at the hearing to support others facing expulsion, Cantor said.

At the actual hearing, no evidence was called, she continued. "Did they give any of these people the opportunity to speak at the hearing before expelling them? Absolutely not."

Cantor also criticized BBC for handing her a file of materials as the hearing came to a close. The material, which included clippings of C/JN articles that appeared after the expulsion proceedings were launched, was relied upon by the tribunal.

Her request for an adjournment so she could study the materials was turned down, she added.

Henry Gimpel, past chair of the BBC's Toronto co-ordinating committee, said he was expelled by "a kangaroo court."

"I'm not surprised. The whole thing was a total sham from the beginning to end," Gimpel said.

He said he planned to appeal, but he questioned whether taking the case to an internal BBC review would make a difference. He preferred, he said, to proceed to the civil courts for a hearing.

Gimpel questioned why BBC was acting against long-standing members. "I assume it's being done to hide something. What are they trying to hide? They don't give us financial reports. Everything is unsigned. Everything is hushed up. What are they trying to hide?"

Conservative shuls adopt new siddur

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The new Sabbath and festival prayerbook adopted recently by two Toronto-area Conservative congregations - and soon to be become a mainstay at at least two others - is called, simply, Siddur Hadash, Hebrew for "new siddur."

Rabbi Philip Scheim Conn., Siddur Hadash: The

Moreshet Edition is a reworking of an earlier version.

The siddur, which has only been released in Toronto so far, is not officially connected to the Conservative movement, but is consistent with a traditional Conservative Jewish approach.

Rabbi Philip Scheim of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation initially went to the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly with the idea of "a more traditional version of Sim Shalom [the Conservative movement's most recently published siddur]" to meet the needs of traditional Conservative congregations like his own.

When the proposal was not approved, he approached Media Judaica, an independent publisher. The prayerbook was in the works for about five years.

The Moreshet edition follows a "more traditional rendering" of the Hebrew text than earlier versions, said Rabbi Jonathan Levine of Media Judaica. "It's very close to an Orthodox text, but not identical," he added.

It also has new prayers, meditations and readings that have been commissioned over a period of about a dozen years, said Rabbi Levine. One supplement has prayers and readings for special occasions including the birthday of a child and welcoming new congregants.

As well, the siddur has "a fair amount of transliteration, something we didn't have before," noted Rabbi Scheim. "People who are not familiar with Hebrew will be able to participate, which... makes the document more inclusive. We're trying to be more welcoming."

At Beth David and Shaar Shalom, the siddur replaces the Conservative movement's Sabbath and Festival Prayerbook, commonly known as the Silverman siddur. It dates back to 1946, although it has been reprinted more recently.

However, said Rabbi Scheim, its text predates the establishment of the State of Israel by two years, and the siddur was edited at a time when "the Holocaust had not yet taken hold on people's imagination." For those reasons it does not deal with "the two most significant events, good and bad, in the life of the Jewish people" in the 20th century.

Also, he added, its language is "stilted" by contemporary standards.

Although Beth David and some other local Conservative congregations have become more liberal in recent years - allowing women to have aliyot, for example - the most recent Conservative siddur, Sim Shalom, which was published about 10 years ago included certain liturgical changes that Rabbi Scheim and some of his colleagues felt were "problematic."

Those included adding the names of the matriarchs in prayers like the Amidah in which, traditionally, only the patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac and Jacob) are mentioned. The change is presented as an option in Sim Shalom.

Of the half dozen GTA congregations affiliated with the Conservative movement, only Beit Rayim uses Sim Shalom, Rabbi Scheim said. Beit Rayim is also the most liberal in ritual practice, being fully egalitarian, which includes counting women as part of a minyan, a sticking point for some congregations that give women Torah honours.

Publication of Siddur Hadash - which has a somewhat limited market - was made possible by fundraising, much of which took place in Toronto, Rabbi Scheim said.

Adath Israel Congregation, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement, and Beth Shalom Synagogue, which is unaffiliated, plan to introduce Siddur Hadash in the next few months.

Rabbi Scheim has met with Rabbi Levine about the possibility of publishing a new machzor along the same lines. It is under consideration, Rabbi Levine said.

Strong message of support sent to Sderot

Dershowitz said that Israel shouldn't be criticized for cutting off electricity and supplies to Hamas-controlled Gaza, because Palestinians there "need to understand that there are consequences for putting murderous tyrants into office."

He said that the restrictions shouldn't be regarded as collective punishment, but as collective responsibility.

"Hamas had a fair election... The majority, the plurality of the people voted for Hamas, and they have to understand that a vote like that carries consequences."

Dershowitz recalled a conversation he had with former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, before his stroke, who was working toward a land-for-peace deal with the Palestinians.

"Israel tried everything in its power. It gave up Gaza... and what did Israel get? It got land for rockets. Land for terrorism. Land for the kidnapping of a brave young soldier who still remains a prisoner... It's been land that has increased the ability of Hamas to inflict attacks on Israeli civilians."

He added that Hamas' goal is to kill as many Israeli children and civilians as possible, and it wants Israel to kill as many Palestinians as possible, because Hamas leaders regard the victims as martyrs.

"[Hamas] has a culture of death, not a culture of life... We choose life. [But] the international community will not allow Israel to engage in proportional, lawful actions that every other country in the world facing comparable threats would engage in."

Dershowitz, who will be travelling to Sderot this month with Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, issued a challenge to Louise Arbour, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights and a former justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, who criticized Israel for using disproportionate force during the Second Lebanon War.

"Come with me to Sderot... Come with your fellow Canadian, Irwin Cotler. Let the people of Sderot show you that human rights exists on both sides of the ledger. All she does is spend her time in Lebanon and in Gaza and hears only the other side of the story. Come to Sderot. Open your eyes, open your mind, open your heart, open your soul. Understand that the killing of Jews is also a violation of human rights and a crime against humanity," Dershowitz said.

Alan Dershowitz addresses crowd of about 2,500 at Sheraton Centre.

Making a difference

how to use a toilet. As he came from a traditional culture in which respect of elders was paramount, the new power held by the youth created an imbalance that neither the parents nor the children knew how to cope with.

I remember the close relationships I built with the children. While we mocked my Hebrew accent, we would sing songs, play soccer or talk about school. The kids in Kiriyat Moshe were full of hopes, but dreaded that their dreams would never be realized.

During my last visit to Kiriyat Moshe, when we left the bomb shelter for Kabbalat Shabbat, someone broke-in and stole our wallets and cell phones. I left eight years ago hopeful that things would improve, but fearful that change would be long in coming.

Last week, I returned to Kiriyat Moshe with a group of students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, many of whom were experiencing Israel for the first time. For a week, we had been touring, seeing highlights of the country from the Golan to the Negev. Kiriyat Moshe is not usually on the itinerary for such trips, but these students were on their way to a chesed project, working alongside local youth.

As our bus pulled in, the students were excited, but I think I was even more so. Since my last visit, a community centre and new basketball courts have been built. There were children playing hopscotch and skipping. We got off the bus and headed into the school where I used to sleep. Throughout the building there were after-school programs taking place: tutoring, big brothers and more. We headed downstairs into the shelter where I had slept many times. Thoroughly cleaned and painted, the shelter had been converted into a lounge including couches, TV, foosball (a table-top soccer game) and ping-pong.

For several hours, my students sat with a group of Ethiopian children. Together they assembled care packages for Israeli soldiers, shared stories and songs, and formed relationships just as I had done years before.

Since I first arrived in Kiriyat Moshe, our Toronto community has helped change the spirit of the community, investing in new parks and outdoor activities, after-school programs and tutoring. It is easy to see the effect we have had. And yet, despite the investment in infrastructure, it is often the personal connection, when children sit together, sing together and laugh together, as I did years-ago and as my students did now, that makes all the difference in the world.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

I first visited Kiriyat Moshe, a small neighbourhood of Rehovot, eight years ago. While studying in Israel, a group of Americans and I adopted the Ethiopian community as a volunteer project. Each week, a few of us spent Shabbat partnering with the local Bnai Akiva chapter to run youth programs. The goals were twofold: to offer educational content while giving the youths a positive social outlet away from the dangerous culture of the street.

I visited Kiriyat Moshe nearly 20 times. Each week, we slept in the bomb shelter of an abandoned school and ran programs in the bomb shelter next to ours. During our brief forays outside, we found a drab, dark neighbourhood filled with dilapidated buildings falling into disrepair and children on the streets with nowhere to go. Most upsetting, many of the children were losing their rich Ethiopian heritage and instead grasping American rap culture in an attempt to form their own, confused identity.

As the Ethiopian community immigrated to Israel, they were thrust into a new world. Everything from language to buses, basketballs to grocery stores was new. I remember one child telling me that because he had learned Hebrew faster than his family, he became the translator. One day an absorption officer pulled him aside and insisted that he explain to his parents

The party everybody loves to hate

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Politics is not a clean game. When you call someone a politician, you're not paying him a compliment. A Politics, however, is a reality in our imperfect world.

In 1984, many Sephardim realized that their traditional political allegiance to the Likud party was no longer serving them well, and, for that matter, neither was their support for the haredi and Ashkenazi Agudah party. They felt they were being patronized by both and that their interests were not being met. The conclusion that their numbers were being used for the political gains of others spurred them to form Israel's third-largest party, Shas. It would represent them from that point on.

And this it has done. Shas today has its own nationwide school system; it offers social assistance to those in need and at a level not seen before; and it continues to vigorously demand a fair share of the national budget for a sector of Israeli society that, historically, had not been a priority.

For these efforts, it's equally maligned by the haredi Ashkenazi community and the secular Israeli one. The latter perceives Shas as party of political opportunists who would stoop ever so low in order to advance their political agenda. The former resents the party for having usurped its traditional role as the sole champion of religious causes.

It's true that, over the years, Shas has sat in governments that have signed peace treaties and in others that have not. It has remained in coalitions that have been fiscally conservative and in others that have been more liberal. The debacles of the Oslo accords and the Gaza withdrawal were pursued by governments that included Shas, even though Shas was against the pullout. Indeed, today, Shas sits in the governing coalition, despite its "non-negotiable" stance on the division of Jerusalem.

Because of all this, in the eyes of many, Shas is seen as a party that lacks a compass, a party that will bend any which way to advance its own interests.

But one can't blame a person or thing for being exactly what they or it are supposed to be. Shas is, quite evidently, a political party (although, personally, I believe that it's much more than that – it's also a social, religious and economic movement). Undeniably, it's a very successful political force, one to be reckoned with. For better or worse, it's part of a parliamentary system of government that breeds small parties, which in turn necessitate coalitions in order for any sort of government to function.

Politics in general, and coalitions in particular, are rife with backroom deals, crassness, cynics and unsavory alliances. All this is a reality. This is the system, and it's not the fault of any one party. Shas is only playing its role – and playing it very well, thank you very much – on this political playing field.

The only difference is that for Shas, politics is not about power for its own sake. Rather, it's about advancing the interests of a significant segment – indeed, half – of the Israeli population that wasn't being represented before.

Shas' mandate is to remedy this.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency
Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising
reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Yearnings: Embracing the Sacred Messianism of Life by Irwin Kula, Hyperion Press.

Rabbi Irwin Kula, the author of this eloquent and inspirational guide to a fuller and more engaging life, is an eighth-generation rabbi and president of the National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership.

In Yearnings, his aim is to merge ancient wisdom with contemporary insights to show how our yearnings can bring spiritual fulfillment.

The Hebrew word "emet," Rabbi Kula teaches, is composed of the first, middle and last letters of the Hebrew alphabet. This very construction urges us always to seek a wider, more encompassing truth.

He writes that by dozens of measures, life has gotten better for most Americans since the 1950s. We have achieved what our grandparents or great-grandparents could barely dream of, and yet polling data shows that we are no happier than we were back then; 60 per cent of Americans feel less well off than their parents.

"We have greater prosperity and yet the number of people who consider themselves depressed has dramatically increased — some social scientists say by as much as twenty-fold. We suffer what some have called 'abundance denial.'"

Evidently, in our culture, wants get converted so quickly into needs that feeling satisfied becomes incredibly elusive. In other words, the question is not, how can I feel grateful for an olive-size amount of food, but how can I feel satisfied when I can have as many olives as I want? That's the dayenu challenge for most of us."

What about the various forms of ritual that makes up daily living? The author says that he's always amused when he discusses ritual practice and some intellectually sophisticated, highly rational, ethically sensitive person says something like, "This is silly and superfluous. I don't need ritual."

He responds, "What do you eat on Thanksgiving and who carves the turkey? Do you and your lover have a favourite song? Where does the CEO sit in your boardroom? Imagine the graduation with no pomp and circumstance. Imagine the death of a loved one with no funeral rites. Imagine saying to your wife or husband, 'You know I love you. Who needs a ring?' and then dropping the wedding band into the toilet with a shrug. Even the most cynical people usually get the idea."

Rabbi Kula insists that Judaism is first and foremost a system of physical enjoyment that celebrates and enhances the carnal for its own sake. The Talmud, he insists, is clear. If we don't enjoy life's pleasures, we will be disappointing God. "In other words, we'll diminish reality itself."

He suggests that for many married couples sex has become routine and less exciting. "When we think we don't need to seduce our lover, we'll end up seeking seduction outside the relationship," he writes. "When we don't have erotic adventure within our relationships, we'll seek it elsewhere."

"When our illicit fantasies are banished from our own bedroom, when we play it safe at home, we'll look for danger somewhere else. And so sex with someone new and forbidden becomes so appealing. Or if we don't dare do that, there's always the titillation of Desperate Housewives, or pornography."

In making decisions, what is right, proper and ethical? He maintains that wise persons acknowledge that often the certainty for making decisions is doomed to failure.

"Many people to whom I teach the Talmud are struck by the fact that 75 per cent of all the debates and arguments of the sages are left unresolved. No final decision is ever reached. By not providing definitive decisions, the rabbis were teaching us that we ought not to fool ourselves. Not even the most intense debate, investigation or wrestling will allow us to make decisions with anything less than uncertainty and indeterminacy."

I remain unconvinced that Rabbi Kula will enable us to avoid the inevitable messiness that life presents. But his book will serve as a useful and necessary tool.

Although Israel's national anthem is beloved by many, that admiration is not universal. Some people claim that the hymn is old-fashioned and doesn't represent the reality of the ethnic and religious mix of the country today.

Last year, Raleb Majadele, Israel's first Arab cabinet minister created headlines when he said that he does not sing Hatikvah. "I fail to understand how an enlightened, sane Jew allows himself to ask a Muslim person with a different language and culture, to sing an anthem that was written for Jews only." [tinyurl.com/2p4mw6]

Writing in the New York Times, journalist Adam Lebor argued that to gain wider appeal "only a single phrase needs to be changed: 'nefesh Yehudi,' which means a Jewish soul, should be replaced with 'nefesh Israeli,' an Israeli soul." Lebor admits that that change won't automatically instill a love of the anthem among Israel's minorities — he doesn't suggest altering lyrics that talk about longing for Zion — but the change "would send a clear message: here we are, Israelis — Jewish, Christian, Muslim, African, Russian and more — in the heart of the Middle East. And we are here to stay." [tinyurl.com/3ypm5]

Don't go tampering with those lyrics says Gadi BenMark. Writing in Haaretz, he said that Israel should follow Canada's lead whose anthem has two sets of very different lyrics in both of the country's official languages, English and French. "Just as all Canadians share the music of O Canada, all Israelis can share the music of Hatikvah. The music is the bridge that unites... The mission would be to put together text to which any Israeli citizen who speaks Arabic can relate... It can be called Al Amal, the hope, thus carrying the same meaning as Hatikvah, yet this hope needs to be 'universal Israeli.'"

[tinyurl.com/2bhvkj2]
Amir Benayoun didn't change the words. He just sang them with a subtle, smoldering anger. This year, the Israeli singer set the lyrics to the melody of Keli Atah Ve' Odeca, a traditional Chabad tune. He then interspersed the song with radio news reports about childhood poverty in Israel, the kidnapping of Gilad Shalit, the possible division of Jerusalem and more. And he had his "little gift" delivered to the country's cabinet ministers. You can read up on Benayoun's version in the Hebrew article "Abda Tikvatu" (Our hope has been lost) [tinyurl.com/2y4xxz] and then listen to it online. [tinyurl.com/ypz3v]

Not everyone has given up hope. Last year, ynetnews.com (the English online arm of Yedioth Ahronoth) embarked on an interesting project. Titled "There's Hope," the website invited Israeli and Jewish singers and performers from all walks of life and musical genres to put their stamp on Hatikvah, including:

• American Marty Friedman, former lead guitarist of Megadeth [tinyurl.com/2bwq2]

Hatikvah, Part 2

- Teapacks, Israel's representatives at the 2007 Eurovision Song Contest

Try your own variation after you download the sheet music. [tinyurl.com/27mcc4] And for something different, sing the lyrics in French, German, Portuguese, Polish, Malay, Japanese, Hungarian, Spanish, Italian, Esperanto, Ukrainian, Farsi, Chinese or Arabic. [tinyurl.com/yv2jas]

If you'd like to download a wild adaptation and blow out your speakers at the same time, try cranking up this version by Seth Diamond (aka DJ Blood Sacrifice) of the New York metal band Gods of Fire. [tinyurl.com/265f53]

On the other end of the aural spectrum, David Bar-Tzur has created a version to aid interpreters who want to deliver Hatikvah using sign language. [tinyurl.com/2wapacl]

The most famous song to compete with Hatikvah for the hearts of Israelis is Naomi Shemer's Yerushalayim shel Zahav. Shortly after the 1967 Six Day War, Knesset member Uri Avneri tabled a bill to make that song the national anthem. According to the Jerusalem of Gold website, Avneri met with Shemer in a café and attempted to explain to her how important her song had become. Shemer found it amusing. "I like Hatikvah," she said, "and it is not replaceable." The bill never went to committee. [jerusalemofgold.co.il/thesong.html]

Educators discuss challenges of Holocaust education

By LAURA STRICKER

Special to The CJN

Teaching students in multicultural settings about the Holocaust is far from easy, agreed three educators speaking at York University Feb. 10.

David Cesarani, a research professor at the University of London; Jennifer Gerwlvich, dean of English at Father McGivney Catholic Academy in Markham; and Elke Gryglewski, a senior educator at the House of the Wannsee Conference Memorial and Educational Centre in Berlin, each face unique challenges in teaching about this dark period in history.

Cesarani, who discussed his experiences teaching inner-city students in London, England, said many difficulties in teaching about the Holocaust come from what a teacher hopes to achieve through those lessons.

"The challenges in teaching about the Holocaust and how you evaluate the success depends very much on what your goals are," he said.

"Are you teaching the subject because it's an important part of the European historical experience? Are you teaching it to try and encourage notions of good citizenship? Are you using it to counter racism? Are you using it to counter bigotry of all kinds? Are you teaching it because you think teaching about the Holocaust is a way to prevent genocide?"

Achieving or not achieving your goal also depends on who is being taught, Cesarani added.

"The success in achieving these goals depends very much on the kinds of audiences you're addressing, and the kind of obstacles in the way of getting any of those messages across."

Gerwlvich, who spoke about teaching Catholic high school students in Ontario, said that for her, the biggest challenge in teaching about the Holocaust has been the diverse population at Father McGivney Catholic Academy.

Students there come from all over the world, including places such as Israel, Jamaica, and Pakistan, and not all of them are Catholic, she said.

"As the student population at McGivney is diverse, one of the key considerations in creating and delivering Holocaust education programs is that students often bring their own difficult histories to the classroom. Some of these students have come from countries that are experiencing war or civil unrest. Some have been in refugee situations. Many experience family conflict. Many experience personal loss, and many have dealt with violence, both in Canada and abroad," Gerwlvich said.

Gryglewski, who spoke about teaching young Germans who have Palestinian backgrounds, said that one of her main challenges in teaching about the Holocaust is the lack of opportunities available for students without pure German backgrounds.

"We [Germany]... have a very unhelpful school system," she said. "Due to very racist integration policies during the last decade, the majority of school kids with a non-German background are the lowest of the low. Many of them finish school without having a degree."

The educators also spoke about the different methods they use to overcome the challenges they face in teaching about the Holocaust. Cesarani spoke of his experiences teaching students at the City and Islington College in London, the majority of whom were black.

"With black students, one of the greatest challenges was their impatience with the subject... what really concerned [most of] them was transatlantic slavery, and whether or not they had an opportunity to study it. What they thought was that here was a chance to explore the black experience of slavery."

"It caused a degree of frustration," Cesarani said, adding that the students would often ask why he was only discussing Jews as victims, not Jews in their role as slave traders.

Because most of the exposure that students at City and Islington College had to Jewish people was through the media, Cesarani said he spent a lot of his time "unpacking" those myths. "It's difficult, because there is a completely distorted perception of what is happening in the Middle East," he said.

Jennifer Gerwlvich used a different tactic than Cesarani: reaching out to her students through literature.

"In the Grade 9 and 10 course, I try to incorporate Holocaust education into units on poetry, speaking on personal voice," she said.

In the Grade 11 course, Night by Elie Wiesel and Lord of the Flies by William Golding are required readings.

"When we teach Night, students are invited to discuss and analyze passages from the text and how they relate to the central meaning of the course."

The Grade 12 English course has Gerwlvich's students reading the graphic Holocaust novel Maus by Art Spiegelman.

"What I've found is that through story, I'm able to make [the Holocaust] relevant to them," she said.

"Overall I have found that in my experience, students are interested in learning about the Holocaust, regardless of their cultural background, regardless of their religious background... these are the things that stick with them, and for me that confirms what I'm doing through literature is significant."

Gryglewski, meanwhile, uses another method entirely. Since October 2007, she has been working with 16 Berliners with Palestinian backgrounds. They are aged 13 to 17, and most don't have much in the way of formal education.

They learn about the history of National Socialism, their family biographies, and the history of Palestinians. Despite complaints from other teachers about a lack of interest, and anti-Semitic remarks and attitudes they often find from German students with Palestinian backgrounds, Gryglewski said her experience was different.

"[My] general impression was that Muslim youngsters did not refuse to deal with the Shoah," she said, adding that they all chose to participate in the project voluntarily.

Israel's water tech sector seeking new investors

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Israel is on an aggressive mission to peddle its leading-edge water technologies internationally.

Last week, Baruch "Booky" Oren, former chairman of the board of Mekorot, Israel's national water company, spent three days in Toronto courting Canadian investors.

Oren, now president and CEO of the Anson Israel Water Initiative, a private holding company that invests in water equipment and related technologies, addressed some 50 people last Wednesday morning at the downtown offices of the law firm Ogilvy Renault.

The event, titled "Israel's Water Technology: Solutions For a Thirsty Planet" was sponsored by the Government of Israel's economic mission to Canada.

Saying he had "high hopes" for his Canadian visit, Oren launched into highlights of Israel's various accomplishments in the water technology sector over the years, focusing on breakthroughs in desalination, drip irrigation and sewage water reclamation, among others.

Using a slide show, Oren presented statistics and graphics demonstrating how Israel's public and private sectors work together to satisfy the country's water needs and how they're now turning their attention to the global community's demands as well.

"The next challenge, as we see in Israel, is global warming," Oren said. "There's a lot of talk about [using] alternative energy... but there's a significant overlap between water and energy. You use a lot of water [to produce] energy. Water is a $465-billion dollar market."

Oren said it's time for both multinational companies and governments to start looking at water as "an economic resource, not a natural resource."

To that end, he said governments should consider increasing regulations and controls on water in conjunction with stepping up education campaigns about conservation.

"In Israel, everyone knows that every drop counts. I don't see that in Canada," Oren said.

Referring to the increase in production of bio-ethanol – fuel created from corn or other renewable feedstock – Oren said governments and industry in North America are more concerned with the political popularity of moving away from fossil fuels.

The problem, he said, is that it's a "waste," because governments don't consider the cost of the water needed to produce the crops.

He said another misconception by international governments about how best to solve their domestic water problems lies in the idea that merely fixing aging water infrastructure is enough to save them money on water distribution.

"More than 30 per cent of drinking water is lost on its way to the tap," Oren said.

"Urban population growth hasn't been matched by expanding water infrastructure by governments. And there will be a 40 per cent increase in [urban] water consumption by 2025."

Oren said his company and the government of Israel are now positioning the country to take advantage of this growing need by using the expertise of the Israeli water sector against a backdrop of growing international demand and the perception that Israel is "the Silicon Valley of water technology."

Israel currently has multiple water tech incubators working on creative solutions to the world's water problem.

Jonathan Levy, Israel's consul for economic affairs and its trade commissioner in Toronto, helped promote Oren's event to local media and investors, and he also spoke to the audience.

Levy reminded the audience that for Israel, "water is a national priority," because of the country's location in one of the world's most arid climates. It's therefore been forced to pioneer advances in water technology throughout its existence.

He pitched the Israeli government's NEWTech program (Novel Efficient Water Technologies), launched in 2005 with a three-year mandate to promote the country's water industry to the world.

"We want to double Israeli exports in water tech by 2010," Levy said. "We've seen a 28 per cent growth rate in water tech exports in 2007."

Levy also spoke of Israel's burgeoning partnership with China's water ministry, citing new "framework agreements" with one of the world's fastest-growing economies.

Andrew Taylor, a lawyer at Ogilvy Renault who specializes in environmental issues, was impressed by what he heard.

"Water and energy are co-dependent. Energy is required to supply drinking water, and water is required to generate most of our electricity. Because fresh water is abundant in Ontario, it's easy for us to forget how important this connection is in other parts of the world," Taylor said.

Speaking to The CJN afterward, Oren noted that Canadian investment in Israel's water tech sector was close to $100 million last year.

"Many venture capital investors are coming [to Israel] from Canada... and I'm sure there will be a lot of collaboration between academic institutes as well."

Correction

The Feb. 21 article "Rabbis Lobby Ottawa on Israel Issues" incorrectly stated that the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus represents "the interests of the main Jewish religious streams, from Orthodox to Reconstructionist." In fact, the rabbis in the group do not formally represent their denominations, and there is no formal consultation between the caucus and the various Jewish streams. As well, there was no Reconstructionist rabbi in the group that visited Ottawa this year. The caucus draws its membership and mandate from individual Canadian rabbis of diverse backgrounds and religious philosophies from across Canada, including rabbis affiliated with every movement and region.

Anti-Semitic graffiti discovered at York U

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups and the York University community have united to condemn anti-Semitic graffiti discovered on a desk in the school's main library last week.

The racist comments were found Feb. 27 in Scott Library by a Jewish student who immediately contacted Hillel. The graffiti included an image of a swastika and a number of threats against Jews, including, "Zionist Jews will burn in Hell," "Kill all Zionists," "Hitler had the Right idea," and "I agree. Kill the Jews."

"What was disturbing about the nature of the graffiti was that it looked as if – it's possible that – it was more than one person. It could have been individuals adding to it over time," said Tilly Shames, Hillel of Greater Toronto's associate director.

Hillel@York promptly alerted campus security, requesting an immediate investigation.

York spokesperson Alex Bilyk said Toronto police are on the case.

"As in most cases of graffiti, and especially in 'criminal graffiti,' perpetrators hide behind their anonymity. In fact, we have no way of knowing or even suspecting that this was done by a community member, because as a university, we are a very open place," Bilyk said, adding that the offending materials were immediately removed after police gathered evidence.

"I can't speak to the motivations of someone who would do this. We're concerned about not knowing how long the graffiti would have been on that desk before it was reported," Shames said.

In a statement, B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant suggested the graffiti might have been triggered by recent anti-Israel events on campus.

"This despicable act follows on the heels of Israeli Apartheid Week events held on many Canadian campuses, including York University. Once a university had lent its premises to an event that promotes hate against one segment of its student body, it is predictable that other acts of hate will likely follow," Dimant said.

Canadian Jewish Congress issued a joint statement with Hillel condemning the graffiti and supporting Hillel.

"Sadly, this graffiti clearly shows us that anti-Semitism has not, as some believe, vanished in Canada, particularly on our campuses," said Fredelle Brief, chair of CJC Ontario region's community relations committee.

"We have much work to do to ensure hatred finds no home either on campus or in the larger society. CJC stands with Hillel in these efforts," she added.

Shames said she is pleased with the response from the York Federation of Students (YFS).

"[The student council] took it very seriously and were very concerned when they saw it. They recognized immediately that this was anti-Semitic and hateful and they want to work with us on being more proactive on our anti-racism strategy on campus."

Eva Zucker, president of Hillel@York, plans to work with the YFS, other campus groups and the university to create a more aggressive anti-racism strategy.

She said she hopes that this will "bring forth awareness that this sort of blatant anti-Semitism is not welcome on campus... We are hoping to work with other campus groups to come together and create a unified voice against this sort of blatant racism."

York president and vice-chancellor Mamdouh Shoukri released a statement, signed by a number of campus groups and York administrators, that condemned "these cowardly and hateful acts unreservedly and in the strongest possible terms... The spreading of hate is a callous and cruel act, designed to isolate and frighten. There is no place for this kind of criminal behaviour at York and such individuals are not welcome here. We will give the Toronto Police Service every assistance in bringing the perpetrator(s) to justice."

High-tech CEO has a heart of Gold

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Joshua Gold has just the right mix of non-profit chesed and corporate chutzpah. The 32-year-old Torontonian is CEO of his own dot-com, where he spends his days raising money for charities such as March of Dimes Canada, Ronald McDonald House and Special Olympics.

"Coming out of the corporate side, where it's just about making money, it feels really good sometimes," he says.

His company, Auctionwire (www.auctionwire.com), co-ordinates high-profile fundraising auctions, matching corporations and donors with eager bidders around the world - creating online alchemy for wonderful causes. Prizes include face-to-face meetings with celebrities, such as the production staff of The Simpsons, and Benito Mussolini's 1939 Lancia Astura (to benefit Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children).

It's comforting that a small business - Auctionwire has only 13 employees in Toronto and one in Los Angeles - can still succeed online. And thanks to Gold's vision, Dell Computers recently awarded Auctionwire a Small Business Excellence Award for its "energy, focus and drive." The prize came with $25,000 in technology and an in-person meeting with CEO Michael Dell and other top executives.

For Gold, the Dell award offers another reason to dream big.

Auctionwire is already playing in the big leagues, last fall hosting what Gold calls "literally the largest online auction ever in eBay history," auctioning seats on the historic first flight of Singapore Airlines' luxurious Airbus A380. The more than $1.3 million (Cdn) raised will support causes such as Doctors Without Borders.

Although he's having fun and doing good, Gold doesn't hide the fact that "at the end of the day, you've made money off it." But at least his business is about more than just the bottom line.

Perhaps that's not surprising given his unusual background: after attending the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and York Mills Collegiate, with aspirations towards social work, Gold graduated from York University with a BA in sociology.

From there, he went to the Wharton School at the University of Pennsylvania, earning a degree in business and psychiatric social work.

"I want to go into the health care field," Gold says. However, on returning to Canada, he found few opportunities in social work, mostly dead-end casework jobs. Gold ended up doing what many new graduates are forced to do: "looking for something that could kind of tie into what I'd studied."

That brought him to Ward Associates, a high-tech staffing firm, where he began in recruitment and quickly branched out into marketing. Later, he moved on to Christian & Timbers, the world's largest technology-based executive search firm, which at the time was expanding into Canada. After two years, Gold decided "it was my time to jump out and start my own thing... and here I am."

Now, with a new website, The Giving Room (www.givingroom.com), ready to launch early this year, Gold is busier than ever.

Gold calls the new site a "portal for individuals who want to give back to community organizations," offering an element of fun to add appeal. "We're making charity cool... selling once-in-a-lifetime experiences, celebrity auction items."

He says The Giving Room is "Auctionwire's way to give back," pulling together sponsors and charitable partners and the public - ordinary individuals who want to support their community...

"That's part of being Jewish, to always give back." Locally, Gold has volunteered as a Big Brother with Jewish Family & Child, the Community Association for Riding for the Disabled and Sunnybrook Hospital. In Pennsylvania, he helped underprivileged kids and volunteered in a hospital emergency room.

Although many of his clients are high-profile national charities, he enjoys even more helping local organizations such as Baycrest.

Despite recently ranking in Profit magazine's "Hot Fifty," Auctionwire's offices are surprisingly found far north of downtown's corporate glitz, on the third floor of a humble Bathurst Street office building better known for housing the Toronto Cheder, an Orthodox boys' school.

A member of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Gold feels inspired to be part of Toronto's Jewish community where he's "surrounded by so many successful individuals who always do give back."

B'nai Brith members expelled

Internal critics of BBC said its leadership has not complied with corporate rules and the organization's own by-laws that require disclosure of audited financial statements prior to annual general meetings. They said the organization is overly centralized and secretive, and that a new constitution was declared passed even though a majority of members voted against it at an annual general meeting.

Senior B'nai Brith spokesperson Frank Dimant has responded to those allegations by saying that BBC followed proper governance procedures and that B'nai Brith International's court of appeal ruled the constitution was properly enacted.

Lawyer pleads guilty to child porn charge

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — Lawyer Gary Dolovich has pleaded guilty in provincial court here to possessing and distributing child pornography.

When arrested in July 2006, Dolovich was charged with 17 counts of distributing child pornography over the Internet. The charges related to the distribution of hundreds of images.

He pleaded guilty to one count encompassing offences that occurred between February and October of 2005. He will be sentenced this spring and could face a jail term.

Dolovich's lawyer, Josh Weinstein, said that in the upcoming sentencing hearing, he will be "asking the court that [Dolovich] not go to jail."

Weinstein is awaiting a report from a forensic psychologist that he said will consider whether his client is a risk to the community and detail steps that Dolovich, who did not profit monetarily from distributing the child porn images, has taken toward rehabilitation.

Born and raised in Winnipeg, Dolovich, an outwardly observant Jew, was called to the Manitoba bar in 1991 and immigrated to Israel in 1998. In Israel, he worked as a lawyer and lived in the small settlement of Talmon in the West Bank, about 18 kilometres east of Modin.

In 2001 Dolovich left Israel and returned to live in Winnipeg, where he worked as the executive director of a local kashrut organization.

When he was arrested, Dolovich was working as a legal researcher for the Manitoba Court of Appeal, where he had also worked prior to making aliyah.

Winnipeg Police began to investigate him after receiving a tip from a national police body that deals with child exploitation.

The extensive police investigation led to the search and seizure of several computers and hardware, including ones used by the province's highest court.

Dolovich was arrested at Pearson International Airport in Toronto after police had issued a Canada-wide warrant for him.

He is divorced from his second wife and is the father of two children, who at the time of his arrest were aged seven and one. His second ex-wife and two children returned to live in Israel in 2007.

Det.-Sgt. Richard Lemire of the Manitoba Integrated Child Exploitation Unit said that his unit "will often be asked [by the Crown] to do a presentation to the judge at the sentencing hearing and will show the judge a representative sampling of the child pornography images found. This [part of the hearing] will be closed to the public."

He added: "These types of charges using the Internet have become very pervasive. It is a worldwide problem. It knows no demographics."

Vancouver library draws fire for controversial speaker

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The C/JN

VANCOUVER — When the Vancouver Public Library agreed to host controversial author Greg Felton as a speaker during national Freedom to Read week last month, city librarian Paul Whitney says he had no idea the decision would generate such opposition and outrage.

Felton, a Vancouver-based journalist and teacher whose writings on Israel have been criticized as anti-Semitic, is the author of The Host and the Parasite: How Israel's Fifth Column Consumed America, published last May by Dandelion Books in Phoenix, Ariz.

His Feb. 25 talk drew some 90 people, many of whom were very engaged and vocal during his presentation.

"There's been a fair amount of correspondence, mostly but not exclusively from the Jewish community," Whitney told The C/JN. "I have found this whole issue very distressing, because I found myself in arguments with people for whom I have great respect."

Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC), had urged community members to call the library and contact Whitney to express their disappointment at Felton's appearance.

The thesis of Felton's book is that a Zionist "junta" operated on Sept. 11, 2001, and that Zionists collaborated with the Nazis to exterminate the Jews.

The 50-year-old writer said he became interested in Israeli-Palestinian politics after the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995.

"I made the observation then that Israel can choose to be a Jewish state or a democracy, but it can't be both," he told The C/JN in a phone interview on the day of his talk. "I feel that much of what we know about Israel and Palestine is blatantly false."

"For example, I researched Israel's creation and found out that it was not created legally. A number of things brought me to realize that a massive war crime was perpetrated against the Palestinians by the Jewish immigrants after World War II, and I became quite upset by this. I got a lot of hate mail for stating what I thought was simply an obvious truth. But I felt it was my job to write about it."

Felton twice approached the Vancouver Public Library (VPL) about an opportunity to speak about his book.

"The first time, last June, the librarian [he spoke to] said she was not interested. When he returned in the fall, she looked at his book again and thought she could fit it under the auspices of Freedom to Read week," said Jean Kavanagh, marketing and communications manager for the VPL.

The library's decision to give Felton a platform outraged many members of Vancouver's Jewish community and the community at large.

"What do you call it when the Vancouver Public Library decides to present Felton, an apologist for the book-banning, journalist-jailing Iranian theocracy, as the featured author on the evening of Feb. 25, and as the library's contribution to national Freedom to Read Week?" Terry Glavin wrote Feb. 12 in the Vancouver Sun.

"In Felton's words, Hamas is not an Islamist death cult animated by that classic anti-Semitic forgery, the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. It's the equivalent of the French resistance during the Second World War, the 'passionate defender of Palestinians,'" Glavin wrote.

"There are no suicide bombings in Felton's lexicon. There are only 'sacrifice bombings. Israel itself is a creation of the Nazis. It's the Zionist Reich.'"

CJC worked with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and the Canada-Israel Committee to develop a response to Felton that it characterized in a letter to the Jewish community as "quiet but effective advocacy."

In a meeting with the VPL, Congress requested that the library condemn Felton's book and admit that it made an error in inviting him to speak. The library declined to cancel the event.

"We felt it would be a lose-lose situation to cancel the talk," Whitney said. "We believe very strongly in the principle of freedom of expression, and because Freedom to Read is so fundamental to the library, we felt we needed to adhere to this principle, distasteful as we do find some of Felton's arguments."

"I feel the best anecdote to hate literature is exposure, getting stuff out," Whitney continued, adding that the library ordered two copies of Felton's book.

Though some members of the community called for a public protest at his talk, Congress opted against this strategy.

"Public protest will only provide him with more legitimacy and a larger platform from which to spread his message," CJC wrote in its letter to the community. "There is no advantage to engaging Mr. Felton in a debate, as there is no debating what he has to say. To do so would only legitimize his views and opinions."

Students flock to Holocaust program in Europe

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

More than 60 years after the last Nazi concentration camp was liberated, interest in the Holocaust continues to resonate among young people.

How else to explain the growing desire to visit, first hand, the sites in Germany and Poland where the Nazis planned and executed their fiendish designs?

Organizers of the March of Remembrance and Hope (MRH) were surprised by the large numbers of university students who applied to participate in this year's event, a one-week trip that runs from May 16 to 23 and immerses participants in the horrors of the Holocaust. A similar program, the March of the Living, is geared toward Jewish high school students.

Though they have budgeted for only 60 participants, MRH organizers received some 150 applications, meaning the majority will be left behind.

That's the unfortunate reality when working with limited means, though the number of students who can be accommodated would increase if "an angel" comes through with funds.

Carla Wittes, director of the Canadian Centre for Diversity, the main sponsor of MRH, held open the possibility of expanding the program to accommodate more than the original 60, but her organization is more concerned about creating a stable and sustainable funding base that will support the MRH for years to come.

As of earlier this month, fundraising efforts to support the 60 were still underway, but Wittes was confident that at least that goal will be achieved.

The 60 students will gather in New York for an orientation session before travelling to Europe. In Germany, they will visit Wannsee, the Berlin suburb where Nazi bureaucrats devised the Final Solution – the systematic murder of European Jews. They will also visit the once-thriving Jewish centres in Warsaw, Krakow and Lublin, as well as the former death camps of Auschwitz-Birkenau and Majdanek, where millions were murdered.

Participants will be accompanied by Holocaust survivors, who will share their experiences.

As the MRH makes clear on its website, "You will feel their pain, be strengthened by their courage and become a witness yourself by experiencing the Holocaust through the stories of these remaining survivors. Throughout your travels in Poland you will be encouraged to freely discuss your feelings and impressions."

Eli Rubenstein, director of education for MRH, said the program has touched many hearts and changed many participants, making them vigorous advocates for tolerance and opponents of anti-Semitism.

"They become transmitters of [survivors'] messages," he said. "These are non-Jewish students who have taken on the burden of remembering what the Holocaust survivors have undergone, experienced and suffered."

"It breaks my heart [that only 60 will go], because these are students expressing sincerity and dedication to learning about the Holocaust," he added.

The students hail from across Canada and come from a number of religious and ethnic communities. Successful applicants must demonstrate leadership qualities, take part in extra-curricular activities and show a desire to spread the lessons they gather in Europe, Wittes said.

Alumni of the 2005 MRH, which embarked on a joint trip with the teen-oriented March of the Living, formed a student group on campus called SHOUT, Students Helping Others Understand Tolerance, she said.

MRH was launched as an international program in 2001, when only 15 Canadians applied, one-tenth the current number. The international program was dropped in 2007, but the Canadian program continued to operate that year with close to 60 students visiting European sites.

"We felt it was way too important to let it lapse," Wittes said. "We've taken it on as our program."

While the international program foundered due to lack of funds, interest outside Canada has continued.

Organizers were contacted by two New York universities – Nazareth College and Hobart and William Smith Colleges – which will join the 60-strong Canadian delegation.

Canadian students are asked to contribute $1,000 each toward the trip. The remainder of the cost is subsidized. The Canadian Centre for Diversity is the main sponsor, while universities provide some financial assistance, as does National Jewish Campus Life.

For more information, Wittes can be reached at 416-597-9693, ext. 25.

Community welcomes federal aid

"A 2004 study produced by Statistics Canada showed that of the 928 hate crime incidents recorded in Canada in 2001-2002, 25 per cent were directed against the Jewish community."

Added CJC co-president Sylvain Abitbol: "We look forward to continuing our partnership with the government on this matter, and to a fuller expansion of the program to ensure that financial resources are sufficient to meet the needs of all communities who require this support."

David Koschitzky, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said, "Our community has for many years shouldered the responsibility of making security preparedness a necessary part of our communal life, so we are grateful for this support."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai B'rith Canada called the announcement "an important step forward in what must be part and parcel of a sustained, long-term effort to provide for the safety and security of all Canadians."

According to Day's office, the program is intended to help "defray the costs of security infrastructure enhancements."

Communities can claim expenses on items such as security assessments, alarm systems, fences, contractor fees, and labour and training costs on new security equipment.

The government has set April 15 as the next application date for funding.

When the pilot program was announced last year, it was not without its detractors.

At the time, the federal Liberals called the Conservative program an "act of political desperation" and a "watered-down version" of a proposed Liberal security plan put forward by Liberal leader Stéphane Dion last March.

Dion's plan, they said, would have committed retroactive funding for organizations who had already paid for increased security measures to protect their communities.

Thornhill Liberal MP Susan Kadis, who chaired a Liberal caucus task force on security funding for communities at risk, told The C/N last year that the Conservative program did not allocate enough funding.

"It's just not enough money... it misses the mark," Kadis said. "We believe it shouldn't be a 'pilot' project, it should just be in place."

Kadis' task force consulted with affected communities and was to have finalized its report in late August of last year with its own recommendations for the funding amounts.

Calls to Kadis were not returned by The C/N's deadline. Bernie Farber, the CJC's chief executive officer, also told The C/N last year that he thought the program should contain funds in the $15- to $20-million range in order for it to be effective, but he credited the Conservatives for making good on the program nonetheless.

"I'm still of the opinion that [security funding] has to be expanded," Farber told The C/N last week. "But my belief is that this is something the government is seriously looking into doing."

הגש הישראלי

אחת לאיזה זמן קורה בישראל גש קטן שמראה לי כמה מיוחד המקום הזה וכמה, למרות הקשיים האיוות החיים המסובכת שם, זה המקום הכי מיוחד בעולם.

רבת דובר על שדרות, על מצבה הענק, על זה שבתל אביב ממשיכים להיות כרגיל בעוד ששם לידים מפתחים מתחבאים מתחת לשולחנות בית הספר. ברור לכל שהפתרון הצבאי מסוכן ביותר ושהכנות רחילי צדל לזעה תעלה במחיר אנשי קשה מאוד.

והנה, כשנרמה ששדרות נגיבת לפניה, קמים עשרת אלפים ישראלים וטוענים מכל רחבי הארץ לשדרות לעשות שם קניות בסוף השבוע הדיעה האתר ריגשה אותי עצמותי המוסר לאצטי לשדרות-אנחנו אתכם ואנחנו באים לעשות אצלכם קניות למרות הקשיים. המסר נחמס-לא תוכלו לו כנור, נפשו חסונה האנחנו נתגבר עליכם כמו שהתגברנו על צאצאי היטל'ר לפנים.

הגש הקדי

ביום חורף קפא. אדינה הפדרציה אדוע תמיכה, ובאמצע השבוע הגיעו מעל לאלפים איש, אשה וילד לכנס הדרות תמיכה בשדרות האדוע שדר ישידות בליון בסודותו ובאשדור, שם ישוב שלוש בברק כמה שאת אורחים ראו את חום התמיכה מפורסנו.

וכשנראה מקלות הנער של שדרות "ח"י-שר איתם הקהל בסודותו, נעזרות דוגל ישראל נשאו באלם. מה לאמר-הרבה עיניים לוחות היו שם בשדרות מסר. הראשון של פרופ. אלן רושביץ, המצפן של עם ישראל, סחפה את הקהל בסערת רגשות-איש איש מדרגו.

ומכל דבריו חרדה והספידה אותי אותה נקודה מעיקר-השרושה סיפלה בסודותו בצי'הרחה היא החריבה ערים שלמות חרונה מאות אורחים חפים האיש לא הצה פה. משיראה דורשים יתו-אדורה מתקפים על ידי טורדוסטים שפועלים בחזות אכלוסיה אורחות-ישראל פוחות להגיב בהרעה אדורים.

אני אכן כבר דור שלם, ולא יכור לי אדוע כל כך מרגש-הרגשות גאווה אפסיות לוחות חלק מקהילה היהודית של טורונטו.

באותו עניין

בשנת 2002 הגיעה לסודות המדעיין הישראלי הדעה שהא'ר' טורדוסט סלחא שחאדה נמצא באזור מגורים. מטוס חל איר הטיל על הבית החדש פצצה במשקל טונה שממנה נרגש שחאדה, אדוע עוד 14 פלשתיאנים.

בעוד חסר תדקים הדיעה עכשו פרקליטות המדינה על הקמת ועדה בדיקות היטל, ואת עקבות לחי קשה של ארגוני אכיות אדור ישראלים. באותו עניין אבר נשביעות האדורים שר המשפטים פרופ. דניאל פרידמן, שמתנגד לצדדי הפרקליטות-וכיות אדור יש לא-לשפועלים ומשפחותיהם, אלא גם לחילי צדל.

אפשר להחמיר לישראל על שגם בזמן מלחמה בדרטולית כזו היא שומרת על צלם אנשי, אבל אפשר גם לטעון שהישראלים נפלו על הראש. אבל שישא בנינו.

ושבו באותו עניין

זה שאמצעי התקשורת חס אטומטאטית נגד ישראל הוא כבר דבר שבשינוי. אז הנה סיפור ששלה לי חברי שמחה:

תיי ישראל נבקר בגן הרוחות של ברונקס. פתאום הוא רואה ילדה קטנה מתקרב ללבוש האדורה ומשישה לו יד. האדורה לופת אותה ולא מגיע לה לחדות הרוח ולעקבות המבקר.

הישראלים נכנסו ללא היסוס ללבוש האדורה, ונתנו לו אגרוף באף, והאדורה הדחמה משמרת את הילדה. כשצאצא הישראלי מהכלוב הוא וזכה להכרעה כללית והשואת רמתו וזהו משה אלו עזבנו שובח במקום האומר לו זה מדרגים מה שעשית, והם אכפת לך שאדור את זה בעינינו שלם.

למחרת מופיעה כחורת ענק בעינינו:

"ישראלי תתקף מתגר מאפרקה וזל את אדורות הנחריים שלו."

New DVD chronicles Jewish life in Hamilton

BY ABIGAIL CUKIER

Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Edie Rochkin remembers helping her mother set the table for Shabbat each Friday night.

"We would never know how many [places] to set. Dad would go to shul and bring people home who had nowhere to go," she says in the DVD, Jewish Hamilton, the Way We Were.

Rochkin is one of about 40 people interviewed for the DVD detailing Jewish life in Hamilton in the first half of the 20th century.

Wendy Schneider and Billy Shaffir have volunteered many hours over the last three years to produce Jewish Hamilton, The Way We Were. [Abigail Cukier photo]

When Wendy Schneider, co-president of the Beth Jacob synagogue and editor of the Hamilton Jewish News, began gathering an oral account of her family's history, she had an idea — why not gather information from many families to paint a picture of Jewish life in the city?

Schneider asked her friend Billy Shaffir, a sociology professor at McMaster University, for his help — and his video recorder.

For about three years, the two have been volunteering their time to visit and interview Jewish seniors in the area.

"Everyone received us so warmly and thought it was a great idea," said Schneider. "It clearly resonates with the people we've met."

"It's important to capture that period of vibrancy. Hamilton was a great place to grow up. If you don't capture that, it's lost."

However, when trying to raise funds for the project, the two were at first greeted with a lukewarm reception. They held a public screening of the demo DVD this fall at Beth Jacob and crossed their fingers.

"We had a way bigger turnout than we expected. About 120 people of all ages came out," Schneider said. "It was an absolutely magical evening. People were talking and laughing. The response was so delightful, the joy and laughter. It was very fulfilling for us."

"Then we knew it was worthwhile. People really connected to this."

Shaffir moved from Montreal to Hamilton in the 1970s and raised his family here, and Schneider grew up in Hamilton, but neither knew very much about the city's Jewish roots.

"It was really an eye-opener to see where they shopped, who they dated and how vibrant it was," Shaffir said. "There were four [synagogues] built by people with no formal education. These institutions were established by people who were workers. It's a tremendous credit to them."

The synagogues were on Hunter, Hess, Ferguson and Cannon streets, and in the DVD, Helen Yellin remembers the beauty of the Cannon Street synagogue.

"It was built of the finest woods. They had three chandeliers in there that were so magnificent. I think they're in some ritzy restaurants in Toronto now."

"The pedlars, the poor people built that shul."

She calls the Ferguson shul, the broigasa shul, the 'angry' shul.

"If somebody couldn't get along with people in their shul, they went there. You get three Jews, you get four shuls," she laughed.

Hamilton's present downtown area, bounded by York Boulevard and Barton, John to Bay streets was the centre of Hamilton's Jewish area with thriving kosher butchers, fruit companies and delicatessens like Boleslawsky's, which Rochkin said became like a club at night. Young people spent countless hours at the Jewish Community Centre, which moved from Vine to John to Delaware, producing plays, doing arts and crafts, exercising and going to dances.

About 2,500 Jews lived in Hamilton at that time. Even though the Jewish population has almost doubled to more than 4,000, the vibrant centre and many businesses are no longer here. The synagogues have moved west from the downtown.

Schneider says while it's a joy for the storytellers to reminisce, it's exciting for the younger generation to get a sense of what the community was like.

She and Shaffir are devoting their time "for the love of it" and have given the uncut interviews to each family to keep.

They are not always happy memories. Some remember when areas of Hamilton had covenants that barred Jews, and there was the teacher who could not advance to principal because he was Jewish. Jews could shop at Eaton's, but not work there.

But Shannon Shapiro has fond memories of being part of the early Hamilton Jewish community.

"It was a wonderful time. We weren't what I'd say, prosperous, but we were happy, very happy."

Those sentiments shine through in Jewish Hamilton, the Way We Were.

The completed DVD will include an interactive table of contents, allowing viewers to click to a specific area, archival photos, interviews and census data.

Schneider and Shaffir have raised about $19,000 so far, with a goal of $30,000 total. All funds raised will go toward production costs. Donors will receive a charitable tax receipt.

New Yiddish festival coming to Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A new Yiddish festival, Mameloshen: A Festival of Yiddish Entertainment and Culture, is coming to Winnipeg this spring.

It is based on Toronto's successful Ashkenaz program, said Laurie Mainster, spokesperson for the I.L. Peretz Folk School Endowment Trust, which is co-sponsoring the program with the Rady Jewish Community Centre.

The trust fund was created from the money earned from the sale of the last I.L. Peretz Folk School building. The longtime north Winnipeg Yiddish language school merged with the Talmud Torah Hebrew language school in the early 1980s.

The Talmud Torah — I.L. Peretz School was closed in 1997 and all students transferred to the new Gray Academy in the Asper Jewish Community Campus in south Winnipeg.

"This festival will be an opportunity for audiences to celebrate the richness and beauty of Yiddish while enjoying high calibre events featuring both local and out-of-town performers," Mainster said.

Since 1994, he said, the Peretz School Trust has funded many community initiatives aimed at perpetuating Yiddish language and culture. "For the past five years we have been working with the Rady JCC to put in Yiddish programs," he said. "They have all been single shows or Yiddish films."

This year, said Tamar Barr, the Rady JCC's program director, "we decided to try something new. We will be having one program a week — starting on Tuesday, May 13 — for four weeks, featuring performers who have never appeared here before."

First up are the Sisters of Sheynville from Toronto, an all-female swing-klezmer sextet composed of singer/composer/bandleader Lenka Lichtenberg, creative director/fiddler/singer/songwriter Isabel Frysberg, pianist Fern Lindzon, string bass player Rachel Melas, clarinet player Kinneret Sagee and drummer Lorie Wolf.

On May 20, novelist and playwright Michael Wex is coming to town.

On May 27, Neshomah, Winnipeg's new Yiddish choir, under the direction of Richard Yaffe, will be making its debut.

Finally, on June 5, Mameloshen will be presenting The Three Jewish Divas. While Theresa Tova and Joanne Borts have appeared here before, this is the first appearance by Adrienne Cooper and the first time the three will be appearing here together.

"We hope that our programs will appeal to people of all ages," Barr said. "We are excited about this. There has been a lot of buzz in the community. We have had a lot of phone calls already from people wanting to buy tickets or find out how to get involved.

"If we get a good response, we would consider making Mameloshen an annual event."

Mainster said that any profits made from the festival will be directed mainly to the Yiddish language program at the University of Manitoba. Some of the money would also go toward supporting other Rady JCC cultural programs.

Interfaith festival aims to promote peaceful coexistence

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Planning has begun for the first-ever interfaith festival in Manitoba, an idea conceived by Perry Kimelman.

Kimelman, who is Jewish, proposed that during a weekend festival, synagogues, mosques, churches and temples would be opened, and people would be invited to come in and learn about each other's faiths, in a celebration of peaceful coexistence.

"The festival will allow those who identify themselves strongly with their faith traditions an opportunity to share this aspect of their lives with those that would like to learn and experience another's faith traditions in an open-house environment," Kimelman says.

"This celebration will invite open dialogue, which is not customarily available during traditional faith services."

About a year ago, Kimelman, who is a dentist, presented his idea to the Manitoba Interfaith Council, which responded favourably. He then put together an advisory committee.

"We have a really good quality steering committee made up of people from different faiths," he says. "I believe they have the stature and connections necessary to make this vision a reality."

Asad Khan, a retired internal medicine specialist who represents the Muslim community on the Interfaith Council, has joined the steering committee. Khan, who was born in India, was honoured last year by the Canadian Centre for Ecumenism for his interfaith work. He is now chair of the Islamic Education Foundation of Manitoba, which promotes higher education for Muslim women by granting university scholarships.

"During the festival, the Grand Mosque, which I attend, would be opened, and people could visit at the time of prayer, and then dialogue with Imam Shykh Hosni Azzabi... [who] originates from North Africa and has a degree in education," Khan says.

Joyce Milgard, the mother of David Milgard, spent decades fighting for her son's release from jail following his wrongful conviction for murder. She has volunteered to be on the festival's steering committee. Other members include Rabbi Alan Green of Shaarey Zedek Synagogue; James Christie, dean of the faculty of theology at the University of Winnipeg; and Karen Toole, provincial co-ordinator of spiritual care for Manitoba Health.

Toole, a Christian involved with the United Church, has "shared an interfaith round table with Dr. Khan... I think there is a will among people right now not just to know our neighbour, but to celebrate our diversity. We're living in a time where the world has come to each other's doorsteps and we can celebrate the fact that we can walk through each other's doors."

She believes the festival will draw large numbers. "Already in Winnipeg there is an interfaith series where people can sign up to visit a religious site — a church, synagogue, mosque or other sanctuary. The series is drawing about 200 people per visit. Fifteen years ago, this series would have drawn only 15 people."

"Besides peaceful coexistence, it is my hope that this festival will explore the power of forgiveness as a meaningful step on the road to peace," Kimelman says.

"It's my hope that the festival can serve as an exportable model of interfaith cooperation for other cities," he adds.

Financing would come from groups who want to participate in the festival, Toole says.

"If the vision is good, the money will come," Kimelman adds. "Right now, the committee is focusing on choosing a suitable date for the festival, which we anticipate will run annually."

Abe and Betty Corrin

Winnipeg couple enjoys 70 years of wedded bliss

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — At age 94, Abe Corrin can still thread a needle and ride a bicycle. His 92-year-old wife, Betty, still drives a car.

On Feb. 27, the Winnipeg couple celebrated their 70th wedding anniversary with family and friends at a party at the Gwen Senter Creative Living Centre.

In an interview at their north Winnipeg apartment, Betty Corrin was happy to bring out letters of congratulations from the Governor General and the Queen, the prime minister, the lieutenant-governor of Manitoba, the provincial minister responsible for seniors issues and Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz.

"I married the girl next door," Abe Corrin says.

The couple grew up kitty-corner to each other in the north end of Winnipeg and met in 1936 through mutual friends.

Gertrude (Betty) Barlin's parents, Samuel Israel and Freda Barlin, were married in London, England, before settling in Winnipeg. Betty grew up in a family of four brothers and three sisters. Only she and one brother, who lives in Toronto, are still alive.

Abe Corrin is the oldest of six brothers and a sister — born to Samuel and Leah Corrin. All the siblings are still alive.

Shortly after the couple's only child, Doreen, was born in 1942, Abe shipped out with the Canadian armed forces. He served three years in Newfoundland and on patrol dodging U-boats in the North Atlantic.

Abe is a tailor by trade. For 30 years, he worked with his father in Corrin and Sons Cloak Manufacturing.

"My father was a tailor," he recalls. "He taught all of us boys to sew, and we all worked in the factory. At one point, we employed about 100 people."

During the war, he says, Corrin and Sons did a lot of work for the military.

After the war, the company sent a lot of coats to Poland and Russia on behalf of UNICEF.

Abe also worked for several other Winnipeg garment manufacturers, and he spent many years working out of his home on contract. He says he had three sewing machines in his basement.

At 94, he is still working part time as a tailor replacing zippers and repairing linings for private customers. He also creates his own designs. He sews parts of old ties onto his shirts.

Betty worked for 25 years in accounting for three different companies.

The couple lived in their own house until 2004, when they moved into their two-bedroom apartment.

One of the highlights of their week is Wednesdays at the Gwen Senter Creative Living Centre. "We enjoy the lunch, the bingo, and I especially love the dances at Gwen Senter," Abe says.

Until recently, they travelled widely, with many trips to Hawaii, Palm Springs, Calif., and Florida.

"We used to have a wonderful group of friends we travelled with," Betty said. "We were like a family."

Abe added that "we have lived life to the fullest. We have always enjoyed ourselves."

As well as their daughter, Doreen, and her husband, Abe and Betty have three grandchildren and one great-grandson, who was recently bar-mitzvahed.

Sderot vigil participants back Israeli government

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Participants in a downtown vigil held in the wake of the death of a Sderot man, pledged full support for the Israeli government in its response to the stepped-up rocket fire from Gazan Palestinians on the western Negev border town.

About 30 people gathered at the windswept corner of René Lévesque Boulevard and Peel Street, outside the office building that houses the Israeli consulate. They heeded a call for a spontaneous show of solidarity made a couple of hours earlier by rabbis Reuben Poupko and Chaim Steinmetz. "The Montreal Jewish community stands four-square with the government of Israel in whatever it decides to do," said Rabbi Poupko, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron.

The group was joined by Israeli Consul General Yoram Elron.

That day, Roni Yechiah, 47, a father of four, was killed by a Qassam missile that hit Sapir College, near Sderot, where he was a student. Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack.

Elron noted that Yechiah had undergone a successful kidney transplant a few years ago, and that his eldest son had recently begun his military service.

Those gathered also hoped to draw public attention to the plight of the residents of Sderot who they say have been terrorized by some 8,000 rocket attacks over the past seven years, more than 500 in 2008 alone.

Elron mentioned that some Quebecers have been critical of Israel's actions to defend itself. Nevertheless, he said Israel will "react strongly and forcefully, and Israelis will not be deterred from their daily lives [because of the attacks]."

"We have this stamina and courage, to a great extent, thanks to the support of people like you."

Rabbi Poupko said Israel should not be criticized for any disproportional response, as it has been in the past.

"For Israel to respond proportionally it would have to target civilians, and it would never do that."

He also noted that "some people have questioned why we should have a vigil like this. It is because it is the ethical and right thing to do. It's a simple statement that as Jews we feel the pain of the loss of every Israeli life."

Rabbi Steinmetz, spiritual leader of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem, added: "We are here because it is our responsibility to show support for the State of Israel in its time of need. We are brothers and sisters of the citizens of Israel... We have an obligation to mourn."

The inhabitants of the Sderot area are being attacked "for the simple crime of walking in the land of Israel as a Jew."

The group concluded by singing the Israeli national anthem Hatikvah.

The Montreal Solidarity Committee has been established, under the chairmanship of Dr. Lawrence Rosenberg, and Alice Lehrer who was present at the vigil. She said the goal is to raise awareness within the Jewish community and show solidarity with the people of Sderot by raising funds and sending missions to the town. Money collected will be sent to Israel through the Mizrahi organization.

Hillel, the Jewish students association, will hold an event called My Heart is with Sderot from March 10 to 13 at McGill University, Concordia University, the Université de Montréal and Dawson College. The guest speaker is Noam Bedein, founder of the Sderot Media Centre, which manages a website.

Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, the opposition human rights critic, sent a message to the vigil extending his support for Israel's right to defend and protect its citizens without the condemnation of the international community.

"The tragedy is not only the continued assaults and relentless casualties — of which this tragic death is but the latest — but the international diffidence and indifference to the suffering of Sderot and the neighbouring areas all these years..."

"No country — and no people — should have to endure such a relentless assault, and then endure the ignominy of having its exercise of self-defence relentlessly condemned. Enough is enough."

Irwin Cotler

Canadian students added to StandWithUs team

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In an effort to establish a stronger presence at universities in this country, StandWithUs, a non-profit Israeli education organization, selected three Canadian students to be Emerson fellows who promote Israel on their campuses.

Dario David Hunter

The University of Windsor's Dario David Hunter, the University of Victoria's Andrea Sorin and McGill University's Shoshana Aronowitz are three of 40 students across North America who have been working this year to improve Israel's image on campus and to educate their campus communities about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

As StandWithUs Emerson fellows, Hunter, Sorin and Aronowitz plan events and campaigns, and host speakers on campus. They also work to build networks and relationships with Jewish campus groups, as well as members of their campus' administration and media.

StandWithUs — founded in 2001 and based in Los Angeles with offices in cities including New York, Detroit, and San Francisco — offers website resources and materials to help students fight anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism on campus.

"In any given community there may be misinformation, there may be an anti-Israel presence on campus and our role is to make sure that people are aware of what is actually going on in Israel and why we should be proud of Israel's achievements," said Hunter, a third-year law student in Windsor's joint U.S.-Canada law program.

McMaster rejects 'Israeli apartheid' banner

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

McMaster University's decision to back a student council ban on posters and banners containing the term "Israeli apartheid" has drawn praise from Jewish students and cries of censorship from anti-Israel groups.

Last month, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), a student group, approached the McMaster Student Union (MSU), the school's undergraduate student council, for permission to print and hang a banner in the university's student centre to promote Israeli Apartheid Week, a series of lectures and events that's held on more than 20 campuses.

The proposed banner used the slogan "Israeli apartheid" and depicted a "soldier-like figure pushing a small child," the MSU said in a Feb. 20 statement.

The MSU, which vets and produces all posters by groups affiliated with it, said it denied the group's request to produce the banner, because the sign was "testing the boundaries of freedom of speech for one party, verses use of offensive and inflammatory language as interpreted by another."

The council added that the poster violated its printing policies concerning violence, and it raised questions about the propriety of using "Israeli apartheid" as a slogan on campus.

The MSU sought the arbitration skills of McMaster's Human Rights and Equity Services (HRES) office, which also deemed the poster to be inflammatory.

MSU president Ryan Moran said the groups advertising Israeli Apartheid Week were asked to "revisit the phrasing and language used on their poster to ensure that comfort and safety for all students of the university is kept a priority."

He added that the poster would not be approved unless it promoted a constructive and positive dialogue.

McMaster spokesperson Andrea Farquhar confirmed that the request to hang a large banner in the student centre was denied by the MSU, the HRES and McMaster's provost.

"Putting that banner there was not something that we felt was going to be helpful to the community, and it would be too inflammatory. That wasn't allowed, but [the organizers of Israeli Apartheid Week] did continue with other activities they had planned," Farquhar said.

The MSU noted that student groups, including McMaster Muslims for Peace and Justice (MMPJ) and SPHR, were not prevented from holding their events, nor were they prohibited from using the slogan in their talks and discussions.

But United for Student Rights (U4SR), an ad-hoc committee of McMaster and Hamilton community members that was formed to respond to the controversy, claimed that "MSU-approved clubs have not been able to get approval for various initiatives related to Israeli apartheid."

According to a U4SR press release advertising a public forum scheduled for last week to discuss "the recent shocking decision" to "unequivocally ban on campus the usage of the phrase 'Israeli apartheid,'" the move is an attempt to "criminalize the views of students who oppose Zionist violations of the human and national rights of Palestinians."

But McMaster provost Ilene Busch-Vishniac said that the school "has not and will not abridge freedom of speech. I believe one of our student groups has misinterpreted our refusal to hang a large banner in a very public place. We have not banned the use of the phrase 'Israeli apartheid' and have informed the relevant student group claiming that we have that they are not correct."

Judy Schwartz, director of the McMaster Jewish Students Association (JSA), said she's pleased the administration adhered to the university's student code of conduct, which she said aims to protect students.

"We believe that inflammatory language only serves to promote a toxic and hurtful environment on campus. It does not promote civil discourse. We also believe that there are many ways to bring this type of discussion to campus that promotes balance and room for discussion on both sides of the issue – not one that is a completely biased and one-sided and leaves no room for debate," Schwartz said.

"I can tell you that the Jewish students from the JSA that I have been able to speak to are very pleased and feel extremely comforted by the stand that the university has taken to protect all students from the pain of intimidation. Nothing is more important than the dignity and integrity of the student body, and the students should be proud that the university has taken a principled stand to defend its own code of conduct."

Farquhar acknowledged the challenge that universities have when it comes to controversial issues.

"Universities are always perceived to be in a difficult situation on these kind of issues because we firmly maintain that there's freedom of speech and academic freedom... but we need to balance it with respect and tolerance," she said.

Helps promote Israel's side of the story

As a 21-year-old, fourth-year history and political science student, Sorin sees the Emerson fellowship as a way to be involved with Israel advocacy with an organization that is well known.

"For me, it's a passion. Anything that I do, I try to promote Israel's side of the story and just make sure that people know what's going on," said Sorin, who was inspired to promote a positive and accurate image of Israel after she spent a year studying at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Hunter, who is the Israel affairs chair for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students and president of the Windsor Jewish Student Association, said that until now, StandWithUs hasn't had a strong presence in Canada, but now, having added three Canadians to its roster of 40 fellows, it's committed to tackling anti-Israel sentiment on Canadian soil.

"It is an interesting choice to do it in Windsor, because it has a particularly small Jewish community. But we have experienced some anti-Israel activity."

He said that someone in the community erected a billboard in the summer of 2006, during the Second Lebanon War, that supported various Hezbollah leaders, including Hassan Nasrallah.

"It is something that really shocked the community, in and out of the Jewish community. I don't think a lot of people realized that this sentiment existed and that people would be brazen enough to express that kind of sentiment publicly."

Hunter said that although his campus didn't host an "Israeli Apartheid Week" – a series of events and lectures held at more than 20 campuses and organized by student groups such as Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights – his biggest challenge is dealing with apathy.

"Students are not interested in discussion – or dealing with the issues in Israel. Even amongst the Jewish community, they don't want to open that box, they don't want to go there. That's what we're dealing with on my campus," he added.

Sorin, who is president of UVic's Israel On Campus club, a new group she helped form in order to combat anti-Israel sentiments and to promote Israel beyond the conflict, is dedicated to her role as a StandWithUs representative.

"A lot of people are apathetic to what's going on, and just to see the news and media is so biased and one-sided, and especially at UVic, there are so many students who just have no idea what's going on, so that's where I find my role is – to just educate, educate, educate."

Shul's healing service offers spiritual tonic

By BENJAMIN GLEISSER
Special to The CJN

No one who is ill should have to pray alone for his or her health, says Dalya Hakimi, co-chair of the chesed committee at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where a new prayer service aims to make sure that doesn't happen.

Hakimi, who believes in the healing power of prayer, says that when you pray for the health of others, you strengthen your own well-being.

"Illness can be so traumatic for people and their family members," she says. "We want to create a compassionate place where people can come together, connect with each other and help each other feel better."

To realize this goal, on the afternoon of Feb. 24, Shaarei Shomayim held its first Jewish healing service, which was open to both members and people who don't belong to Shaarei Shomayim.

The Sunday-afternoon service was unlike a traditional prayer service, Hakimi says.

Rabbi Avraham Sultan, the shul's cantor, led worshippers in prayer, and music and song were also part of the observance.

During the Amidah, people were encouraged to meditate on their health, the health of their loved ones and anyone else they wanted to include in their prayers.

"People sit in a circle so they can make eye contact with each other," Hakimi says. "This helps everyone feel more connected. We don't want this to come off as hokey or New Agey. The service is conducted under halachah - we don't do anything too wacky. We just want to go a little out of the box and make people feel welcome and comforted."

Hakimi likens the service to a meeting of a support group. "The healing service helps people connect socially, too. Sometimes it's good just to shake another person's hand, or put an arm around someone and say, 'I hope your loved one will get well.'"

If people also wanted to attend a more traditional Minchah service, the shul's regular one started after the healing service.

Rabbi Sultan hopes the healing service will become a monthly fixture. The rabbi pushed to offer such an event because years ago, when he served as a chaplain at several Montreal hospitals, he saw that healing services were appreciated by patients who were too ill to leave the hospital to attend regular services.

They were also popular among patients who didn't belong to a synagogue, but wanted to stay connected with Judaism. Patients' family members often made special trips to the hospital to attend these services with their loved ones.

"People in hospitals going through difficult moments enjoyed praying not only for themselves, but for each other. After all, when we pray for the health of others, that makes us stronger," Rabbi Sultan says. "During our healing service, we join with all Israel and ask for a speedy recovery for everyone - even people whose names we don't know."

Hakimi also cites research that shows prayer not only makes people feel more optimistic, it also helps to boost the body's immune system.

"Prayer opens the heart and nourishes the soul," she says. "I don't know if this service will make people physically better, but it will definitely make them feel spiritually better."

Bracelet sales raise $25,000 for brain cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

To nine-year-old Sydney Turack and her seven-year-old sister, Samantha (Sammy), their father Fred was "the best dad in the world... very funny, caring and loving."

"He made me feel happy," Sammy said. Quite a tribute to a very special dad. And so when Fred Turack, 57, a chartered accountant and avid golfer who was always healthy, was diagnosed with frontal lobe brain cancer, the girls wanted to help find a cure and help others like him by fundraising.

With some input from their mother, Robin Turack, they decided to make bracelets to sell at their school, Crestwood School in Toronto.

Turack said her daughters had done some beading as a craft before, but this was a much bigger project. They got some help from a wholesaler, John Bead, who helped her choose supplies.

Sydney and Sammy selected a bracelet design with a blue centre stone (their father's favourite colour) and a heart on each side, representing them. The band is made of tiny silver-coloured tubes separated by small blue beads, with the beads standing for their mother. The bracelets, which sell for $10, come in child and adult sizes.

The Blue Brain Bracelet Project has so far raised $25,000 for the Gerry and Nancy Pencer Brain Institute at Princess Margaret Hospital, where Fred Turack was first treated.

Robin Turack and her daughters thought that the project would remain small, but it took off when friends and family came to their home for bead-a-thons, and then even went on to hold their own beading sessions.

Sydney and Sammy's older half-brother, Matthew, got involved in the effort, too, and is now helping them create a website.

Unfortunately, Fred Turack died last December. But the project has carried on.

Several schools are holding bead-a-thons, including Valley Park Middle School. Teacher Florence Fajman was the first teacher to get on board, and her class made 600 bracelets. Crestwood School has sold some 250, Robin Turack reported. Grade 7 Leo Baeck Day School student Tiphara Ziner-Cohen plans to take the project to her school.

Participants receive a certificate of appreciation from the Pencer Institute and the Blue Brain Bracelet Project, signed by Sydney, Samantha and Nancy Pencer.

"We hope to make beading for brain cancer as big as the walk for a cure for breast cancer," Turack said.

Kits to make 100 bracelets will be available, so that patients and families can have "the same opportunity to bead in honour of a loved one," she said.

Sydney said that "the blue brain bracelet is so meaningful to us because it's the last great thing we did for our dad. If we could get this all over Ontario, it would make our dad so proud."

Samantha added that "this bracelet is important because it is helping people with brain cancer and their families."

The family hopes to set up the Fred Turack Palliative Support Unit to assist brain cancer patients and their families in the final stages of life.

For more information, visit the Gerry and Nancy Pencer Brain Institute website, www.pencerbraintrust.com, which has a link for the bracelet. The Blue Brain Bracelet Project website, at www.bluebrainbracelet.com, is currently under construction.

Q. I would like to try to understand the amount of sugar in foods. How do I decipher the labels?

A. There are two things you want to look at – how much sugar is there, and what is the serving size? This may astonish you, but about four grams of sugar are equal to one teaspoon. Therefore, if the package says there are 20 grams of sugar per serving, that's five teaspoons of sugar. Also, remember to consider how realistic the serving size is. Will you only have one serving, or is it likely you will have more? For example, one cup of grape juice contains about 40 grams of sugar – that's 10 teaspoons, and many people pour a glass that is actually much bigger than one cup.

Remember, too, when it comes to high calorie drinks full of sugar, like juice and pop, it is so easy to drink 200 to 500 calories per day or more, that one cup of grape juice contains 180 calories, one can of pop about 160. If you were to substitute these beverages with water, you could lose one-half to one pound per week doing that alone! We need to reduce our total calories by 250 per day to lose half a pound per week, and by 500 calories per day to lose one pound per week.

The way I decide if there is too much sugar is to ask: would I add that amount of sugar to this food if I was making it?

I recently wanted to buy a refrigerated green tea beverage, and I noticed that it contained 20 grams of sugar. First, I never add sugar to my green tea, but if I did, I certainly wouldn't add five teaspoons. So I bought sparkling water instead.

If you are, however, looking at a dessert or a jam, higher sugar content may be more reasonable, but by knowing the above information, you will be surprised now at how much sugar is in some packaged and processed foods. Also, when reading the ingredient list, usually words ending with "ose" are sugars – for example, sucrose, fructose, lactose and maltose.

Q. I would like to take a calcium supplement. Is there one that you feel I should buy?

A. There are certainly many calcium supplements on the market now. I think there are two very important things to try to get. First, look for calcium and magnesium in a 2:1 ratio. This helps with absorption of the calcium and prevents constipation. Also, look for one with vitamin D3, as I believe strongly that we should all be getting about 1,000 milligrams of vitamin D3 per day and about 1,200 milligrams of calcium.

However, calcium is not well absorbed; so it often comes in smaller doses and you take more than one tablet per day for optimal absorption. And avoid taking calcium within two hours of drinking tea, as tea will prevent its absorption as well.

'Shamelessly exuberant' Jewish student leader brings people together

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
Special to The CJN

If Jewish student activism was equated with building a house, Samuel Konig would be simultaneously reinforcing the foundation, washing the windows and hammering in the last few nails.

The 24-year-old Carleton University student is the Ottawa advocacy co-ordinator of National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL).

His duties are diverse, he says, and include bridge-building between different clubs and organizations, identifying student leaders, organizing and supervising events, keeping in touch with the university's administration and monitoring anti-Jewish events on Ottawa campuses.

He mostly works with the Jewish Students' Association (JSA), the Israel Awareness Committee and the fraternity AEPI.

"I get the opportunity to work with students. Being a student myself, I get to see the changes (we effect) immediately," he says about his love for his job and for activism.

Konig seems to be everywhere at once, whether dancing up a storm at a JSA pub night or being a familiar face at all the events during the recent Israel Week.

That series of events, Ottawa's first annual Israel Week, was one of several that Konig has helped organize since he started his job with NJCL (and his master's degree in European studies) last September.

Of the events he has worked on, he is most proud of a January 2008 speech by Rabbi Steven Greenberg, the first openly gay Orthodox rabbi. It became a university-wide event, sponsored in part by the Carleton University Students' Association.

Konig is well-known throughout the Ottawa community. Third-year Carleton University political science student Elana Wall says she was thrilled to learn she would be working with the "shamelessly exuberant" Konig on the JSA after meeting him at a conference the year before.

"He's one of the best people that could have come to work with us because he puts his all into anything he does, whether it be school, work or life," said Wall.

"He just knows that in order to make a place for yourself in a new city, you need to meet people. Instead of sitting and waiting for people to come to him, he stuck himself out there and found people to meet on his own."

Konig prides himself on his ability to take initiative in new situations and bring people together. He says he learned this from his grandfather with whom he was very close. The Holocaust survivor died three years ago, but left a legacy for his grandson.

"He told me that I have to be able to speak and to connect to anyone," Konig says. "I feel comfortable in any environment, and it's because of his preaching."

This comfort level was given a boost by Konig's United Nations-esque globetrotting. He was born in Vienna and spent his early years in Copenhagen. At 14, Konig moved into a Jewish boarding house of a non-Jewish boarding school in Bristol, England. There, he met Jews from all over the world, including Botswana and Hong Kong. Konig speaks English, German, Danish and Polish, and can read Hebrew, having visited Israel more times than he can count.

"This multicultural background made my identity stronger and taught me how to take initiative in an environment where everyone feels strange," Konig says. Though it is a shameless marker, his 1,995 Facebook friends is one indicator of how he brings people together.

Konig's path to activism began during his undergraduate degree at McGill University.

Canada's multiculturalism appealed to him, as did the vivacious city of Montreal. He began in non-Jewish activism, as president of the German Students' Association and as a council member of the undergraduate arts society.

Konig then got involved with the Ghetto Shul, a student-run synagogue in Montreal, and volunteered at the Holocaust assistance office at the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors, translating letters from Germany about restitution. For this work he was honoured last year by FEDERATION CJA with the Jon Roskies Memorial Award for New Leadership.

Once Konig moved to the nation's capital, he kept on making connections.

"When he got to Ottawa in the summer, he wasted no time setting up meetings with different people in the city; rabbis, members of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, community members and influential people in general," said Wall.

And he liked what he found among the Jewish students.

"They are very passionate about Israel, and they have the desire to make Ottawa is a very special place for students. This is something we have to build on and really embrace pluralism. They realize we have to be united," says Konig.

Though he labels himself a "traditional" Jew, he feels very strongly about embracing and respecting pluralistic Judaism.

Konig says the one thing that bothers him about student activism is when it takes an anti-Jewish or anti-Israel event to get things going.

"That should not make us active," he says. "It should come from our hearts. We should be flourishing throughout the year - it shouldn't come from the negative stuff."

Konig says the message he tries to send to students is to be proud of who they are, believe in themselves, help each other and, not surprisingly, take initiative.

"They can only change if they take things in their own hands - but only in unity," he says.

Konig is also recognized as a strong student, in addition to a leader. Last month, he received the David and Rebecca Zelikovitz Scholarship from Carleton, an $1,800 award for a graduate studying Jewish culture.

After graduation in 2009, Konig isn't sure what he's doing next, he says. But he knows he wants to live somewhere in Canada and work in the Jewish community.

"Canada is what gave me my opportunity - it took me in and made me realize my love for Jewish activism. After I finish school, it's my time to give back."

Konig dancing on a bus this past December in Israel, where he was leading a student leadership mission for National Jewish Campus Life.

The Gaza operation comes at a price

By AMOS HAREL
AND AVI ISSACHAROFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

All those calling for a major military operation in the Gaza Strip must take into account its cost.

The Givati Brigade's limited operation in the outskirts of Jabalya on Saturday gave an indication of the expected scale of casualties. Two soldiers were killed, as were at least 63 Palestinians, including many civilians. More than 50 Katyushas and Qassam rockets were fired in response on Sderot, Ashkelon and other communities bordering the Strip. And all this was part of a dress rehearsal. The number of casualties in a major, drawn-out operation could be much higher.

Why did the casualty rates climb on Saturday? The main reason has to do with the area where the operation took place. The Israel Defence Forces operated at the edge of the area where Israeli raids are conducted — up to three kilometers from the fence surrounding the Gaza Strip. But this time the IDF hit a sensitive location: the outskirts of a built-up and crowded part of Gaza City, around Jabal Kasef, between Jabalya and Sa'ajiyah. Hamas rushed reinforcements to the area, from the start of the operation.

As in many of these incidents, the minute the IDF suffered casualties, they used massive gunfire to gain access to the wounded and dead, and to avoid more Israeli casualties. For their part, the Palestinian gunmen took up positions in homes, while the civilians were still inside. Under such circumstances, it is obvious that the number of civilian deaths, including children, will be great.

Moreover, the operation took place at the peak of a period of escalating fighting, which began last Wednesday morning with an IDF air strike in Khan Yunis, which killed five Hamas militants.

On Friday one had the impression that Hamas was trying to end the current cycle of violence, and therefore fired considerably fewer Qassam rockets (nine compared with about 40 per day over the previous two days). But the decision in Israel was to continue the attacks, the intention being to prevent Hamas from dictating the pace of the confrontation or its intensity.

After the operation in Jabalya and the high number of Palestinian deaths, it will take longer to achieve relative calm. But even if calm is restored, through Egyptian mediation, it is likely to be temporary. Israel is quickly approaching the point at which it will embark on a major ground operation, which may happen in a few weeks. Even before the operation begins, Israel may decide to assassinate Hamas political leaders.

The government has mostly bad options. Even a ground operation will not immediately contain the launching of Qassam rockets, and it is doubtful whether it will achieve a long-term solution.

The frequent Katyusha attacks on Ashkelon are accelerating the deterioration of the situation. The defence establishment found Ashkelon Mayor Roni Mahatzri's decision not to operate the Colour Red missile alert a convenient way of waving off the Katyusha attacks as "sporadic." But last Thursday, following two days of rocket attacks, Mahatzri changed his mind and asked Defence Minister Ehud Barak to make the decision. Barak had little room to manoeuvre: if people were killed in Ashkelon, without any early warning of incoming missiles, he would be blamed for their deaths. The decision to turn on Colour Red was therefore a no-brainer.

But Ashkelon is not really ready for Katyushas: a direct hit by one of them is significantly more damaging than a similar strike by a Qassam. Ashkelon, without any fortification to public buildings, with 25,000 pupils in the public education system (more than the entire population of Sderot), will find it hard to stand up to constant bombardment. Neither will the country. "Two weeks of bombing Ashkelon and we are at war," a senior IDF officer predicted last weekend.

It is a mistake for anyone in Israel to think that the high price that the Gaza Strip is paying will undermine Palestinian civilian support for the Hamas government. At least for the moment, the operation's impact is the opposite. The Gaza residents who spoke Saturday with Ha'aretz expressed their absolute support for Hamas and its activities. Gaza pundits said on Saturday that it is unlikely that Hamas will fire fewer rockets at Israel. They say the group is now focused on offering the Palestinians what they need most: revenge through rocket attacks or through suicide bombings from the West Bank.

rights charter, she was excoriated by Israeli and U.S. officials for failing to note that it equated Zionism with racism. When she revisited the charter last month and criticized its attacks on Zionism and its weak protections of women and children, Arab nations complained.

GENEVA — UN Human Rights Commissioner Louise Arbour reportedly won't seek a second term.

Arbour, a former Canadian Supreme Court justice and war crimes prosecutor, will tell the UN Human Rights Council this week that she will leave the post when her current four-year term ends in June, Reuters reported.

Arbour, 61, endured criticism from multiple sides. Most recently, when she praised the ratification in December of an Arab human ASHKELON — Eighteen-year-old Eden Sharbane awoke before dawn last Saturday to the eerie sound of a "red alert" siren in her Ashkelon neighbourhood. Glancing outside her window, she saw a red-and-orange blur. A rocket was about to hit her apartment building.

Sharbane screamed and called out in warning to her mother.

Two floors above them, a rocket fired by Palestinian terrorists in the Gaza Strip, some 10 miles away, crashed through the concrete and steel rods of the building's roof and landed in a neighbour's living room.

Practically overnight, life in this quiet coastal city has changed dramatically. Thirteen rockets landed in Ashkelon over the course of four days, and with the Israel Defence Forces having launched a ground invasion into Gaza over the past weekend, shaken residents here suddenly find themselves in a war zone.

"All of a sudden I began to realize what a different reality there is now," Sharbane said.

After the attack on her building, Sharbane went out for a seaside walk to try to calm her frayed nerves, but another rocket fell in a nearby parking lot.

Less than a day later, the hole in the ground marking the spot of its landing had been paved over with fresh asphalt, but residents of this city of 120,000 know that despite quick clean-ups and reassurances, they are Israel's new front line in the battle against Palestinian rocket crews in Gaza.

Israel's internal security minister, Avi Dichter, who is himself a resident of Ashkelon, said Sunday that since last week the number of Israelis living under the threat of Palestinian rocket fire has jumped to 250,000 from 25,000.

After the first Katyusha-style rockets landed in Ashkelon late last week, the city activated the city's red alert rocket-warning system, which gives residents about 15 seconds to find cover. The system has been active for several years in towns closer to Gaza, including Sderot.

Chaim Ashtamker, a 36-year-old bus driver in Ashkelon, said he fears Ashkelon will share the same fate as Sderot, which has become a ghost of its former self after seven incessant years of rocket fire. With Palestinian terrorists in Gaza using new, longer-range Katyusha-type rockets, the coastal city of Ashkelon has become their key target.

"Our routines go on as normal, but we are all a little in shock," Ashtamker said. "I have small children at home, so of course I am scared."

There were few people along the streets and beaches of Ashkelon on Sunday. Many children asked to stay home from school and parents tried to calm them even as they admitted to feeling bewildered themselves by their newfound circumstances.

Residents debated whether or not the new ground incursion into Gaza — which killed scores of Palestinians, including many civilians, and left two Israeli soldiers dead — was the right answer.

Liya Gil, a 32-year-old Ashkelon resident and a recent contestant on the Israeli version of the reality TV show Survivor, paused after a seaside interview with a local entertainment show to ponder the city's new circumstances.

"I came out of the reality show Survivor to the real survivor," she said with a laugh. Then, turning serious, she said, "There is the army and defence ministry to take care of things. I hope things will improve."

Writing in Israel's daily Yediot Achronot, columnist Nahum Barnea said Israel faces a dilemma, forced to choose between "the plague and cholera."

"Ultimately, the debate boils down to two possibilities: either the IDF seizes renewed control over the Gaza Strip or extensive parts of it, or Israel begins open, direct and serious negotiations with Hamas," he wrote. "The choice between those two options is a choice between the plague and cholera. Nevertheless, it appears to be unavoidable."

As the army fought on in Gaza and Palestinian terrorists continued to fire rockets at Israel, Alan Marcus, head of strategic planning for Ashkelon, sat in his office surrounded by maps of the city. He described how officials were coping with the crisis — from fixing up bomb shelters to posting instructions in Hebrew, Russian and Amharic explaining how residents should protect themselves.

He showed some digital maps he designed that show where some of the weakest populations in the city live — among them the elderly, handicapped and recent immigrants — so teams can be dispatched quickly to help them in the event of an attack.

At an underground emergency control centre, he showed how city officials were staffing different desks: public information, logistics, engineering and education.

Marcus, who has lived in the city since immigrating here in 1975 from Boston, compared the current situation to what happened to northern Israeli cities along the border with Lebanon during the 2006 war with Hezbollah in Lebanon.

"I hope sanity will return," he said, expressing hope that the cross-border attacks soon will subside. He said he has been fielding calls from concerned Jews in Baltimore, which is a "sister city" of Ashkelon.

At a café at the city's train station, there were few commuters at rush hour on Sunday, the start of Israel's work week. Einat Azriki, 24, who works at a café inside the station, said she's still digesting the change of events.

"We are now learning what real fear feels like," she said.

CIC 'troubled' by minister's comments

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, a pro-Israel advocacy group, said he was "troubled" by Bernier's comments. "There is no equivalent between what Israel is doing and seven years of rocket attacks from Gaza into Israel, he said. "The government is not paying enough attention to the nuances and the details. The department is more comfortable in what it sees as a balanced [approach]. That does not reflect reality."

Baker said he was "disappointed" by Bernier's remarks. "I think any statement equating Israel's actions in self-defence with acts of pure terrorism directed willfully against civilians in towns and villages is misguided and wrong."

Israel's operations in Gaza prompted condemnation from the European Union, while UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon accused Israel of employing "excessive" force. In Washington, White House spokesperson Gordon Johndrow said, "The violence needs to stop and the talks [between Israel and the Palestinian Authority] need to resume."

The fighting brought new challenges to Israel's strategy of containing violence from the Gaza Strip, and derailed peace talks between the Palestinian Authority and Israel.

The latest surge in fighting began late last week when Hamas rocket crews fired dozens of rockets at Israel after the Israeli Air Force bombed a van carrying five Hamas militiamen who had recently returned to Gaza after undergoing specialized military training in Iran.

The Hamas rocket attacks claimed their first fatality in nine months: a 47-year-old father of four who was undergoing job training at Sderot's Sapir College after recovering from a kidney transplant. Hamas also fired several Katyusha rockets into Ashkelon. The fatality in Sderot and the Katyusha attacks on Ashkelon prompted Israeli politicians to call for a massive military operation in Gaza to counter what they described as Hamas' escalation of the conflict.

Israel stepped up its attacks in Gaza, increasing its air strikes, flattening the Hamas-run Interior Ministry and sending Israeli ground troops into areas of eastern Gaza City. Israeli officials described the crackdown as a "war," but said a full-scale invasion of Gaza was still a way off. The objective, it seemed, was to kill or capture as many Hamas rocket crewmen as possible and perhaps target the Islamist group's leadership as well.

"The ultimate objective is to bring an end to the firing of Qassams," Defence Minister Ehud Barak said.

Though Israel said most of the Palestinian casualties were combatants, the dead included many children and other civilians, and television images of the violence drew censure in the Arab world and beyond.

Bernier said that "Canada is deeply concerned about the current escalation of violence in the Gaza Strip and Israel. It is clear that Hamas and other groups responsible for the growing number of rockets fired on Israel are determined to target civilians and create even more instability and misery. These actions are deplorable. Canada calls on those groups to stop immediately for the sake of those suffering both in the Gaza Strip and in Israel."

Fogel said the government was correct in condemning Hamas rocket attacks but, quoting Winston Churchill, he said it erred in finding equivalence "between the arsonist and the firefighter."

"We were pleased the government recognized Hamas as the source of violence. We were concerned the statement... [drew] moral equivalence between Israel and the Palestinians, which we don't believe reflects the government's position. We've asked for a clarification," he said.

Baker deplored the "double standard" in the international community and the international media. They ignore the "40 to 60 rockets that fall indiscriminately on Israeli towns and villages daily. That does not seem to bother the international community and media very much. But as soon as Israel responds, it's acting unduly harshly."

Nareh Raghubeer, executive director of the Canadian Centre for Democracies, a pro-democracy advocacy group, called Bernier's statement "unfortunate" and "naive."

"I find it sad and dismaying that the minister chooses to lecture Israel as it seeks to fulfil its sovereign right to protect its citizens. One would have hoped that the minister would have been clear and stood by Israel unequivocally," he said.

For its part, the Fatah-led Palestinian Authority in the West Bank announced it was scrapping a routine peace negotiators meeting scheduled for Monday.

Though Mahmoud Abbas' administration stopped short of declaring the peace process dead, the Palestinian Authority president irked Israelis by saying what was happening in Gaza was a "worse holocaust" than what befell the Jews in World War II.

Hungarian Jews worry about growing racism, anti-Semitism

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
JTA

BUDAPEST — For the first time in his 33 years, Peter says, a homegrown Hungarian movement is articulating a vision for how Hungarians can preserve their culture and traditions.

It doesn't matter that members of the new Hungarian Guard parade in black combat boots and uniforms emblazoned with a red-and-white symbol reminiscent of the local Nazi party, which killed thousands of Jews during the Holocaust. Or that the Guard's rallying cry to protect Hungarians against the "criminality" of Roma — Gypsies — stirs fear of inter-ethnic clashes. "I don't want to talk about the Jews or Gypsies, because that's what the media says the target is, and the media's a joke," says Peter, who withheld his last name. Dressed in black with slicked-back hair, Peter endured frigid weather to visit a Guard recruitment event late last month. "The real target is a better Hungary," he says.

That's no comfort to the thousands of Holocaust survivors who still live in Budapest, or to Hungary's 100,000 or so Jews, the largest Jewish community in central Europe.

It's not so much the possibility of violence from the Hungarian Guard that troubles Jews here — the Guard, which has 1,000 or so members, is unarmed — but the apparent receptiveness of a growing number of Hungarians to far-right ideas.

Jewish, Roma and human rights groups already are pressing the government to ban the Guard, and some Roma are talking about forming self-defence militias.

The Hungarian Guard was created in August 2007 by a relatively new far-right political party, Jobbik, seeking votes and credibility on the right wing, experts say.

Showing increasingly sophistication over the last decade, the right wing has successfully infused mainstream public discourse with distinctions between "Hungarians" and "non-Hungarians" — with Jews and Roma on the outside.

This has revived the historic insider-outsider question for Hungarian Jews who saw themselves as assimilated members of Hungarian society, not as outsiders looking in.

"Even young people who are not racist or anti-Semitic use the same terminology, that you can't be both Hungarian and a Jew," says Andrea Szonyi, who co-founded the Holocaust education group Zachor: Foundation for Social Remembrance. "It leads us back to the Holocaust, when people who defined themselves as Hungarian were taken to the gas chambers as Jews."

The rise of a far-right movement is not unique to Hungary.

Across central and eastern Europe, the revolutions of 1989-1990 that launched post-Communist transitions to democracy also enabled extremist groups to gain a foothold.

In Hungary, they more or less remained on the fringe until 1998, when Viktor Orban, once a blue-jeans-and-carrying-wearing young member of the anti-Communist resistance, became prime minister and swung his party to the right, espousing nationalist, Christian values.

His party, Fidesz, formed a de facto coalition with the small ultra-nationalist Hungarian Justice and Life Party, whose playwright leader, Istvan Csurka, indulged in Jewish conspiracy theories.

Though he was never accused of anti-Semitism, Orban was criticized for not denouncing fellow Fidesz members who sometimes appealed to supporters with coded phrases viewed as anti-Semitic — for example, attacking rivals as "cosmopolitans," "Communist Jews" or for possessing "foreign hearts."

Many Hungarians rejected such rhetoric, but the genie was out of the bottle.

Zsidozas — a uniquely Hungarian term for "talking about Jews" — became more common in the media and in Parliament, and politics generally grew more toxic.

In September 2006, when Socialist Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany was caught on tape admitting that he lied to voters "morning, evening and night" about the nation's economic health to win re-election earlier that year, Orban and Fidesz, now leading the opposition, branded the Gyurcsany government illegitimate.

Daily demonstrations ensued. A new version of the Arpad flag — the red-and-white stripes from an ancient royal coat-of-arms also adopted by Hungary's Nazi puppet regime in the Arrow Cross — began to appear at the demonstrations.

The new flag may have lacked the black Arrow Cross symbol that, like the Nazi swastika and Soviet hammer-and-sickle, is illegal to display in Hungary, but Hungarian liberals said nobody was fooled by what the new flag meant.

That flag has become a fixture at anti-government demonstrations, especially events put on by the Guard.

For some Jews here, the growth of the far-right movement has been startling.

"Thank goodness my mother has Alzheimer's," says Katalin, whose mother survived the Budapest ghetto at age 17. "If she were OK, she would be very afraid, remembering the dark days of the Holocaust." Katalin asked not to be identified by her last name.

Some Jews here say such fears may be overreactions, but the Guard's affiliation with a legally registered political party, Jobbik, is cause for concern, says the president of the Federation of Hungarian Jewish Communities, Peter Feldmajer.

Jobbik polls at about 1 per cent support, but the party shares seats with Fidesz on several local councils across the country.

"The Guard may be 1,000 or 2,000 crazy people who like to play soldier games, but on the other hand this party has a relationship with normal political life," Feldmajer says.

Perhaps for this reason, the Guard has been cautious about avoiding public talk of Jews in citing their litany of historic injustices against Hungary. Instead, the Guard focuses on a more populist target: the Roma, who are widely disliked here.

Fueling public hatred, fear and negative stereotyping of the Roma, who are mired in poverty and unemployment that prompts some to turn to petty crime, the Guard portrays them all as "Gypsy criminals." The Guard has been organizing weekly marches as shows of force in towns around the country with significant Roma populations.

Hungary's population of about 10 million includes some 500,000 Roma.

The Guard "recognizes they can't play the anti-Semitic card, because it will delegitimize them in a greater way than playing the anti-Roma card would," says Michael Miller, an American professor of Jewish history in the nationalism studies program at Central European University in Budapest.

However, Miller notes, crowds at Guard demonstrations often will yell things like "Down with the Jews" or refer to Gyurcsany as a "Jewish hireling."

Feldmajer says Jewish leaders are lobbying local mayors to ban the Guard from their cities. He told JTA he expects the state prosecutor's office to decide soon if the Guard has violated its registration as a cultural and educational organization.

Meanwhile, observers say, it's essential that mainstream Hungarian conservatives, led by Fidesz, publicly distance themselves from the right-wing extremists.

Several Fidesz officials already have done so, but Orban has not.

Andras Kadar, co-chairman of the Hungarian Helsinki Committee, a human rights group, says a hate-speech law Hungary passed on Feb. 25 — and which still may be challenged in court as violating free-speech rights — is key.

"This is an apt moment for state organs to deal with the issue of freedom of expression, freedom of association, and make clear that 'democracy' cannot serve to justify all sorts of racist acts," Kadar says.

After last month's Guard event, Peter, the potential recruit, said he wondered whether visible support for the Guard — such as driving members to marches — might hurt him professionally.

"I work for a big company," he said. "Maybe they wouldn't like that I'm a member, and it would cause some problems for me."

Egypt to supply Gaza power

Egypt is working on a plan to supply all of Gaza's electricity needs and wean it off its reliance on Israel for power, an Egyptian energy official said. Last month, Israel began reducing its supply of electricity to the Hamas-ruled coastal strip after the High Court of Justice ruled that doing so wouldn't "things might be different in the coming stages." Israel and western powers have long pressed Abbas for renouncing terror and guerrilla attacks as part of the Palestinian national cause. His comments appeared to run counter to that image. In the interview, Abbas said that he had the "honour" of being the first member of cause a humanitarian crisis. Israel is trying to prevent Qassam rocket fire from Gaza into southern Israel. So far, it has supplied most of Gaza's electricity. Under the plan, Egypt — which already supplies a small part of Gaza's power — would increase the number of power lines linking it to Gaza and provide Palestinians with 250 megawatts, said Izzat Ibrahim, a senior official of Sinai's National Electricity Power Company. "This capacity is considered as an alternative power for that Israel used to supply," Ibrahim said.

Resistance still an option

Mahmoud Abbas was quoted as saying he might support Palestinian armed "struggle" against Israel in the future. "At this time I am against armed struggle, because we cannot achieve it," the Palestinian Authority president said in an interview with a Jordanian newspaper, but he added that

Katsav plea deal upheld
Israel's High Court of Justice upheld ex-president Moshe Katsav's plea bargain. A five-justice panel decided to reject six petitions against the attorney general's decision last year to drop rape charges against Katsav in exchange for his confession to lesser offenses. The plea bargain outraged feminist and government watchdog groups, who said the state risked playing down the severity of sex crimes and inviting charges of favouritism toward public figures. Katsav, who resigned last year in disgrace, denied allegations by several former female staffers that he had raped or sexually harassed them. Under the plea bargain, he will get a suspended prison sentence and pay $12,000 to two of the complainants. A rape conviction could have meant as much as seven years in jail.

Rules of retirement have changed, economist says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The retirement game has changed, says high-profile economist Sherry Cooper. "Fifty years ago, many people didn't live long enough to retire, and those that did didn't live much beyond retirement," she explained in an interview.

Today, in the face of longer life spans and looming labour shortages, the retirement age has increased as employers ask employees to stay on to preserve continuity, experience and customer relationships.

In her third book, The New Retirement: How It Will Change Our Future (Viking), she focuses on the baby boomer generation — born between 1946 and 1966 — and contends that boomers will redefine retirement with great energy and creativity, working well beyond the traditional retirement age of 65.

She dedicates it to her father, Irwin Sussman, an attorney who died 16 years ago at 62 of heart disease and diabetes. "It broke my heart that he never lived long enough to retire. He was such a large force in my life."

Cooper, the 57-year-old chief economist of BMO Capital Markets in Toronto, typifies the new ethos of retirement.

"I'm a boomer and going strong," said Cooper. "I do not intend to retire soon or any particular time in the future. I love my job, feel fulfilled and would be bored and depressed without a major sense of purpose or achievement."

She added: "Right now, I'm healthy, happy and at the top of my game. I will know when I've had enough, and then it won't be hard to leave."

But until such time, Cooper — an American by birth who has an MA and PhD in economics from the University of Pittsburgh — says she has no intention of slowing down or fading away.

And Cooper is as busy as ever. "The job of chief economist of a large bank and investment dealer is varied and demanding," she said.

Working as a global economic strategist with a team of 15 associates, she draws up projections of worldwide economic and financial developments.

She also counsels risk management teams, advises the chief executive officer, delivers more than 100 speeches annually and writes commentaries for clients.

Although she has been advising clients on retirement savings for years now, Cooper started researching and writing her latest book 18 months ago.

"I realized that most retirement advice is about money, while so much more is also important. BMO's surveys of Canadians uncovered boomer fears and concerns. The majority of Canadians want to continue working well beyond retirement age."

In her book, Cooper sets out the parameters of a successful retirement: "In the new retirement, we will not settle for personal diminishment, social isolation, dependency and inertia. We will remain active in mind and body, and most of us will continue to be productive well into our eighth decade."

Judging by the body of research she examined, mid-lifers will likely age better if they don't have a record of substance abuse; have a good, stable marriage; engage in mental activity; exercise; maintain normal body weight; and project a positive attitude, sociability, a sense of humour, altruism and outside interests.

Uncontrollable factors that affect successful aging include parents' social class, family cohesion, longevity of ancestors and childhood temperament.

According to Cooper, most households will need about 60 per cent to 70 per cent of pre-retirement income to maintain their standard of living.

But there are ways of stretching your retirement nest egg. "Working a few extra years markedly improves your financial outlook," she said.

Apart from that, you should cut overhead costs and spend less after the first decade of retirement.

As a retiree, you will need more money than you think. "For every dollar of pre-tax income you desire from your portfolio, to be sure your money will last at least 30 years, you need $20 in savings — less if you are willing to die broke, use annuities or reverse mortgages."

The Canada Pension Plan, she noted, is well funded and considered a model of its kind. But boomers with average median incomes cannot maintain living standards on CPP alone, she warned.

Despite her intention to soldier on indefinitely, Cooper is prepared to work more flexibly and travel a bit less one of these days down the road.

When retirement beckons, she plans to consult her 58-year-old husband, Peter, the chief executive officer of Scientia Health. Like her, he wants to continue working for years to come.

Once she retires, Cooper hopes to be an active volunteer. "I'm particularly passionate about health care, mentoring young and old, and Jewish causes in support of the community and Israel. And I look forward to having grandchildren."

Zionist visionary produced Mideast's first comprehensive water maps

Aaronsohn's Maps: The Untold Story of the Man Who Might Have Created Peace in the Middle East by Patricia Goldstone, Harcourt.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

Born in Romania, raised in Palestine and educated in France, Aaron Aaronsohn was a citizen of the world and a renowned agronomist and botanist.

He was also a Zionist visionary whose Nili spy network assisted the British in wresting Palestine from the centuries-long grip of the Ottoman Empire.

Patricia Goldstone

A linguist fluent in Hebrew, Arabic, Turkish, English, French and German, he was a figure of notoriety and admiration. Nearly 90 years after his sudden death in an airplane crash over the English Channel, his name barely registers a blip on the screen.

Patricia Goldstone, an American writer, rediscovers him in a thoroughly researched biography, Aaronsohn's Maps: The Untold Story of the Man Who Might Have Created Peace in the Middle East.

Aaronsohn is best known today for two stellar achievements. He funnelled vital intelligence to Britain that enabled the British army to conquer Jerusalem and Be'er Sheva, and he discovered a wild hybrid wheat (triticum dicoccoides) that botanists consider the historical basis of agricultural in the region.

Yet, in her considered judgment, Aaronsohn should also be remembered for having drawn up a detailed plan for Palestine's national borders and for having produced the first comprehensive water maps of the Middle East.

Aaronsohn, a Greater Israel advocate, believed that the frontiers of Palestine should stretch northward to the Litani River in Lebanon and include the Sinai Peninsula in Egypt, large tracts of Transjordan and the headwaters of the Jordan River in Syria.

Proceeding from this assumption, he recommended that the water resources of the area should be shared by Jews and Arabs alike to create a foundation for co-operation and prosperity.

Water, in his view, could restore Palestine to greatness and support millions of new inhabitants once its economic development was assured. Until then, he observed, to the chagrin of Zionist purists, that Jewish immigration should be strictly controlled.

Aaronsohn's vision of a peaceful Middle East, in which Jews and Arabs would happily coexist, was a pipe dream, dashed on the rocks of reality.

Yet with Israel's seizure of the headwaters of the Jordan River during the Six Day War, Aaronsohn's conception of its northern border was partially realized.

Aaronsohn was brought to Palestine in 1882, when he was six years old. His Orthodox parents, part of the First Aliyah, were among the founders of Zichron Yaakov. What they found in Palestine — an Ottoman backwater mired in poverty and neglect — was not the biblical Land of Milk and Honey, but a forlorn nation of marshes, swamps, malaria and typhus.

Although he was steeped in the Talmud, Aaronsohn, a free-thinker, was irreligious, as was his sister, Sarah, who would play a pivotal role in the Nili espionage network.

As Goldstone points out, Aaronsohn's view of the Arabs was shaped by his close exposure to them. "He learned their language, responded to their friendship and entered their homes to partake of their holidays." As a result, he concluded that Jews and Arabs could and should be allies in developing Palestine.

After Aaronsohn finished his studies in France, Baron Edmond de Rothschild — a Zionist luminary to whom the 1917 Balfour Declaration was addressed — sent him to Metulla, a new agricultural colony in northern Galilee, to be an agronomist.

He did not remain there for long, soon being dispatched to conduct a comprehensive survey of Palestine's water resources. French surveyors, in vain, had attempted to finish a similar survey in 1801. He succeeded where they had failed because, being a native born son, he had a much better grasp of the lay of the land. Aaronsohn next joined geological and botanical surveys of the Dead Sea and the Transjordanian desert.

In 1906, while on a field trip to the Jewish settlement of Rosh Pina, he found the wild wheat of his dreams, thus achieving international fame as a scientist. Impressed by his discovery, the American department of agriculture invited him to the United States.

With the support of American Jews, Aaronsohn established an agricultural research station at Atlit, near Haifa, the first such facility in the Middle East.

Within a few years, he improved the cultivation of cereals resistant to inclement weather, disease and parasites, and developed a new strain of sesame, five new types of barley, a gluten-rich wheat, a new table grape and an olive richer in oil. In addition, he perfected the ancient techniques of dry farming, which was suitable in regions of low rainfall, and pioneered the use of windmills to generate electrical power.

Stung by the Ottoman expulsion of Russian Jews from Jaffa in 1914, he and his associates, including his sister and assistant, Avshalom Feinberg, organized the Nili network. At its peak, it consisted of 23 active members and a web of collaborators.

When the Ottomans summoned him to Damascus to take charge of a campaign to eradicate a locust plague that threatened the breadbasket of Palestine, he accepted. Aaronsohn used his position and his access to Turkish military and civil authorities to gather intelligence material.

Armed with this data, he helped the British plan the invasion of Palestine. Working on a military handbook on southern Palestine, Aaronsohn showed them where to find sufficient water for their advance through the Sinai to Palestine. Not surprisingly, the British army's director of intelligence attributed Gen. Edmund Allenby's capture of Jerusalem in 1917 to Aaronsohn.

Aaronsohn's triumph was tempered by the death of his sister, Nili's chief of operations. Captured by the Turks, she committed suicide rather than reveal the names of Nili operatives.

He learned of her demise while in the United States on a mission to promote the political objectives of the Zionist movement. He was hired to do that job by Chaim Weizmann, who would soon become the president of the World Zionist Organization.

Aaronsohn, a member of the Jewish delegation to the 1919 Paris peace conference, was killed while flying to the French capital.

Had he lived a little longer, he would surely have been bitterly disappointed. In 1920, France and Britain agreed that all but one of the sources of the Jordan River would be in Syria rather than in Palestine. Aaronsohn apparently never understood that the imperatives of politics take precedence over everything else.

Goldstone, in telling Aaronsohn's story, draws a complex portrait of an extraordinary individual. But her feat is marred by a glaring factual error — the Baghdad Railway did not bring the first Zionists to Palestine, as she claims — and by rash commentary concerning current tensions between Israel and Syria.

Kosher butcher shop and abattoir inspire dance piece

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

For most people, the thought of an abattoir conjures up rather "icky" images.

After all, an abattoir is a slaughterhouse, and one wouldn't normally have a fond perception of what goes on in there.

But for Allen Kaeja, director of the multidisciplinary production Abattoir, the word and the place stirs very profound and deep emotions.

"My father co-owned an abattoir and was a kosher butcher in Kitchener, Ont.," explains Kaeja.

"As kids, we all grew up working in it and going to my dad's place of work was a joy. It was quite a beautiful place."

Kaeja's early experiences in the abattoir, which he describes as a rite of passage, forms the basis of Abattoir, a dynamic and intense dance creation that intertwines various art forms, including poetic text by Jason Sherman, classical singing by Fides Krucker and a diverse array of music by Edgardo Moreno.

"The abattoir is a metaphor for life," says

Kaeja, who co-choreographed the production with his wife of 18 years, Karen, who also appears as a dancer in Abattoir.

"It was a place where my rite of passage into the community occurred, and it is also a reflection of how we should treat each other. In Judaism, we cherish the life of an animal so when we kill an animal, it is a very sacred event and a lot of care is taken in it."

The production illustrates in a rhythmic and very physical way, how the abattoir instilled in Kaeja a deep respect for life, as well as the wonderment and innocence he experienced in the abattoir.

"Each one of us goes through our own growth and rites of passage," Kaeja says.

"This production takes us through the invigorating journey [of growing up], and I think audiences will gain a whole different insight into the mechanisms of an abattoir and mechanisms of growing up."

Before entering the world of dance, Kaeja was an esteemed wrestler and judo expert.

While at the University of Waterloo, he sought to improve his balance for judo and wrestling by taking a dance class. It was a decision that changed the course of his life.

"I realized that dance was my life, my focus, my future," he recalls.

"I love the physicality of wrestling and the competitiveness of judo, but dance has one additional thing that I truly love – the creative process."

In 1991, the Kaeja and his wife established Kaeja d'Dance, which has, ever since, been renowned for creating exceptional contemporary dance work and award-winning dance films, as well as education and outreach programs.

"We like to do things that are not part of the norm," says Kaeja, noting the company is not the only one to have made dance films based on the Holocaust.

"Our work is very physical and very different."

Abattoir opens in Vancouver on March 19 and will be performed at Harbourfront Centre's Premiere Dance Theatre in Toronto from March 25 to 29. For tickets, contact that box office at 416-973-4000. Website:

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

MANY JEWISH TOURS GOING IN 2008: TO POLAND, LITHUANIA, ITALY, GREECE, TURKEY, CHINA...

Many notices have reached Travel Talk of late, advising us of Jewish heritage tours to various attractive destinations. We wish we could go on each one. Here are details of some upcoming trips:

Poland, Lithuania, Latvia: In Search of Jewish Roots in Northern Poland, Lithuania and Latvia is a 14-day exploration of what was once the Litvak heartland. Participants take in Warsaw, Kaunas, Memel, Vilnius, Siauliai and Riga, and visit Holocaust sites such as Treblinka and various former ghettos. They may also arrange to visit their own ancestral shtetlach (villages), and those interested in genealogical research may visit the archives in Kaunas and Vilnius.

Simon Davidovich, director of the Sugihara Museum in Kaunas, is the guide in Lithuania, and Jacques Pauwels, a World War II historian, accompanies the tour in Poland. Participants may attend Shabbat services at local synagogues and meet members of local Jewish communities. Travel dates are May 19 to June 1. Please contact Maureen Price, 1-905-523-8067.

Jewish Greece & Turkey: Irwin Feuerstein, who several years ago retired from McMaster University, where he had been a professor of chemical engineering for 30 years, has led several Jewish educational tours to Spain, France and Italy for Pauwels Travel Bureau, a Brantford-based educational travel company. Under Feuerstein's guidance, the company is planning another trip to Greece and Turkey, Sept. 11 to 25.

The 15-day tour takes in many famous attractions, including the Parthenon in Athens, the Apollo-sanctuary of Delphi, and Istanbul's Aya Sophia, Blue Mosque and Topkapi Palace. Also included are visits to Jewish communities, synagogues, cemeteries and museums. $4,950 per person. For details, please visit the website www.pauwelstravel.com.

Jewish Italy: Toronto-based Victorious is offering a Jewish Heritage Tour of Italy, to be escorted by classics scholar and novelist Dr. Nick Maes, Aug. 17 to 28. Maes, who is a high-school history teacher at CHAT Tanenbaum, is the author of the 2007 novel Dead Man's Float and has a children's novel coming out in May. For details about the tour, please visit the website www.victorious.ca.

Jewish China: Toronto travel maven Harriet Morton of New Wave Travel is offering her eighth guided tour of China Through Jewish Eyes. The itinerary includes several days in Beijing and takes in the 2008 Olympic site en route to the Great Wall. Museum of Jewish Heritage: In the late 1930s, the Dominican Republic was one of few countries to welcome Jewish refugees from Germany and Austria. Several hundred who made their home on that Caribbean isle are the subject of a new exhibition at the Museum of Jewish Heritage in Lower Manhattan.

Sosua - A Refuge for Jews in the Dominican Republic brings to light the stories of Jews forced to leave home for a strange place they had never seen, other than on a map. They met only friendliness and acceptance on the island, and the exhibition "tells the story of Jews who found a haven, half a world away," according to museum director David G. Marwell. Also on view is a collection of photographs of the birth of Israel by Hungarian-born photographer Paul Goldman, marking the 60th anniversary of the state of Israel. 36 Battery Place, New York. www.mjhnyc.org

Austria's Counterfeiters beats Israeli film to win Oscar

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

LOS ANGELES — Much of the Jewish Oscar buzz this year focused on director Joseph Cedar's Beaufort and the chances of an Israeli film picking up an Academy Award for the first time.

But it was another Jewish-themed film, The Counterfeiters, that ended up taking home foreign-language honours on Feb. 24.

Set in 1943, the Austrian film probes the moral dilemmas facing a special group of Jewish concentration camp inmates in a little-known and remarkable episode of World War II.

"There have been some great Austrian filmmakers working here," director-writer Stefan Ruzowitzky said during his victory speech, referring to Hollywood. "Most of them had to leave my country because of the Nazis, so it sort of makes sense that the first Austrian film to win the Oscar was about the Nazis' crimes."

In an earlier interview with JTA, Ruzowitzky went further.

"My grandparents on both sides were Nazis, or Nazi sympathizers, so I felt a special responsibility to deal with the Holocaust era," he said. "I felt an equal responsibility not to exercise moral judgment on the Jews who collaborated in Operation Bernard."

In the film, as the Nazis realize that the war is going against them, they try one more ploy — to wreck the economies of Britain and the United States by flooding them with massive amounts of perfectly counterfeited pounds, sterling and dollars.

Under the code name Operation Bernard, the Germans combed concentration camps and assembled a team of more than 100 skilled Jewish printers, photographers and engravers.

In Sachsenhausen, the prisoners are placed in two isolated barracks dubbed "The Golden Cage." They are given soft beds, good food, civilian clothes, first-class equipment and piped-in music.

Heading the team is Salomon Sorowitch, a character based on a Russian-born Jew named Salomon Smolianoff. Nicknamed "Sally," he lived high in the Berlin of the 1920s and early 1930s as "The King of the Counterfeiters."

Faced with the choice of instant death or producing pound notes so perfect that even the Bank of England accepts them, Sorowitch does the Nazis' bidding.

By the end of the war, the Sachsenhausen team had turned out 134 million pounds, three times the amount of British currency reserves, and was close to producing equally perfect dollar bills.

Ruzowitzky does not draw Sorowitch, portrayed by Karl Markovics, as merely a craven collaborator. Sorowitch protects a fellow prisoner who is trying to sabotage the operation and uses his skills to acquire medicine for an ill inmate.

The Counterfeiters retains the tension of a top thriller, but it goes deeper. It probes a haunting moral question — given a chance at life, even temporary life, at the price of aiding the enemy, what path will a person choose?

The actual Smolianoff survived the war and soon resumed his old occupation, adding the "rediscovery" of Old Master paintings to his repertoire. He died in Argentina in the 1960s.

The film's ending, building on hearsay evidence, has Sorowitch after liberation toting a suitcase full of fake currency and heading for Monte Carlo, where he purposely loses the entire fortune at the gaming tables.

Ruzowitzky's background and motivation is as interesting as the movie itself.

The Viennese filmmaker's grandparents on both sides were Nazis or Nazi sympathizers who, like most Austrians of the war and postwar generation, saw themselves more as victims than perpetrators of the German atrocities.

"My grandparents would acknowledge to me the facts of the Holocaust, but considered it a collateral damage to the war," Ruzowitzky said in a phone interview.

One reason he closed the film with the scene at a Monte Carlo casino "was to give Sally some redemption, or atonement, at the end," Ruzowitzky said.

From his considerable research on concentration camps, he concluded that "the system was designed so that the inmates would harm each other."

Ruzowitzky cited one survivor, a doctor, as saying, "If you tried to do anything good, it would lead to catastrophe."

Scene from The Counterfeiters

Meanwhile, disappointed but not downcast, Israeli filmmakers and their supporters vowed to come back strong next year after Beaufort lost for best foreign-language film.

"We have shown that Israel can make very good movies and we will prove it again next time," Eli Eltonoy, one of Beaufort's actors, told a cheering crowd of some 350 attending an Oscar party Feb. 24 at the Hollywood night club Avalon.

An ebullient Yaakov Dayan, Israel's consul general in Los Angeles, went further, shouting, "We'll have a bigger party next year and we'll take the Oscar, I promise you."

From its arrival three days before the Oscar ceremony, the Beaufort contingent became a rallying point for the large Israeli expatriate and general Jewish communities in Los Angeles.

At the Oscar party, hosted by the Israeli consulate, the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles and the StandWithUs organization, guests included Israeli pop idol Ninette Tayeb and 10 teens from Sderot here to participate in a benefit concert for the Negev town targeted by rocket attacks from Gaza.

Beaufort director Joseph Cedar, lead actor Oshri Cohen, and producers David Silber and Moshe Edry were accompanied by more than a dozen Israeli television reporters and hosts.

The intense coverage reflected the country's pride that after a hiatus of 23 years, an Israeli film made the list of five finalists among 63 foreign entries, as well as in the contents of the film itself.

Beaufort depicts the windup of the first Lebanon War in 2000 not in the glory of a 1967 victory, but in an indecisive and exhaustive ending — a small Israeli unit evacuates the medieval Beaufort fortress. The film's strength lies in presenting its protagonists not as super warriors, but rather as young men who acknowledge and face their fears.

A Beaufort victory would have put an exclamation point on what is frequently described as the "renaissance" of the Israeli movie industry.

The renaissance has been certified by a slew of awards at the most prestigious European and American film festivals, including Cannes, Berlin, Venice, Sundance and Tribeca for pictures such as The Band's Visit, Jellyfish, Lemon Tree, Walk on Water and Jossi & Jagger.

Israel & the Jewish World

Orthodox rabbis aim to counter rightward shift

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — To its architects, the agreement reached between the Rabbinical Council of America and the Israeli Chief Rabbinate offers a way out of a long-running dispute over the recognition of conversions performed by American Orthodox rabbis.

But a small group of liberal Orthodox rabbis are unhappy with the deal, which was formally announced last week. They say it represents a broader pattern of what they describe as surrender on the part of the RCA, the primary association of Orthodox rabbis in the United States, to the dictates of a religious establishment in Israel increasingly under the right-wing sway of haredi authorities.

Under the terms of the agreement, the Chief Rabbinate approved a list of about 15 RCA rabbinic courts and approximately 40 rabbinic judges whose conversions would be recognized by state authorities in Israel. Courts wishing to be added to the list would need the final approval of Rabbi Hershel Schachter and Rabbi Mordechai Willig, two leading rabbis at Yeshiva University, who some liberal Orthodox figures blame for the school's alleged rightward drift.

"Conversion is just symptomatic of the increasing 'hardening' of the establishment of the Orthodox community," said Rabbi Marc Angel, rabbi emeritus of New York's Congregation Shearith Israel, the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue. "It's like building higher and higher walls between the Orthodox world and the rest of the world."

It is that belief which, in part, has led Rabbi Angel and another New York rabbi, Avi Weiss, to move toward the creation of an alternative network of rabbinic courts that would operate on "non-haredi standards." The courts would be associated with a new rabbinic organization that rabbis Angel and Weiss are establishing, to be known as the Rabbinic Fellowship.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Toronto's Kehillat Shaarei Torah, a modern Orthodox congregation, debated Rabbi Angel on the issue at a Torah in Motion program in Toronto two months ago.

"I respect that he's a knowledgeable person," said Rabbi Tradburks. "I happen to feel on some of these issues that he's wrong."

Rabbi Tradburks said that when it comes to issues of personal status such as conversion or Jewish divorce, it's "not fair to the people involved, to future generations and to the rest of the community" to proceed with a ruling that is not going to be accepted by others.

As a member of the RCA committee that implemented the agreement with the Israeli Chief Rabbinate, Rabbi Tradburks said the decision was made in consultation with "all the major authorities in the modern Orthodox community" including Yeshiva University leaders and Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein.

Rabbi Basil Herring, executive vice-president of the RCA, told JTA that his organization has not taken a formal position on the fellowship.

However, he characterized as "false and misleading" Rabbi Angel's characterization of the Orthodox rabbinate.

"The standards that have been adopted overwhelmingly by the rank and file and the leadership of the RCA are certainly very mainstream," Rabbi Herring said. "They reflect standards that have existed not only over the last decades, but indeed for centuries. The RCA, if anything, has been very moderate in terms of its expectations of converts."

Rabbi Tradburks explained that "because of the erosion of observance, it got to a point where it was very difficult to demand [full commitment to observance] of people.

"Now, it's a different world," he said. "In Toronto, it's not a hard thing to keep Shabbos. Today it's much, much harder to justify not committing to a complete observance."

Motivated by concerns about the rightward drift of American Orthodoxy, others have tried — and failed — over the past decade to create more liberal Orthodox institutions, including attempts to establish alternate rabbinic courts. But the Angel-Weiss effort is the first to unite a grassroots association of rabbis with an alternative network of courts and a kind of think tank, the Jewish Institute for Ideas and Ideals.

In October, the fellowship hosted an initial gathering of 33 rabbis — among them Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, a former New York rabbi and now the spiritual leader of the West Bank town of Efrat, and at least two members of the RCA's executive committee. An inaugural conference is slated for April in West Palm Beach, Fla., that Rabbi Angel hopes will attract 100 rabbis.

Participants in the October meeting cite a number of motivating factors behind the fellowship. Among them are the desire to resist what Rabbi Angel calls the "authoritarianism" of the Orthodox rabbinate; to create a "safe space" where rabbis can speak their minds freely; to empower local rabbis to make independent halachic decisions; and to provide some organizational umbrella for graduates of Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, Rabbi Weiss' liberal Orthodox seminary.

Chovevei graduates have not been granted membership in the RCA, and Weiss told JTA the seminary withdrew its membership request more than a year ago, citing the "arduous" process.

But it is the establishment of the new courts that is likely to generate the most controversy.

Though rabbis Weiss and Angel stress that the fellowship is not meant to replace or compete with the RCA — a body in which both continue to retain membership — creating new courts most directly infringes on an area where the RCA has long held sway.

"On the issue of the alternative batei din, that does seem to me like more of a direct conflict than fellowship alone," said Rabbi Daniel Cohen of Congregation Agudath Sholom in Stamford, Conn., and a participant in the October meeting. "That's something that's evolving, to be honest. It's unclear where that's going to go."

For its part, the RCA stresses that for innovative legal changes to have any credibility, they must be endorsed by a recognized living halachic luminary, a position Rabbi Angel describes as a "classic statement of the authoritarianism in Orthodoxy."

Rabbi Herring also warned that establishing alternate courts can have a negative impact on the very people they are seeking to help — particularly if, in the case of so-called agunot, or "chained women," whose husbands refuse them a religious bill of divorce, the woman in question goes on to remarry and bear children.

"What happens if a beit din is not a recognized beit din, without wide acceptance in the Orthodox rabbinic community?" Rabbi Herring asked. "Has the new beit din helped these women or not helped these women? There is absolutely no question that they have grievously harmed these women."

Rabbi Weiss and Angel are not the first rabbis to recoil against the perceived rightward drift of Orthodoxy.

In 1997, a group of Orthodox rabbis and laypeople founded Edah, an organization to advance a liberal Orthodox view under the slogan "The Courage to be modern and Orthodox." The organization folded in 2006 and its director, Rabbi Saul Berman, took a position at Chovevei Torah.

Yeshiva University's Center for the Jewish Future, established in 2005 at the initiative of President Richard Joel, also was seen by some as an attempt to balance the perceived shift of Orthodoxy and the university to the right.

Rabbi Tradburks would argue that the shift is "a matter of shifting to what the Shulchan Aruch always demanded," rather than a shift to the right.

He attributes what he terms "an ascendancy of the more right-wing Orthodox world" to an increased birthrate in that community.

The conversion standards of demanding full commitment to observance — including Shabbat, kashrut and daily prayer — have been part of the RCA for 25 years, he said.

The batei din that are approved by the Israeli Chief Rabbinate include those in Toronto and Montreal, said Rabbi Tradburks. In other cities, people can work with their local rabbis in consultation with rabbis where there is an approved beit din.

More recently, a group of religious Zionist rabbis in Israel, Tzohar, faced off against the Chief Rabbinate over the use of a religious loophole allowing farmers to work their land during the sabbatical year.

"We're not starting at the end of the process. We're starting with a grassroots movement," Rabbi Angel said. "And we're going to do it slowly, methodically, and on very solid halachic grounds."

"We're not interested in making headlines. We're interested in doing that which is correct for the Jewish people."

Coach cleans house, turns team around

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Phil David was plugged into the head coaching job in Peterborough, England, he was faced with a last-place team full of underachievers.

There was some talent on the squad to be sure, good skaters and a scorer or two, including one of the league's best. But the team's main goal-getter was also a prima donna who put himself first.

David knew something had to be done in his first game behind the bench when the player ignored his signal to come off the ice during a power play. Everyone in the crowd saw the insubordination, and though he was on the job for only a day, David realized he'd have to pull the plug on the team's top player. Within a month, he was gone.

David faced a firestorm of criticism in the newspapers, but he could see in the dressing room and on the bench that the team's mood changed. It was like a huge burden had been lifted off players' shoulders, and they responded by going on a 16-1 streak. By last week, Peterborough had amassed a 29-8-3 record since David's arrival. They were 4-4 when he took the job.

For David, 42, it all went to show that the lessons of hockey are universal, whether they're applied in Toronto minor leagues or with professionals in England.

To succeed, you need talent, speed, finesse, hard work and a good attitude, he said. That's how he builds his teams, whether they're midget squads in Toronto or the semi-pro Phantoms in Peterborough, a city of 150,000 that's 86 miles north of London.

The Phantoms play in England's Premier League, the country's second tier that includes Chelmsford Chieftains, Slough Jets and Bracknell Bee's.

For David, the call to coach the Phantoms came out of the blue and was something of a blessing. In August 2006, he had been diagnosed with colon cancer and underwent emergency surgery. During the subsequent chemotherapy, complications arose and he was hospitalized for weeks. He lost his job in marketing, but by September 2007 he was running his own business and was serving as an assistant with his old team, the Toronto Junior Canadiens, when an old friend from Camp Kadimah, near Halifax, called and told him about a job opening in England.

David, a native of Sydney, N.S., was flown over for the interview. He was offered the job, but given only five days in which to start. He hurried back to Toronto, put his personal affairs in order and rushed back to England.

Given all he had been through, he felt it was the right thing to do. The cancer scare "was a life-changing event. It put a lot of things in perspective."

He was no longer as interested in pursuing materialist objectives. Instead, getting back full time to a profession he loved held all the allure he wanted.

Last week, as the season wore down, the Phantoms had secured a playoff spot and were jockeying for position in the post-season seedings. They defeated the Chelmsford Chieftains 8-5 on home ice to vault into third place.

David came to the Phantoms after many years of coaching in Toronto. Like many in the dwindling Jewish community of Cape Breton (it dropped from 150 families in the 1970s when he was growing up to 30-35 today), David left to pursue better opportunities. He cut his coaching teeth in the Toronto minor hockey system.

Starting in 1993 as a goalie coach for a

Select team in north Toronto, he caught the coaching bug, or what he calls "a healthy addiction to it."

An avid student of the game - he tries to attend at least one coaching seminar every year - he moved from Select to AA hockey, registering some success with the Scarborough Young Bruins, a midget team (16 and 17 year olds) and the North Toronto Midgets. He coached the North York Midgets as well, and two of his three midget teams finished first in their leagues.

In 2003, he moved up to AAA, taking a job with the Junior Canadiens, at the time, a last-place team.

In three years, they improved from 12th, to 7th and then to 4th in the league. During the 2005-06 season, they were league and provincial champions and competed nationally at the Telus Cup.

They lost in the semifinals to the eventual national champions.

Over the years, David developed his own coaching style that demands puck pursuit and forechecking. He looks for good skaters who employ finesse, and he requires his players to put hockey ahead of everything except family and school or work.

"That's the kind of player I love," he said. "On top of that, I look for strength on the puck."

Though physical skills are key, equally important is the right attitude - a willingness to learn and take instruction, to put the team first and work hard.

A goalie of no mean skill in his own right, as a youth he played AAA hockey for some very good teams. His midget club went to the national championships, and he notes with pride he was named tournament all-star ahead of the legendary Patrick Roy. After that, however, their careers diverged. Roy went on to the National Hockey League, Stanley Cups and an award as playoff MVP, while David played intramural hockey at Dalhousie University.

"I peaked at 17," he quipped. What's more, looking back, he realizes he didn't have the kind of attitude he now demands of a player. He acknowledges he was too focused on himself and was "an uncoachable kid."

"I would have kicked myself off the team within a week," he said.

There's nothing to fear in Holocaust education

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

In mid-February, French President Nicolas Sarkozy became the first French head of state to attend the annual dinner of the Representative Council of Jewish Institutions in France (CRJF), the country's Jewish umbrella organization.

Previous French presidents have always used the bogus – and entirely French – excuse of not wanting to be seen as supporting “sectarianism” in explaining why they have stayed away from the CRJF dinner. In parting with this absurd policy, Sarkozy emphasized his support for French Jews and the State of Israel.

During his address, Sarkozy pledged to intensify Holocaust education among French schoolchildren by initiating a program in which 11-year-old students will “adopt” a Holocaust victim of the same age. To a standing ovation, he explained, “Nothing is more exciting for a child than the story of a child of the same age, who played the same games and had the same dreams, but was unfortunate enough to be born Jewish in the 1940s.”

This is, of course, exciting news. An increase in Holocaust education is welcomed anywhere in the world, but in France, the epicentre of Europe's current cultural war, Sarkozy's words were a revelation. Considering France's historical ambivalence towards its own Jews and the country's struggles with a bullying Muslim population, a display of sentimentality for the Jewish story of the Holocaust is a risky political move.

Predictably, Sarkozy's proposal has drawn angry responses. Jean-Marie Le Pen, head of France's far-right National Front party and a borderline Nazi sympathizer, predicted that, “The poor children will feel guilty and break down,” under the weight of a Holocaust education. Echoing Le Pen, Simone Veil, a Jewish Holocaust survivor and former French government minister, claimed, “It's impossible to ask a child of that age to relate to a dead person. It would be unbearable for them.”

This “what about the children?” argument is nothing more than a shameless ruse. Regardless of their claims, Le Pen, Veil and their ilk are not particularly interested in the psychological threat to young French kids. What they truly fear is a project that would alter the French far-right's narrative. Singling out the greatest Jewish tragedy for intense study quite simply belies the nationalist cause.

New Views

These political manoeuvres hide a simple, undeniable truth: Holocaust education and psychological hardship in children are un-linkable. There is, in fact, documentary proof that children not only can handle learning about the Holocaust, but can also produce something constructive from what they're taught.

Indeed, the award-winning 2004 documentary Paper Clips showed how a group young of people could be affected positively by Holocaust education.

The film shows how students at the public middle school in Whitwell, Tenn., population 1,600, were motivated to produce their own tribute to victims of the Holocaust after their principle introduced a mandatory Holocaust education class at the school. The students collected 11 million paper clips to represent the six million Jews and five million other victims of the Nazi genocidal campaign. The paper clips are housed, along with various other tributes, in a vintage Nazi transport rail car.

These children – who knew nothing about the Holocaust and, if Le Pen is to be believed, stood to be damaged by the painful experience of studying the Holocaust – were actually drawn into the tragic story and were sufficiently motivated to add their own unique perspective to the Holocaust storyline.

There is absolutely no reason to fear that learning about the Holocaust might damage children. If anything, studying the Holocaust has the potential to be a positive educational experience for today's children, who, no doubt, will come into contact with more recent, even current, campaigns of genocide as they become more and more aware of humanity's ugly side.

That the Le Pens of the world would put hateful, nationalist politics before the education of French children is truly appalling.

TERAULAY STREET SYNAGOGUE: This City Public Works photo (1923) preserves a rare view of the former Teraulay Street Synagogue on the east side of what is now Bay Street, a few doors south of Dundas Street, with the clock tower of Old City Hall in the distance. Machziki Hadas, a breakaway faction of the Shomrei Shabbas congregation on Chestnut Street, built and occupied the sanctuary in 1907. Inset, a frontal portrait of the shul and its longtime spiritual leader, Rabbi Yosef Weinreb. Known as the “Galitzianer Rebbe,” Rabbi Weinreb died in 1942. The synagogue was demolished in 1943.

$168,000. That's what I paid for my condominium, a place with two bedrooms, a self-cleaning oven, an innovative tool closet, and a view overlooking the captivating and ceaselessly moving Highway 401.

Despite what Mordecai Richler said through his character Duddy Kravitz's grandfather: “A man without land is nothing,” I never felt compelled to buy my own place. That is, until now.

First, I have always been domestically challenged and have no idea how to repair my broken electrical fireplace. Further, after spending $300,000 on rent, I always figured owning a dwelling is not a financial investment. One rarely, if ever, sells their home and cashes in; instead they move into bigger place with a larger mortgage and more floor space to fill with additional furniture.

Does real estate always appreciate? Ask the woman who bought a place in Miami Beach a couple of years ago, how she is feeling today. Lousy is my guess. Purchasing my place was not as a financial investment. So why did I finally take the real estate plunge and become a home owner?

I am now a father, and my reality has shifted with Noah in it. The world with Noah seems safer. It seems more dangerous. I now view life as a parent. I want to share with Noah the Tao of the 401 traveller who passes before us and experience the hardy sense of happiness and security that comes with every giggle and laugh as we watch. I want to open our windows and doors, step outside, and invite the world in.

I now view life as a parent and am petrified at hearing the news of a child dying anywhere. It makes me ill, sick to my stomach, and I want to lock the three bolts on my front door to keep the bad away and protect my little boy in our home.

Owning a place and being Noah's father encourages me to think about my personal space in a different way. The earth is ultimately not ours at all. I know that. It is God's. Yet I believe it does exist for me, and for you. I believe the leaves, the dust and the rocks call out to us to plant our garden or build our fence, to buy a place so we can control our environment in a way that reflects who we are; enables us to plant a tree, which nobody can uproot, for generations to come – for Noah.

Could I be as good a parent renting instead of owning? Of course. I have friends who prove this in a big way. But now that I own my condo, now that Noah's bedroom is truly his, I have this notion we are just a little bit more alive.

When considering why I finally bought a place, I wondered why it was important for the Jewish people to have a homeland – the State of Israel. Clearly, Israel is our safe zone, a haven for any Jew. It is also there, and nowhere else, inside Jerusalem-stone hovels, that Jews can actualize our spiritual and creative way, to blossom in our own place, which nobody can take away.

And then, you know, I thought about all of these reasons just a little bit more and remembered the Jews of Poland, Hungary and Germany who also had warm, cozy homes and likely felt the same thing as I do today, until someone else felt otherwise. My belief in ownership, it seems, is an illusion. It is then a daydream that has prompted me to buy a condo, to own a place of my own.

I am 47 years old and just bought my first property. Something about it feels right. Something about it seems very temporary. Unlike the homeless, I am now “home-full.” $168,000 later, what does that mean?

While it may be an unwelcome visitor to your overripe bananas, the humble fruit fly is key to advancing modern genetics.

Because 75% of known human disease genes have a recognizable match in this little insect's genetic code.

That's why researchers at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute of Mount Sinai Hospital turn to Drosophila to explore the genetic causes of some of the most devastating diseases of our time: cancer, diabetes and heart disease.

Like Dr. Tony Pawson, recognized internationally as one of the top 25 scientists in his field, who continues to make important discoveries in the genetics of cancer and heart disease.

And Dr. James Woodgett, our Director of Research, who is exploring the underlying causes of diabetes.

Their research holds tremendous promise for treatment of the diseases that threaten our health and the health of the people we love.

Genetics is the very future of medicine, in which care will be tailored to the patient and aimed at predicting and preventing disease. For example, Dr. Katherine Siminovitch received international acclaim when she isolated a gene that – when it malfunctions – puts people at risk for Crohn's disease. This breakthrough is a critical step toward improving diagnosis and developing therapies for Crohn's sufferers.

And it's not just the future of medicine. Discoveries made through genetic research at Mount Sinai are helping patients today.

Such as Dr. Stephen Lye, who after identifying the genes that cause labour, has created a blood test that can predict which women will deliver prematurely. His test helps doctors determine the best early treatment for a healthy birth.

Our investment in research is an investment in the future of health care – in Ontario, Canada, and around the world.

No one could steal my bridal thunder

By MARNI BRINDER BYK

Special to The CJN

When it rains, it pours. I waited 912 days for Russ to propose, and 1,187 days from the day we met until the day we got married.

Russ jokes that I was planning the wedding on our first date, and he may be right, because on that first date I knew I'd met my match.

Do you have any idea how long 912 days is? It's 21,888 hours of waiting, 1,313,280 minutes of hoping, and 78,796,800 seconds of looking your beloved in the eye and wondering, "What the heck is taking so long?"

But on that wonderful day when he finally proposed, I was on top of the world. It was my time to shine, and no one, not even Russ, could get in my way.

He wouldn't have dared to even try.

I remember the phone calls, e-mails, notes of congratulations. Everyone wanted to talk colours, take me dress shopping and celebrate. I picked a date, about 10 months away, and continued to ride the bridal wave.

But a funny thing happened on the way to the altar: life.

The unexpected thing about getting married is that although everyone around you is thrilled, their lives continue on while you plan every detail of your wedding.

One month after my — um, I mean our — blessed engagement, Russ' sister, Jacky, got engaged and planned to get married a mere three months later.

In the blink of an eye, my future sister-in-law and maid of honour was going to be one of two matrons of honour at my wedding! Then she got pregnant! My very good friend Shawna also got engaged, planned her wedding and got married all within my 10-month engagement.

About three months before my wedding, my brother asked me to help him choose a ring for his girlfriend. David assured me that he would wait to propose to her until after my — I mean our — wedding.

However, sitting there with the jeweller, seeing my little brother willing to spend every penny he didn't have on his future wife, I couldn't make him wait. She deserved her day, too.

So I encouraged him to propose whenever he was ready, and two weeks later, they announced their engagement. Jen was thrilled, and so was I, because like me, Jacky, and Shawna, she had met her perfect match and was ready to start a life with her bashert. Who was I to stop them?

In the end, my wedding was everything I could have ever hoped for, and I would not have changed a single thing.

I have spoken to other brides who have experienced the same bridal wave, with their friends and relatives seemingly stealing their thunder, but in the end, on day 1,187, there was only one person in white.

Oh yeah, and Russ was there, too.

And the day was that much better because we were surrounded by people who were happy.

Luckily, it doesn't snow in September

By JENNIFER PETERS
Special to The CJN

Every girl waits to find her Prince Charming, and when he finally arrives, you don't want to let him go. My prince won my heart by drinking a two-litre bottle of root beer, which would get me into the next round of our camp-wide morning program. When it was announced that he had won the competition for me, I knew I had met my match – someone who would drink something I hated.

It all began at Centre Camp, at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, in the summer of 2004. Three years after the root beer, he proposed – he did everything a girl could dream of. He got down on one knee, asked my father's permission – not to mention he got me the most stunning ring. We chose the location right away and booked the wedding.

Little did we know that the day after our wedding was the first night of Rosh Hashanah. We thought about it for a quick second and realized unless we were going to make the first night of the holidays at our house for 250 people, the date would have to change. I called the synagogue to switch the date, except the next date I wanted was on hold, and I was forced to wait four very long days until I heard that we could book that date. You would think after that we would have learned to plan more appropriately.

With the date secured, I began my search for the perfect wedding dress. I couldn't wait to start trying them on. I found my perfect dress in the third store I went in to – well, it seemed perfect. I called my best friend as I left the store to tell her I had found it; she is getting married in June and already had her dress. I described the dress to her and at the end she said it sounded beautiful... almost like hers. She said there was no possible way it was the same dress, that there were a million dresses in Toronto, and we went to two different stores! But I had to be sure. So I dragged her to the store, and when she saw the dress, her face turned white – it was the same dress! I couldn't believe it. We normally have had completely different taste in just about everything! So the search continued...

After the date change and shopping for another wedding dress, I started getting excited about our engagement party. A few days before the party, I turned on the TV to check the weather and found out that there was supposed to be a big snowstorm. This was not just any snowstorm. This was supposed to be the biggest snowstorm in 40 years!

I woke up the day of the engagement party at 7 a.m., looked outside and felt so much better. The weather was perfect. Obviously, the weather would be on my side... wrong! I went to the hairdresser, and when I left there, it was a white-out. I thought for sure no one would come to the party. Thankfully, we got there in one piece and without incident, and while we were waiting at the party, slowly but surely everyone started coming in. The party was perfect – everything we wanted and more.

I made myself crazy for absolutely no reason. After everything that happened – wrong dates, the same dress, and poor weather – I realized that everything is meant to happen for a reason. Whatever the reason was, I knew in eight months I would be marrying the man of my dreams. Lucky for us, it doesn't snow in September.

Everything happens for a reason

My brilliant honeymoon plan 'crashed and burned'

By MARNI BRINDER BYK

Special to The CJN

I decided quite early in my wedding planning that I wanted to leave for my honeymoon immediately after my reception. I had this romantic notion that if my new husband and I slipped out of our wedding clothes into our travel clothes, the magic of our wedding day would continue onto the plane and throughout our honeymoon. People warned me that we were in for a long night, we were going to be sooo tired, but I shook my head at the naysayers – they didn't realize how brilliant my plan was... they didn't realize how brilliant I was.

With my wedding scheduled for the middle of hurricane season, our honeymoon options were limited. We were taking a chance by booking anywhere in the Caribbean, which is, of course, the most affordable place to book. With the help of my travel agent, I explored my options. My first inclination was a Mediterranean cruise, but we would leave 10 days after the wedding, which didn't suit my vision. Who wants to go back to work for a week and then leave again? I planned on leaving my office a single gal and returning two weeks later a sunburned married lady. (Please note: I am not a sun goddess but instead a very fair, very freckled woman who can still burn wearing 30 sunblock while sitting in the shade.)

Finally we picked Hawaii – the honeymooner destination of choice! We decided on a seven-day cruise around the islands. On the days leading up to the wedding, we packed, got organized, got married, danced, forgot to eat, opened the gifts, changed and left for the airport. And we were tired... really tired. In the process, my loving husband was starting to get a little cranky.

Russ couldn't get comfortable enough to sleep, not on the flight to Chicago, definitely not on the three-hour stopover, and we still had a whopping nine hours ahead of us. Once we boarded in Chicago, Russ finally fell asleep, and I stopped contemplating filing for divorce. About an hour later my new husband awoke, a touch less miserable, looking a little more like the groom who pledged his love to me a mere 18 hours earlier. But when he learned he had only slept for one hour and that there were another eight hours still to go, I had to put on my earplugs to drown out his complaining, mumbling and ranting. At one point, Russ decided he just needed to get off the plane. Had it been a viable option, trust me, I would have let him.

What happened to my bliss? The wedding was magical, the gifts generous; however, as the plane headed toward paradise, my plan crashed and burned. The mood didn't change much once we landed, but once we finally found our suite, ate from one of the many buffets and took showers, we were finally the Mr. and Mrs. Byk I had imagined in the months before our wedding. What did I learn? One, listen to your friends, family and travel agent. We could have waited a week, a month – perhaps our first 12-hour trip should not have been on zero sleep? And two, next time be better prepared – I should have had his favourite magazines, a portable DVD player in case the movies were awful on flight (they were), and if all else failed, some sleeping pills to slip in his food. Hawaii was beautiful, by the way, but we never went to see any volcanoes or waterfalls. We spent the rest of the cruise napping, eating and napping some more. The flight was altogether too tiring to do anything else.

Wedding mishaps: all's well that ends well

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The C/JN

As a caterer and event planner, it's been my pleasure – and sometimes waking nightmare – to help create and co-ordinate weddings. Some big, some small, some complicated, others, not so much; but all vitally important to the families of the happy couple. One thing that they all have in common is that no matter how exact the planning is or how carefully the seating charts are put together, I know, to a certainty, that something probably will go wrong.

I've found that the key to a successful wedding is knowing when to "fix" the problem, complain like hell, punt, or when to just shrug your shoulders and say, oh well, if this is the worst thing that happens today, this is still going to be the best wedding ever. People too often lose sight that the commitment of two people, in front of their family and friends, is far more important than the colour scheme, any canapé served or the size of the sweet table. That being said, some fun and funny things do happen whenever people get together to celebrate.

As food is my forte, several fondest memories of wedding feasts and fiascos revolve around what was served, or as the case may be, not served. There was the wedding cake that fell over as the bride and groom were cutting it and trying to force-feed each other. The cake hit the four-year-old flower girl on the head and covered her and the ring bearer with butter cream and chocolate ganache. There was the outdoor sunset dinner at a harbour club that was attacked by a battalion of mosquitoes and other assorted bugs, despite the area having been fogged and the five-dozen citronella candles strategically placed around the dining area. The meal was moved indoors, with all the guests joining in to pick up the plates and conga-line it into the hastily redecorated dining room. Surprisingly, this was one of the happiest wedding receptions it was ever my privilege to co-ordinate.

Food isn't the only aspect of a party that can be problematic. There was the time when the truck delivering the plates, glasses, silverware, chairs and tables, rented for a luncheon following a morning wedding, showed up three hours late and managed to back into the portico of the front entrance of the synagogue (why the driver went to the front instead of the back where the deliveries are supposed to be made is still a mystery to me). I'm happy to say that with the help of my hastily called "extra" staff – my son and six of his friends – we got the tables and chairs set with about 30 seconds to spare. Then there's one of my favourite memories of sitting down to dinner for 300. Just before the dinner was to be served, the father of the bride, wanting to have wine served for a toast to the happy couple, had two lines of waiters, who were carrying bottles of champagne, enter from different sides of the room. When a misstep caused the two lines to collide, the term "bridal shower" took on a new meaning. No real harm other than an up-do that turned into a down-do. Everyone laughed, and after a quick trip to the powder room for the bride to redo her do, everyone toasted and the party went on.

The old saying, "man plans and God laughs," is absolutely true when it comes to weddings. Let's take my own for example. I ordered cream flowers for the chupah and the aisle, but purple flowers were delivered. Now, purple is a fine colour, but when the colours you've chosen are cream and gold, purple is not your second or even third choice as a substitute. Luckily, the wedding co-ordinator was able to contact the florist, and by some magic still unknown to me, was able to have the purple turn into white (alas, not cream, but who's complaining 30 years later) and the march down the aisle went on as scheduled.

Several years ago, when I was helping a very young bride and her mother decide which florist would best suit her taste and budget, I happened to notice that she kept looking sideways at her fiancé and mouthing the words, "help me." Surmising that there was something that needed to be discussed, I distracted the mother and discreetly pulled the bride aside to ask what the problem was. She confessed that her mother-in-law was allergic to all kinds of flowers, and she didn't know how to tell her mother that the garden wedding she had been planning since the bride was conceived would probably land her future machatunim in the hospital. Telling the bride that honesty – and the desire to avoid anaphylactic shock – was the best scenario, we called the groom's mother. She came over to the florist – and was thrilled to be asked – and the choice was made to go with silk. This kind of willingness to share planning information for a wedding has saved more than one reception (and life).

Surprisingly, one of my favourite wedding stories doesn't involve food or flowers or even wine – it involves gym shoes. Several hours before the wedding, as the photographer was artistically posing the bride and her retinue on some wrought-iron stairs, the heel of the bride's "dyed to match" stilettos broke. It didn't just come away from the shoe – it literally broke in half. Most brides would be hysterical. Luckily, this one had a great sense of humour. She sent her best friend and maid of honour – in full bridesmaid regalia – to a Target store several blocks away from the synagogue and had her purchase five pairs of matching wedge-style gym shoes (they were all the rage then) in the assorted sizes of the bride and bridesmaids. Total grace under pressure. No panic, just acceptance of what was, and the ability to go with the flow and march down the aisle with style.

I know that the best advice I can give to any bride or groom or member of the wedding party is that while the food and band and flowers are important, they should pale in comparison to the reason for the party. Focus on what's truly necessary to make your wedding special and meaningful – the commitment to your future together, celebrating with the family and friends that are with you and remembering those that aren't. You and your family are the core of what a marriage should celebrate, not the colour of the napkin rings. Oh, and have fun. This is supposed to be the best party of your life. Enjoy it.

Travel agent can help firm up honeymoon plans

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL

Special to The CJN

In the midst of the chaos that is wedding planning, honeymoon planning can actually be a welcome reprieve.

To kickstart this fun process, I recommend you sit down in private with your spouse-to-be, don't even mention the word "wedding," and start to visualize a beautiful destination where the two of you can begin married life.

When considering the perfect place, think about whether you are looking for relaxation, adventure or a blend of both.

You should also give solid thought to finding a location or series of locations that are couples friendly.

In other words, a destination teeming with teenagers or toddlers is probably not ideal.

My wife and I did most of our preliminary research on the Internet.

We were looking for a vacation that mixed adventure with chill time, was somewhere neither of us had been before, catered to couples and was warm and not rainy at that time of year, so we focused on finding a resort in the Caribbean.

One thing that was very helpful throughout our quest was online reviews.

People who have been to the resorts will generally be quite frank about how good or bad it is, so we did our share of checking out what patrons had to say.

The reviews painted a clear picture of all kinds of important details, including food, amenities, activities, staff, ambience and the overall honeymoon experience.

We also spoke at length with our friends and acquaintances for their tips.

While online booking is very popular these days, I still feel that dealing directly with a travel agent, who has expertise in trip planning, is the best way to go.

So armed with a good sense of what we were looking for, we approached a travel agent to firm up the plans.

This was exceptionally helpful and led us to decide on our destination — the Body Holiday at Le Sport, a hotel, spa and resort nestled along the coast of the Caribbean Sea on the mountainous island of St. Lucia.

With the tag line of "give us your body for a week and we'll give you back your mind," the Body Holiday has 60 health and wellness offerings, in concert with a vast array of water and land sports, fine dining and evening entertainment.

Each day, every person is entitled to at least one spa treatment, including a special treat for honeymooners — a hands-on lesson on how to give your husband or wife the ultimate massage.

Fortunately, many activities that usually require extra fees at an "all-inclusive" are included. For instance, water-skiing lessons, golf green fees, tennis coaching and introductory scuba diving are all part of the package.

The restaurants are ideal for romantic dinners, and if you venture off the resort as we did, there is plenty to see.

With the aid of a hired driver and guide, our rugged road trip included stops in the capital, Castries, followed by Marigot Bay and the fishing village of Anse La Raye, all of which provided breathtaking views of St. Lucia's hilly, verdant landscape.

We stopped near the west-coast town of Soufriere for a stunning vista of the Pitons, twin cone-shaped mountains that soar 800 metres. Soufriere is also home to a volcano, where bubbling mud, water and steam render a fascinating natural wonder.

Our final destination before the two-hour drive back to the resort was the Enbas Saut Waterfalls Trail, a remote expanse in the Central Rainforest Reserve. Climbing up and down steep, dirt steps, we found the five-kilometre trail invigorating.

If you plan a fun honeymoon, that's exactly what you'll feel, too.

Pamper bride and guests at shower

By FELISA BILLET
Special to The C/JN

With the wedding around the corner, a shower is a perfect time for the bride's family and close friends to spend a relaxed afternoon together before the big day, says Brooklyn-based party planner Zahava Fisch of Dazzle by Zahava.

"At bridal showers, not only are you supposed to pamper the bride, it's a great time for a hostess to go all out and give her guests a memorable afternoon," she says.

Follow these steps to celebrate the woman-of-the-hour – and please all the assembled guests.

- Make the food shine. Whether the meal will be catered, pot-luck or prepared by the hostess, the food should be fun. Give the bride and guests a culinary experience they don't get every day.

- Prepare a variety of toppings for a delicious salad bar. Place cut-up fruit, milk, yogurt and ice next to a blender for guests to make their own fruit smoothies. Assemble spreads, cheeses and vegetables, and have the hostess and a few friends alternate preparing made-to-order panini or omelettes for the guests. And who doesn't love make-your-own sundaes?

- Pick a theme and co-ordinate the décor, invitations and games. Themes can revolve around the bride. If she is a theatre buff, design the invitation like a playbill, scatter ticket stubs on the tables, and prepare trivia games about plays and musicals.

Does she have a green thumb? Plan a garden-themed shower by using flower motifs on the invitations, paper goods, and decorations. Other themes include cooking (have guests include a small kitchen gadget with each gift), Jewish holidays (guests bring gifts appropriate to assigned holidays), or household (guests bring creative gifts appropriate to specific rooms).

- Present the bride with a personalized memento. In the invitation, request submissions for recipes that can be turned into a special cookbook and presented to her at the shower. Brief messages or anecdotes should be included with the recipes to enhance the collection.

Alternatively, create a scrapbook of pictures and messages from the shower participants. This can be done before the shower or have guests bring the materials and have a fun time creating the scrapbook at the party. Another idea is to pass around a notebook and have guests write brief words of advice for the bride.

- Give her the ultimate gift. Once the basics are covered, have the hostesses or a few close friends present the bride with an outstanding gift not from her registry. Think out of the box. A gift certificate for floral arrangements to brighten her new home, theatre tickets for the couple to enjoy during the first year or pre-paid dinner certificates to their favourite restaurants are presents that touch the heart. Arrange monthly visits from a local cleaning service to help her as she gets used to keeping house or treat her to premium beauty services the day before her wedding.

- Everyone loves a present – not just the bride. Stretch the party's budget to include favours for all the guests. They should be small items and preferably revolve around the shower's theme. Classic items everyone can use are picture frames, decorative boxes, magnets, soaps, fragrances, lotions and chocolates. These are best presented at each place-setting or left in a basket by the door for guests to take on their way out.

Adjusting to married life

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The C/JN

Getting married is one of life's greatest milestones. It is the start of a union like no other and ushers in an entirely new way of living.

In my case, before I ceremoniously crushed the glass with my heel not long ago, the life I knew was vastly different from the one I was about to begin.

Aside from my immediate family, I had never lived with another person. My cooking credentials didn't expand beyond toast and pasta. My house-cleaning capabilities were halting. And in general, I marched to the beat of my own drum.

Marriage was therefore a whole new world to me, and to make it work, both of us would have to, shall we say, adjust our lifestyles.

One of the most significant adjustments was reconciling our respective domestic habits.

I am not neat and have an aversion to tidying up. I learned quickly that my wife likes the house spic and span.

So our first endeavour was to figure out how to divvy up house chores and attain a level of neatness that was acceptable to both of us.

It didn't happen overnight and was not always a peaceful process, but we made strides – it's called hiring a cleaning professional!

Another issue was food. We have very different tastes and preferences, and as I mentioned earlier, cooking was for the most part, foreign to me.

If you're thinking we hired a chef, sorry, that was not in the budget.

But I took it upon myself – with my wife's assertive encouragement – to discover things like an oven, frying pan, wok, spice rack, cooking oils and recipes. She did the same. And in time, we established a bit of a meal routine for the week.

I should note this includes random pop-ins at the in-laws during the dinner hour.

Time and space are precious things that you have plenty of when you're on your own. Once you're married, that changes.

I suddenly found myself without the freedom to scream, shout, jeer and cheer at the Leafs on TV for several hours each week.

Instead, I now had to make time for fun and exciting things like buying groceries, shopping for furniture and folding laundry.

The solution was to share time, space and responsibility relatively equally.

However, it is also important to ensure each spouse gets a fair share of independence.

Last but not least is the challenge of co-ordinating two schedules.

Married people have multiple obligations, commitments and the like, so a schedule, or series of schedules, is imperative.

This requires planning, organization and forethought – all skills that are, well, underdeveloped in my arsenal of talents.

That is to say that flying by the seat of the pants has long been my motto.

Conversely, my wife is all about what are we doing tomorrow, the next day and the coming weekend.

I would venture to say this was the biggest adjustment I made, in that I was suddenly making lists and schedules, and arranging plans with friends who don't normally think beyond an hour from the present.

There is no magic prescription for a perfect start to marriage.

But as newlyweds, you need to make concepts like accommodation and compromise front and centre in your life.

If that means you give up some free time, get your hands dirty scrubbing a filthy toilet, watch movies you hate and think about someone other than you, then that's what it takes.

Believe me – it's worth it.

Historic and romantic wedding settings abound in Israel

By TOBY KLEIN GREENWALD
Special to The C.J.N.

When I got married 30 years ago in the enchanting courtyard of Rabban Yohanan ben Zakkai in the Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem, our "music" was two friends on guitars and another on an accordion, playing in different corners. This was due to the custom of not having live bands within the Old City walls since the destruction of the Temple.

The groom's table, veiling of the bride, dancing and reception were scattered among the historic synagogues and small halls within the complex. Of special note was the quarter of a chicken that the waitress dropped onto my father's plate. When I tried to apologize for the simplicity of the affair, mortified, he said, beaming, "I love it! It's so... heimish!"

We loved that setting, but today a bride and groom have many more options. Israel offers some of the most evocative, historic and romantic settings for weddings on the face of the earth. Wedding planning companies will arrange a wedding anywhere—in the desert, in a forest or on the beach.

Thinking about a wedding in Israel? A representative sampling follows.

The Caves of Beit Guvrin

South of Beit Shemesh, these caves, a favourite location for hikers and tourists, are also a popular area for concerts and weddings. There are niches in the wall for homing pigeons, and caves once used for water cisterns and granaries are open to the stars. One moves from cave to cave for the chupah, dinner, bar and dance area. The main cave seats 450, and if you want to move tables outside, it can accommodate up to 700. The catering is $52 a person, or you can rent the hall for $5,000 and bring in your own caterer.

Large and rustic, with the smell of grass

Many moshavim and kibbutzim are dedicating a part of their lands to wedding areas. The cost per plate at kibbutz weddings can be as low as $38. Among kibbutzim and moshavim that host weddings are Tzora, Opera b'Kfar (literally, "Opera in the Village") and Neve Ilan.

Kibbutz Kfar Etzion

David Ben-Gurion called this kibbutz the watchman of Jerusalem. It was so significant that the internal army code used when it fell to the Jordanians in 1948 was, "The Queen has fallen." The children who had been evacuated then returned to settle it in 1967. In recent years, it has opened its reception areas to people from outside the kibbutz.

A huge grassy area under spreading fir trees and a number of places appropriate for a wedding ceremony are available there. Couples who are members of the kibbutz are driven to their private reception room after the ceremony on a tractor. Seats up to 600. Telephone: 972-2-9935145

Ramat Rachel—elegance and history

One can watch a spectacular and eternal sunset through the poles of the chupah from a hill overlooking Bethlehem and the Etzion Hills at Ramat Rachel, a kibbutz whose members fought to maintain the southern border of

Brides

Jerusalem in 1948. Surrounded by bunkers, the kibbutz had new life breathed into it after the Six Day War in 1967.

The décor of its huge wedding hall includes Jerusalem stone and a large dance floor, and the catering is sumptuous. The kibbutz was founded in 1926 and named for Rachel, who is interred in the nearby Tomb of Rachel, a destination for pilgrimages and prayer. Seats between 500 and 600, depending on how much room you want to leave for a dance floor. Price: About $42 a person. Telephone: 972-2-6702555; fax: 972-2-6733155; e-mail: arline@ramat-rachel.org.il

Kibbutz Nir Am—duck pond, restaurant and Bedouin tent

Nir Am, located in the western Negev and recently the target of Qassam rocket attacks, was founded in 1943 by Ukrainian Jews who were joined by pioneers from Argentina, France and South Africa. Horses and donkeys graze in the nearby fields.

Nir Am has both outside and inside dinner areas, including a Bedouin tent, a chupah frame of logs, and a large beautiful duck pond filled with lily pads and bulrushes. The ducks wander freely among the guests. There is a fascinating water museum on a nearby hill. The Nir Am area used to supply the water to the settlements of the Negev and also hosted various army divisions who fought and hid there during the War of Independence. The outside seats up to 320 comfortably.

New boys on the block

Two new wedding venues are Bustan Ha'ela (The Orchard of Elah) and Bustan Abu Ghosh (Orchard of Abu Ghosh). Bustan Ha'ela is located not too far from Kiryat Gat, Beit Shemesh and Jerusalem. Bustan Abu Ghosh only offers outside weddings. Cost: About $38 a plate.

Small and elegant in Jerusalem

Two popular venues for weddings or affairs for less than 200 people are Shulchan David and the Taverna restaurant, both in Jerusalem.

Shulchan David, on Mount Zion, can accommodate between 50 and 250 people for events, and there is a sukkah option for up to 250, as well. The setting feels like one is within the walls of the Old City, which is only a few hundred meters away. There is an outside courtyard and two inner rooms, one with a roof and the other with a tent-like ceiling constructed over it. Meals (meat or dairy) are usually served buffet style, and because the venue is outside the walls, many people hire bands. If the timing works out, you can visit other attractions on Mount Zion and within the walls before the event begins. Costs approximately $45 per person. Telephone: 972-2-6732770.

The Taverna restaurant, which seats up to 150, has a large, magnificent patio with a view of the Old City and the hills around it, which are visible through its arched, ancient windows. It has a gourmet daily menu and wine list. Taverna is both a regular restaurant and a favourite location for small weddings and other similar affairs. Tel: 972-2-671-9796; website: www.taverna.co.il; e-mail: tavernar@walla.com.

Wedding halls in industrial areas

Most wedding halls that are located in industrial and commercial areas do their best to turn their interiors into magical wonderlands. But it is hard to escape the fact that upon entering and leaving, one is faced with parking lots or falafel joints. However, when cost is a major consideration and one doesn't want to limit the guest list, wedding halls are good options. These can run as low as $25 per person at the Palace in the Talpotei neighbourhood, or as high as $50 for a location like the Pavilion, a new hall and conference centre in Jerusalem.

Hotels

David's Citadel, the King David, the Inbal, the Renaissance and the Sheraton Jerusalem Plaza, like most hotels, have different-sized rooms for different-sized affairs.

The Plaza has rooms that seat from 50 to 350 people; Tel: (972)(2) 6298666; Fax: (972)(2) 6231667.

The Inbal: Telephone: 972-2-675 6666; fax: 972-2-675 6777; e-mail: hotel@inbal.hotel.com.

The Mount Zion Hotel is for smaller affairs and has a wonderful view of the Old City walls, which are lit up at night, and the Valley of Hinnom below. It can seat up to 200 in the winter and between 250 and 300 if one adds the patio in better weather. Telephone: 972-2-5689555, 972-2-6731425; e-mail: hotel@mountzion.co.il; website: www.mountzion.co.il.

David's Citadel is an elegant hotel, with a view of the Old City's walls and a gourmet menu. Outside, it can seat between 100 and 150, and the large inside dining room accommodates approximately 300. Telephone: +972-2-621-2235; fax: +972-2-621-2323; e-mail: banquet@tdchotel.com; website: www.thedavidcitadel.com.

The Ramada is a favourite for those who want to have large weddings in a closed hall that has a touch of opulence. It has a separate hall for the ceremony and the wedding feast. There is also the option of having the ceremony in a stunning outside setting with lots of foliage by the pool. Inside, the hotel seats up to 500 people, depending on how much space you want to leave for dancing. There is also the option of seating for 400 outside, by the pool. Telephone: 972-2-659-9999; fax: 972-2-651-1976; sales: 972-2-659-9970, ext. 1970.

There is a selection of hotels in Tel Aviv. The David Intercontinental, which is very luxurious, can seat up to 600 people.

The cost per plate for a hotel wedding can range from $50 to $80 or more, depending on the hotel, the number of guests and the menu.

Some of the information quoted here comes from wedding and event planner Aviva Yisraeli, but she warns that prices change and may fluctuate, depending on the number of people. Thursday night weddings are usually 20 per cent more expensive and Friday morning weddings are discounted by 20 per cent. Caterers offer different prices at various halls. As the number of people attending increases, the price per-plate charge usually decreases.

Aviva can be reached at aviva.sutnick@yahoo.com, 011-972-523-406481.

On the beach

Beautiful weddings are held on beachfronts near Ashkelon and Caesarea, but my favourite beachfront wedding was that of our eldest daughter. The chupah was set at the edge of a lush, grassy lawn, the sun was low in the sky, the air was crystal clear, and the turquoise waves of the sea almost drowned out the sound of the blessings. But I don't know when that venue will be available again. It was at the seashore on the Gaza Strip.

No more ugly bridesmaids' dresses

By HARRIET P. GROSS
Special to The CJN

More than a dozen years ago, one brave bride-to-be scandalized southern Jewish tradition by telling her bridesmaids to select their own dresses – providing they were the colour she specified. Even in the early 1990s, she was way ahead of her time.

"Back in my generation," says Linda Kahalnik, recalling her traditional synagogue wedding in 1976. "I was told, 'This is how it is done.'" Her kids still laugh at pictures of their father's ushers in

With today's array of choices, every bridesmaid will love her gown

Experience the very best white suits with shirts ruffled in the same purple as the bridesmaids' frilly gowns.

One of those kids, Yael Kahalnik, did things very differently when she and her future husband, Bar Twito of Israel, planned their December 2007 wedding in Dallas, Tex.

"I didn't feel comfortable telling my friends what to wear and how much to spend," Yael says. "I wanted to choose the material and the colour, but they could each choose their own styles." Since none of her eight bridesmaids lives in Texas, she selected the readily available Alfred Angelo line: "reasonably priced and a lot of cute style choices in the wine colour I picked." Each found a shop in her own area that sold Angelo dresses and placed her own order.

According to Yael, "Some of them were a bit shocked that I didn't seem to have any strong opinions, but I really just wanted them to feel good and be happy."

Today's wide array of choices means that no bridesmaid will wind up with something expensive and ugly mouldering unhappily ever after in the back of her closet.

Spaghetti-strap styles and strapless gowns with cover-up shrugs are losing out to what's most flattering for all body types: something that doesn't show too much bust, has a bit of softening at the waist and features a wider shoulder strap.

"Iridescent taffetas are popular now, but chiffon is falling away," says Sarah Burton, a buyer for a Dallas store. "Satin is still the classic fabric." Calling in all measurements at once assures that every dress will be cut from the same dye lot for exact colour co-ordination.

Debbie Forkowitz had an unusual challenge while planning her January 2008 wedding in Austin to Arturo Karakowsky – but the solution turned out to be a choice much the same as Yael's.

"Because Arturo's family is from Mexico, we ran into a bit of a culture difference," she said. "When I asked his two sisters to be bridesmaids, they were really upset by the idea of wearing the same dress as four other girls, much less as one another. It was clear that 'matchy-matchy' was NOT an option!"

The compromise: Debbie chose the designer (Bill Levkoff), colour (midnight blue), length (full) and fabric (European satin). "Within those parameters, there were about 40 dress styles for my six attendants to select from," she said. "They were all able to choose cuts that accentuated what they love about their bodies and flattered what they don't. One girl doesn't love her arms, so she ordered extra fabric to have a jacket made to match her dress. Two chose two-piece dresses, really flattering to their figures. When the dresses came in, the girls really liked them, and I loved them!"

"Uniformity is just supposed to make the pictures look beautiful," Debbie says, "and that can be achieved in a number of different ways beyond 'matchy-matchy' dresses."

One thing is sure: when the Karakowskys' children look at their parents' wedding album 30 years from now, they will not be laughing!

'I really just wanted [the bridesmaids] to feel good and be happy.'

Even an expected proposal can be a surpriseBy SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Before Isaac and I got engaged in April 2007, we had been dating for more than four years. After a year of dating, it was no secret to anyone that we had every intention of spending the rest of our lives together.

Once we hit our mid-20s, getting married was the logical next step – we loved each other, we had long become familiar with and (reluctantly) accepted each other's annoying habits and we were ready to start a new life together.

Of course, we had talked about getting married and discussed when would be the best time for us. I wanted to be out of school and working full time and Isaac wanted to do the same.

In fact, we had talked so much about getting the timing just right, that I was sure the spontaneity had been completely taken out of the equation. I had even given him tips (read: sent him images) of the kind of engagement rings I liked. And still, in the back of my mind, I hoped that he'd still be able to come up with some plan that would throw me off course. But I knew that it was nearly impossible.

"Poor Isaac," I said to my girlfriends, who were just as expectant of the any-day-now proposal as I was. "There is no way he's going to be able to surprise me."

I've always been a hard person to surprise. I've always been pretty good about anticipating the outcomes of certain scenarios, so I knew that Isaac had his work cut out for him. I had really given up on the idea of a surprise proposal when Isaac, who is known among friends and family as being a terrible liar, spent months reminding me that there was no way he would be able to get a ring until July or August at the earliest.

"I know what that means," I thought. "He's telling me we won't be able to get engaged until July, so that must mean he's planning to pop the question in June."

I'm so smart. Too smart for my own good.

But clearly, I didn't give my husband-to-be nearly enough credit.

Last March, while I was feeling sorry for myself because I would be deprived of the kind of proposal that would put preposterous scenes in romantic comedies to shame, Isaac was hard at work putting together a plan.

Life for me was progressing as usual. I was busy at work, getting a steady flow of assignments, and meeting up with people all over the city to conduct interviews.

My editor, Mordechai Ben-Dat, asked me if I could take on one more assignment for the week.

He asked me if I would meet up with Joel Solish, who works for El Al, to talk to him about some new developments. As is consistent with most out-of-office interviews I have, we were to meet at a café.

"He's going to be downtown in meetings all day. Is it OK if you meet him at the café at the Four Seasons Hotel in Yorkville?" Mordechai asked.

I agreed, completely unaware that this supposed routine interview was a total ruse. Isaac had written my boss a letter, asking him to play a role in his elaborate scheme.

I did my research, prepared a list of questions, packed my recorder and on April 18, I was on my way downtown to meet Solish for our interview.

The hostess showed me to our reserved table by the window.

Sheri and Isaac

"He'll be right back. He just went to the restroom," she said.

While my head was buried in my notebook, going over my notes and prepared questions, someone approached me from behind and placed a bouquet of roses on my table for two. I looked up. It was Isaac.

"Babe! What are you doing here? I have an interview!" I said.

Now, you'd think that the second I saw him, something would have clicked, but Isaac had been relentlessly drilling it in my head that he wasn't ready to propose, so that I couldn't even fathom it.

He got down on one knee, looked into my eyes, opened the ring box to expose the most beautiful, sparkling round-cut diamond ring and said, "I want to spend the rest of my life with you. Will you marry me?"

I'd like to say that I screamed out, "Yes!" but instead, I sat there, mouth agape, speechless, unable to move a muscle.

"Take the ring," Isaac said, trying to jolt me out of shock. After a couple of tearful kisses and "I love yous," Isaac and I were (finally) engaged.

Out came the champagne, the chocolate-covered strawberries and the avalanche of mazal tov's began.

It was an absolutely perfect day, and it meant so much to me that despite the difficulty in surprising me, he made every effort to make this once-in-a-lifetime event special for me and a moment I will never forget.

What to do before you say 'I do'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

You've got the ring you can't stop staring at, you've finally gotten over the weirdness of calling your boyfriend your "fiance," and you've told the story of "how he did it" countless times.

Now all you have to do is plan the wedding.

Whether your guest list is 100 names long or 1,000, the process of planning a wedding can be overwhelming to some brides.

There's so much to think about: the venue, the menu, the dress, the flowers, the music – I could go on and on.

In fact, since I got engaged last April, the question I hear the most – other than "do you have a date yet?" – is "are you stressing?"

"Actually, everything's been really great," I assure them. "It's been really easy."

"Oh, you just wait," say those who have been through the process. "You'll see."

But it's been 11 months since I've started planning. I've booked all the major stuff, and since I came to terms with the fact that my guest list consists of about 400 people, it's been a breeze. With only three months until my June wedding, I'm still waiting to see what all the fuss is about.

I don't want to downplay the fact that there are many details to stay on top of, but as long as you stay organized, tackle one task at a time and stay flexible, there is no reason for anyone to have to develop a "Bridezilla" attitude.

For me, staying organized was my saving grace. Without my to-do lists, my budget excel spread sheet and my easy-going attitude, I'm sure I'd be a mess.

And staying organized doesn't mean you have to compile a colour-coded, 14-inch-thick binder à la obsessive-compulsive Friends character Monica Geller.

Grab a piece of paper and a pen. Jot down what you expect out of your wedding. Roughly how many people will be on your guest list? What are your top three choices for a venue? What do you want the décor to look like? Do you want a band or a DJ?

Sit with your parents and in-laws and determine a budget. Then write a checklist so you can stay on top of what needs to be done. Keep in mind that many wedding-industry services suggest that to ensure you get your first choice, you book about a year in advance. If you don't have that kind of time, flexibility will be your friend.

The first thing that you need to do is book a hall or a synagogue and set a date. This is the jumping off point.

From here, it's up to you which important decision you want to make next, but I would suggest that at least eight months before the wedding, you book the entertainment, the florist, the photographer, videographer, the rabbi and order your wedding dress.

If you are worried you're forgetting an important detail, the Internet is littered with websites that offer tips on planning a wedding and helpful checklists.

If you need some inspiration, find out when the next local bridal show is taking place, and take some notes about what you like and what you don't. Grab some bridal magazines, and if you see something you like, rip out the page to show your service providers exactly what you want.

The next step is to make sure you're staying within budget and keep track of who you owe money to. For instance, if you paid a deposit for your dress when you ordered it, make sure to keep your receipts, record what you paid and what the balance is.

Last and most important: relax.

No one is going to care if you went with light pink roses in your bouquet rather than peach. No one is going to remember if your wedding cake had three tiers rather than four.

In my humble opinion, it simply isn't worth having a nervous breakdown over a party.

I understand that some girls spend years fantasizing about being a princess on their wedding day, and that it only happens once (hopefully), but if they're obsessed with making sure every minor detail is "perfect," they'll be robbed of truly experiencing their fantasy wedding.

I think it is so tragic when brides talk about not remembering a thing about their wedding day because they were so nervous or stressed about making sure everything went perfectly.

My advice: have an open mind, don't sweat the small stuff and enjoy the engagement period.

And boys, stay out of it.

One moment in time. One place to match the moment.

A cry 'not to lose faith'

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

The one with glasses and a wide smile was the brother of a friend, and the one with blue eyes and side curls was the son of another.

In the close-knit world of religious Zionism, no one feels removed from the grief for eight young people gunned down while studying Gemarah in their Jerusalem yeshiva.

The images of blood-soaked prayer shawls and glass doors riddled with bullet holes, then the eight coffins lined up in a row, have horrified an entire country. But the pain cuts especially deep in the national religious Zionist community, having been specifically targeted.

Now its members search for a way their faith can guide them through the mourning.

"Since the attack there is a sense that a darkness has fallen over Jerusalem when usually there is joy in our neighbourhoods," said Tal Weider, 17, a high school student and leader in the local Bnei Akiva youth group.

"The key is not to lose faith — one must find meaning in this," said Rabbi Yuval Sherlow, the head of a national religious yeshiva in Petach Tikvah. "In the various eulogies, everyone did so in their own way — some calling for unity, others saying this was a punishment or a warning bell. As soon as you can put some kind of meaning to an event, it is not seen as having happened for nothing."

It was not by chance that the attacker targeted Mercaz Harav, the main yeshiva of national religious Zionism and a birthplace of the settler movement.

"It is a central place because it is a symbol of religious Zionism, and so it feels like we have been attacked personally," Weider said. "It feels like everything has changed. They [the terrorists] knew the meaning of Mercaz Harav, and they wanted to show that the power is in their hands. But as one of the rabbis said, nothing will shatter us. We will not let this break us."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the gunman struck the yeshiva as a deliberate ideological blow to Israel.

"It was not a place the killer just happened upon while looking for would-be victims," he told his cabinet in broadcast statements Sunday, calling the seminary "the flagship of national religious Zionism."

Olmert, a former Jerusalem mayor, who after joining the government angered many religious Zionists by arguing that the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank should be ceded to the Palestinians, said Israeli national outrage at the gun attack transcends politics.

"The yeshiva is a special place in Jerusalem," he said. "I know the yeshiva and its students well, and Israel has great appreciation for it."

Health agency pulls notice for anti-Israel essay contest

Students invited to write about 'ethnic cleansing of Palestine'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A government-funded health agency that serves gay and lesbian youth has removed an Internet posting that publicized an essay contest on the "ethnic cleansing of Palestine."

The Sherbourne Health Centre announced last week that it had removed notice of the contest following complaints from activist Joanne Cohen.

Cohen complained to the Sherbourne Health Centre and George Smitherman, Minister of Health and Long-Term Care, that an employee of Supporting Our Youth (SOY), a program run by the centre, had advertised the contest on a SOY e-mail list. The contest, which is open to students ages 17 to 27, is sponsored by the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF), Palestine House and the Canadian Islamic Congress (CIC) and is timed to coincide with the 60th anniversary of the establishment of the state of Israel.

Cohen contended that a government-funded agency that serves people of all backgrounds should not use its resources to promote "an explicitly biased anti-Israel essay contest."

She said SOY employee Suhail Sameed, who co-ordinates the agency's newcomer/immigrant project, sent a letter to a SOY newsgroup inviting participation in the essay contest. Cohen said Sameed's posting suggested that SOY endorsed the contest.

Within 24 hours of learning of the incident, Smitherman asked Sherbourne Health Centre to "take appropriate action," said the minister's spokesperson, Laurel Ostfield. "We won't tolerate any inflammatory or offensive language."

Denny Young, director of community relations for Sherbourne Health Centre, said once the agency received Cohen's letter of complaint, it held internal discussions that led to the removal of the Internet message.

"This gives us an opportunity to review how we post things on that forum," Young said. The Sherbourne Health Centre received $6.9 million in provincial funding in the 2007-08 fiscal year; 71 per cent of the agency's budget in 2006-07 originated with the Health Ministry.

A longtime gay rights activist, Cohen fired off a letter to a number of SOY employees, as well as senior management of the Sherbourne Health Centre, Smitherman and Barbara Hall, chief commissioner of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, when she learned of the essay contest.

Her letter asks "why our public funds are now apparently being used to endorse only one side of the relatively irrelevant issue of politics in the Middle East, in relation to your GLBTQ (gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered and queer) youth programming and in a way that is patently intellectually biased, if not dishonest."

Participation in the contest would cause Jewish or Israeli clients and staff of the agency to "feel marginalized," and could lead to an unsafe work place in which those who hold other views of the Mideast conflict feel intimidated, she stated.

Cohen told The C/JN she learned of the contest through a non-Jewish colleague who has been "offended by the discourse and apparent political bias of the organization for years."

Young said SOY encourages "lively debate within a respectful atmosphere." It also stresses good interpersonal relations and conflict resolution.

However, Cohen's letter noted "the absence of Jewish referral listings on SOY Toronto's 'links' page, despite the existence of many supportive Jewish GLBTQ groups and welcoming liberal congregations and associations in the Toronto area."

Desultory thoughts after a slaughter

In describing the war crimes of World War II, MP Irwin Cotler has often written that they were too horrible to be imagined, but not too horrible, alas, to have happened.

Cotler's description applies with equal sorrowful force to the murders last week of the eight young men at Mercaz Harav Yeshiva in Jerusalem.

Many commentators have pointed out that the perpetrator very specifically targeted Mercaz Harav because it is considered the spiritual centre of the Gush Emunim, the Bloc of the Believers, that sprang up after the Six Day War.

Gush Emunim were instrumental in translating the credo of religious messianism into the political activism of Jews being entitled to live on all of the Land of Israel. In the euphoric aftermath of the Six Day War, most Israelis, including the leaders of the Labor government, agreed with this – that a Jewish presence on some parts, at least, of the West Bank, and certainly in a reunited Jerusalem, was historically, nationally, politically and religiously legitimate, if not also, necessary.

But to "understand" the murderer's malicious motive against Mercaz Harav Yeshiva on the basis of the yeshiva's place as the theological anchor of the belief system of Gush Emunim is to put too fine a point on the matter of the man's hatred.

Mercaz Harav is, first and foremost, a house of Torah, a house of study and of prayer. As such, it is thus very visibly, very palpably and very manifestly a house of Judaism.

In his ugly, deadly assault on the helpless students of Torah, Ala Abu Dhaim, the murderer, considered himself to be on a religious, rather than a political, mission.

In the hate-filled mind of Ala Abu Dhaim, of those who trained and sent him and of those who share their radically extreme outlook, the struggle against the Jews is not for territorial supremacy, but rather for religious supremacy.

From the editor's desk

This should worry the western world. For, as history has proved, anyone who targets Jews because of prejudice against the Jewish faith, will soon also target Christians and non-Jewish Muslims because of prejudice against their respective faiths too.

As if to underscore the point that the conflict is, unfortunately, more religious in nature now than it is political and territorial, the Palestine Media Watch group (PMW) reported that the official Palestinian Authority's (PA) daily newspaper honoured the killer of the eight students with the status of shahid, a holy Islamic martyr.

The daily Al-Hayat Al-Jadida prominently displayed a picture of the killer on the front page, with the caption: "The shahid Ala Abu Dhaim." In an accompanying article on page 1, the multiple murders are defined as a "shahada-achieving" action.

PMW correctly points out that in using such religiously charged language to describe Abu Dhaim and what he did, "the PA is sending its people a straightforward message of support for the murders and the murderer. According to the PA interpretation of Islam, there is no higher status that a human being can achieve today than that of shahid."

Perhaps PA leader Mahmoud Abbas did not see or know about the page 1 story. But given the close control he exerts over the PA and its related organs, that is not likely.

More than likely, he agreed with the sentiment. And that should bother the West too.

Merely days before the massacre, the United Nations Security Council convened to debate a resolution condemning Israel's military operation into Gaza. Israel went into Gaza, of course, to try to stop the Grad and Qassam rockets being fired at its citizens.

The language of the resolution that ultimately passed was tempered, in comparison with what its Arab nation sponsors had hoped for.

The day after the massacre, however, the Security Council demurred from condemning the attack against the Jews.

The Anti-Defamation League denounced the council's inaction.

"It is shocking that the Security Council could not bring itself to condemn this heinous terrorist attack on Israeli teenagers at a Jerusalem yeshiva," said Abraham H. Foxman, ADL national director, in a statement the American Jewish organization released Friday.

According to reports in the press, Libya, currently the chair of the Security Council, prevented a condemnation of the killing as a "terrorist attack" because the language failed the test of being "balanced."

Foxman astutely pointed out that "formal action by the Security Council would send a powerful message that the Palestinian cause is not served by wanton acts of violence and terrorism, and that such attacks against civilians run counter to the interests of peace."

"Where are all the calls for UN resolutions condemning the murderous acts of terrorism against civilians?" Foxman asked. "Why should those who seek to thwart the cause of peace not be condemned?"

Why not indeed?

She said Jewish organizations and individuals have supported equality rights pursued by the agency while, "I note with regret the absence of any meaningful legal intervention for same-sex marriage from members of the Canadian Arab or Muslim community... To my knowledge, no meaningful contributions to same-sex rights in Canada have been made by the CAF, Palestine House or the CIC, the last of which was vehemently hostile to same-sex marriage. So why would SOY Toronto or Sherbourne Health Centre endorse them?"

Cohen goes on to note that Israel, while a flawed democracy, "offers immigration protections for GLBTQ citizens fleeing persecution in surrounding Arab countries, whose Supreme Court and NGOs have repeatedly protected women's and GLBTQ and minority rights, where a transgendered artist won the Eurovision song contest in 1998, where same-sex common law status and benefits entitlements are protected by law, and where same-sex couples are now permitted to register same-sex marriages performed abroad, as well as to register same-sex couples as parents for the purposes of Israeli law. Has this record been matched anywhere in the Arab world or Palestinian territories? I think not. Perhaps SOY Toronto and Sherbourne Health Centre have more to learn from the Israeli example."

CAF executive director Mohamed Boudjenane said he was unaware a SOY employee had publicized the essay contest. The essay sponsors publicized the contest by notifying subscribers to the organizations' mailing lists and the news media. Educational institutions or other agencies that work with youths were not sent notice of the contest, he said.

Boudjenane questioned the claim that the topic was inflammatory or offensive. The same term — ethnic cleansing — is widely used and has been employed by former South African archbishop Desmond Tutu, former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and Israeli historian Ilan Pappé, he said.

Furthermore, contestants need not agree with the essay's premise. "We're not asking anyone to take sides. We're asking people to bring their perspective to the issue... We didn't put out the contest to generate one side of the story."

* * *

Meanwhile, B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) called on schools and universities to refuse to participate in the essay contest. The contest "is based on the false assumption that the Jewish presence in the Jewish people's ancestral homeland is illegal," and is "a blatant propagandistic initiative that distorts reality, delegitimizing the existence of the Jewish state in any shape or form."

"The contest, directed at Canadian youth, intentionally distorts reality and serves only to engender hate against Israel, its Jewish citizens and supporters here in Canada... We call on Canada's academic establishment — from heads of universities to faculty members and trustees and directors of school boards — to issue clear directives to staff that the contest... is contrary to the equity and human rights policies of these institutions."

The BBC news release was followed by one from the three essay sponsors, who condemned BBC's "scurrilous attack."

"This call to shut down academic research and free speech is typical of B'nai Brith's contempt for the basic principles of academic institutions. These tactics of intimidation are becoming an all too common refrain of pro-Israel organizations and are simply designed to stem the growing public awareness of Israel's apartheid policies."

Len Rudner

On a related matter, Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said a new organization, High School Students Against Israeli Apartheid, was created last month at Israeli Apartheid Week, an annual event held on university campuses.

Congress is concerned that "outside agents provocateurs" would attempt to radicalize high school students and create "a hostile and harassing environment for students who are Israeli, or pro-Israel or who don't agree with the Palestinian narrative."

Congress has brought its concerns to the attention of Ontario school boards and has asked Jewish agencies across the country to do the same in their regions.

"This is not about the right of students to pick sides but about the potential of people with no business in the schools of mixing in the schools," Rudner said.

These people, he continued, are promoting a political agenda "and don't have the welfare of the students at heart but want to turn the schools into incubators for radical politics at the universities," he said.

Federation offers grants for first-time campers

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto recently announced a new program that will provide grants of $1,250 each for Toronto-area children who are first-time campers at Jewish summer camps this year.

CampRight funding is available for 200 first-time campers in grades 2 through 7 who enrol in a designated Jewish summer camp for a minimum three-week session. Registration in the pilot project is limited to those who sign up this month and is not based on financial need.

For families who cannot afford to send their children to summer camp, the federation provides more than $750,000 a year in subsidies, said Ron Polster, the federation's director of Jewish camping initiatives.

Parents who are old hands at sending their children to overnight camps know it's a good idea to submit their applications early – usually the preceding fall – but there are still available spots at participating camps, according to Polster. "Some are almost at capacity, but others have empty beds across the board. It depends on session, gender and age," he said.

CampRight was announced at the end of February, and as of last week, 50 applications had been received. Parents must apply to the program and the individual camp separately.

The project's name – and concept to a certain extent – derive from birthright israel, which provides free 10-day trips to Israel for 18-to-26-year-olds with the aim of strengthening Jewish identity and connection.

Unlike birthright, however, the CampRight grant only covers a portion of the registration fee, about a third of the cost for a month.

Based on experience in other cities, the amount "seemed to be the tipping point" that encouraged families to consider Jewish camps, said Polster, who was hired by the federation in November.

CampRight, which was included as part of the federation's annual fundraising campaign for this year, was originally set to be launched this fall for the 2009 camp season.

However, because two local donors came forward with funding for the project, "we decided we needed to get more kids in this summer," said Polster.

The project is supported by a $125,000 grant from the New York-based Foundation for Jewish Camping, which funded similar pilot projects in seven American locations last summer and has expanded to 21 communities this year.

The Foundation grant, which is underwriting the multi-city project with a $15 million donation from an American donor, matches local funds one-on-one for the first year, and for an undetermined amount the following two years. Toronto is the first Canadian city to launch a program.

Money that has been collected toward the project as part of UJA Federation's annual campaign will be used toward the fall roll-out of the program, said Polster. This summer's launch is being run as a pilot project.

"Each Jewish child should have a right to go to camp, to this place that creates such a joy in celebrating their Judaism," said Jerry Silverman, president of the Foundation for Jewish Camping. The experience results in increased pride in being Jewish, stronger Jewish identity and Jewish continuity, he said.

He noted that camps generally retain at least 75 per cent of their campers each year. "Our mission is to double the number of kids that go to Jewish camp some time in the next five to seven years."

Studies show that alumni of Jewish camps are 50 per cent more likely to join a synagogue, 90 per cent more likely to join a Jewish community centre, and twice as likely to engage in Jewish philanthropy, according to a federation news release.

But, noted Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation, CampRight is "part of a multi-pronged approach. We don't believe Jewish camping alone is a silver bullet."

"There are a variety of efforts on the part of Federation to reach out to Jewish kids and get them excited about their Judaism and connected to their Jewish identity and Jewish community, and each reinforces the other."

Neil Nisker, co-chair of CampRight with Joseph Lebovic and Ab Flatt, said there is a difference between sending kids to a Jewish camp and sending them to a "camp for Jews" where most of the campers are Jewish but the programming lacks a Jewish context.

He believes it's important that the grants be equally accessible to everyone in the Jewish community, including children from wealthy families. If the result is a switch to a Jewish camp, and – down the road – the camper ends up becoming involved in the Jewish community, raising Jewish children, and contributing financially to Jewish causes, then Nisker will feel he has sustained the community, he said.

"Enrolment has been stable, and that's not good enough. We're raising the bar," he said.

Participating camps are all non-profit; approved by the Ontario Camping Association or its equivalent, and affiliated with a synagogue, movement or the federation.

The list of camps includes – in Ontario – Camp Agudah, Camp George, Camp Gasher, Camp Moshava, Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, Camp Ramah, Camp Shalom and Camp Shomria. Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia is also part of CampRight, because it serves many campers from Toronto, said Sokolsky.

Battle the murderers

It was somehow incongruous that the burial, before the start of Shabbat last week, of the eight students who were murdered at Mercat Harav Yeshiva in Jerusalem, took place under high blue skies and warm sunshine. The sheer beauty and idyllic tranquility of the Mount of Olives, where three of the murdered boys were laid to rest, were no balm to the raw rage and aching anguish of the final, horrible moment when the shrouded corpses were placed in the earth and the words of the Kaddish were sobbingly intoned.

There is no balm to soothe the gash in the heart wrought by the frenzied, hate-driven slaughter of innocent youngsters.

As of this writing, no Palestinian or Arab organization had claimed responsibility for the attack, although some media reported over the weekend that the Palestinian Authority believes the murderer, Ala Abu Dhaim of east Jerusalem, acted on instructions from Hamas leaders in Damascus, in coordination with Hezbollah.

Rampaging fire from an automatic weapon aimed at unarmed students in a house of study, prayer and worship is perversely depraved. And yet it is of a piece with tying suicide belts on children; hiding bombs in school yards; using ambulances, baby carriages, and pregnant women as smuggling redoubts for weapons; constantly and deliberately aiming rockets at civilian populations; or using private homes as storage depots for rockets and bases of operation for fighters.

Thus, we are not really surprised at the nature of last week's atrocity by the Israel and Jew-hating terrorists. But we are deeply revolted nonetheless. And all the more so because, as the world saw, the streets of Gaza were filled with joyous crowds celebrating the slaughter of the yeshiva innocents, laughing in twisted consonance with the official statement by Hamas that they "bless[ed] the operation. It will not be the last."

Those who would apologize for, justify or explain the yeshiva murders as a desperate act of reprisal for the civilian deaths in Gaza earlier in the week should know that the attack against Mercat Harav had apparently been planned for some time. Abu Dhaim had a large stockpile of weapons and ammunition in his home, and he had prepared for his "mission" with long hours of surveillance.

Israel's Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni succinctly, and not for the first time, alas, summarized the situation: "The murderous rampage against students... exemplifies all too well the heinous extremism of the fundamentalist foundations Palestinian terrorism is built upon... Despicable attacks such as this must strengthen the free world's understanding of the terrorist threat, in the face of which we must stand resolute and without compromise. Israel expects the nations of the world to support it in its battle against the murderers of students, women and children."

We are gratified to note that Canada is among those nations of the world who publicly and demonstrably support Israel in this vital, destiny-determining battle.

25 years ago in The CJN

Harold Buchwald, chairman of the Canada-Israel Committee, spoke to the Canadian Senate's foreign affairs committee and reported that his reception there was "hostile," with much sympathy being expressed for the Palestinians. Meanwhile, a Gallup Poll commissioned by the American Jewish Committee, said that Israel has regained the support it lost among Americans after the Sabra-Shatila massacre in Lebanon in 1982.

Angered by Bernier's reaction

My blood boils as I read "Canada 'concerned' over Israeli measures," (CJN, March 6). It is not surprising to me that Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier would respond in this way. He has not responded nor acted in the case of Saul Itzhayek who has been in prison in India for 10 months. [Itzhayek is a businessman who was taken into Indian custody when he attempted to cross into the country from Nepal last May.] Neither has Bernier done anything to protect other Canadians who are in jail around the world for no just cause. How could he possibly imagine that any country would want to protect its citizens? It makes me wonder what would happen if someone stood outside his house day after day throwing firebombs at it. Would he want to retaliate and try to stop the perpetrators, or would he simply ask them "to comply with their obligations under international law"? Give me a break, Mr. Bernier.

Qassams are devastatingly accurate

In the article "Canada 'concerned' over Israeli measures," (CJN, March 6), Hamas' missiles are referred to as "homemade" Qassam rockets. This suggests that these are primitive devices that are constructed in the homes of the terrorists and the inference having been made, launched into Israel in the hope that they will arrive. These are far from "homemade" and are reaching their designated targets with devastating accuracy.

If you are going to report on events in and around Israel, please ensure that, at the very least, objectivity is achieved.

Response to editorial (1)

Congratulations on your publishing the editorial "Israel's options in Gaza," (CJN, March 6), which promotes the idea of ceasefire in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Hamas has often proposed ceasefires, which Israel has rejected. By publishing editorials and articles such as this, you contribute to the pursuit of peace, rather than a continuous bloody killing spree that never did one thing in changing the rockets fired on Sderot.

Palestinian propaganda affecting youth

I could scarcely believe that I was reading a CJN opinion column in the Feb. 7 issue ("Israel should re-think policy in Gaza"). Jesse Mintz's dilemma of whose side to take in the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians is shocking. The mere fact that he has difficulty in discerning between the various sources for accuracy is alarming to me. While I am admittedly a partisan for Israel, I do believe in balanced freedom of speech.

The Palestinian public relations campaign, which started after the second intifadah, has had a profound impact on the worldwide opinion, as evidenced by Durban I and Durban II, to name but two examples. This liberally funded campaign is intended to rally the support of the global community for the Palestinian misfortune and the oppressive nature of the Israeli occupation. The believers are not relegated to the non-Jewish community, as evidenced by Mintz's article. If the Palestinian propaganda has started to have an impact on the outlook of Jewish youth, then the Canadian community must act without delay in educating the next generation before it's too late.

I also hold The CJN accountable for printing of such misguided thoughts. As a proud and longstanding supporter of Israel and the Montreal Jewish community, I find it reprehensible that the paper would print such a disturbing opinion. Freedom of the press aside, I expect the voice of the Canadian Jewish community to adopt and protect an unconditional position in support of Israel. The publication of these types of opinions can only result in more Diaspora Jews to look for ways to rationalize the aggressive, terrorist actions of the Palestinians, whose singular goal is the annihilation of Israel.

Perspectives

How will Israel respond?

By AMOS HAREL

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

After a week of failed efforts to settle scores with Israel for the casualties caused by its operation in the Gaza Strip, Palestinian terror organizations scored a string of successes last Thursday.

The day began with the bombing of an army jeep along the Gaza border, which was videotaped by Islamic Jihad. It continued with a direct rocket hit on a house in Sderot that wounded several people, and ended with the deadly shooting attack in Jerusalem's Mercatz Harav Yeshiva, the flagship institute of the religious Zionist movement. The latter was the worst terror attack to take place inside Israel in almost two years.

It provided a grim reminder of those days at the height of the second intifadah, when Jerusalem was hit by a string of murderous terror attacks. What Israel's security services have accomplished in the West Bank over the last three years is a virtual miracle in professional terms: they succeeded in bringing terror down to a very low – even tolerable – level.

It's commonplace to claim that terror can't be defeated militarily, but in the West Bank, Israel has come as close as humanly possible – closer than anyone else has come in any other similar conflict elsewhere on the globe in recent years.

The success of the attack against Mercatz

Harav shows that the terrorist infrastructure in the West Bank is still alive and kicking. And the terrorists' motivation has apparently been spurred by their heavy losses in Gaza, as well as a desire to avenge the killing of senior Hezbollah operative Imad Mughniyah (a group called the "Mughniyah Brigades" was the first to claim responsibility for the Jerusalem attack, though the truth of this claim is doubtful).

The Israeli defence establishment received several warnings about plans to perpetrate terror attacks inside Israel last week, but none, it seems, about move freely throughout the country, making it easier for them to gather information about a target like Mercatz Harav, which is the one in Jerusalem. And that makes sense: In recent years, Israel's superb intelligence network in the West Bank has enabled the security services to foil almost all attacks about which they receive even the tiniest scrap of information.

As of press time last week, the terrorist who perpetrated the shooting had not yet been identified. However, it seems likely that residents of east Jerusalem either perpetrated or abetted the attack. Because east Jerusalem residents carry Israeli identity cards, they can located deep in west Jerusalem. But it's also important to remember that nearly six years after Israel started building the separation fence, it's still far from finished. Thus, it's still possible to enter Jerusalem from the West Bank.

The Jerusalem attack will most likely prompt only pinpoint responses: arresting those in the terrorist's immediate circle, identifying the cell that sent him and then eliminating the cell.

The closure on the West Bank will probably be tightened for a few days, and additional checkpoints will be set up. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's demand that Israel reduce the number of checkpoints in the West Bank will evidently have to wait. Security will also need to be beefed up in Jerusalem, lest the terrorists try to build on their success by launching a string of attacks that would undermine the sense of security of the city's residents.

Even if there is no direct connection between the attack in Jerusalem and the situation in Gaza, each arena influences the other. Anger at the attack in Jerusalem might spur the government to take harsher measures in Gaza, especially if it turns out that Hamas was involved in the attack. Moreover, given that Mercatz Harav is the ideological bastion of the religious right, the incident might spur revenge attacks by Jews.

The new year is just over two months old, and the number of Israelis killed by Palestinian terror – 15 – is higher than the total for all of last year (13). That does not bode well for the future.

To the westerner who 'understands' the terrorist

By BRADLEY BURSTON

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

To the westerner who "understands" the terrorist: Spare us the explanations. Spare us the learned, sociology-drenched justifications. Spare us the reasons why you "get" Palestinians when they gun Jews down in cold blood.

Spare us the chapter and verse on how the plight of the Palestinians is at the root of Islamic terrorism the world over, and if the Palestinians were to receive full justice, Islamic terrorism would pass from the world.

Spare us.

You may well believe, with the blind faith of the hopeful and the fear-stricken, that when these people are through with the Jews, they won't come for you.

Think again.

Spare us the post-modernism and the radical chic and the guff.

Open your eyes.

When a gunman walks into a Jewish religious seminary at the main entrance to the part of Jerusalem which has been Jewish since 1948, and which was stolen from no one, pay attention.

When he opens fire on religious students hunched over books in a library, firing and firing until blood soaks holy book bindings and open pages of Talmud and the whole of the floor, pay close attention to the reactions of the self-styled people of faith who run Hamas.

Spare us the conclusion that the only reason Hamas kills Jews, and that its underlying motive for encouraging others to do the same, is to force Israel to agree to a ceasefire.

Spare us the "Israel's policies are responsible for the bloodshed" and "the seminary is, after all, an ideological bastion and symbol of the religious right" and all the other scholarly, arrogant, condescending and amoral ways of saying "they had it coming to them."

Spare us the understanding for the motivations of the mass murderer who kills with God on his lips. Spare us the understanding of the words of the Hamas official who says that after all the Israeli killings of Palestinians, the Jerusalem killings are "our only joy."

Spare us the sight of the thanksgiving prayers for the great victory, prayers that began in Gaza City mosques just after the slaughter of the Jews.

Spare us the sight of the sweets being handed out by little children to motorists in passing cars in Gaza – sweets to celebrate the young Jews dead on the floor, the young Jews dead at their desks, the Jews killed for the crime of being Jews in that place of study and worship.

Spare us the righteousness of those who condemned Baruch Goldstein for entering a holy place in Hebron in 1994 with an assault rifle and murdering Palestinians, but who can understand why a Palestinian might do the very same thing.

Open your eyes.

Last week, when Israeli forces drove into Gaza, and some 120 Palestinians were killed, many of them were gunmen, but with children making up another sixth of the total, one grieving father spoke with quiet eloquence, saying "Other places in the world, when this happens, there is a great outcry. When this happens here, the world is silent. No one cares."

He's right. The world has grown content to let Palestinians die. The reason is not simple callousness. And it's not, as Hamas proclaims to its followers in Gaza, that the Jews control the world media and world finance, and thus western governments as well.

The reason is terrorism.

The world has grown weary of the Islamist's creed, that only the armed struggle can resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and that the only proper resolution is the end of Israel.

Even the Israeli left, which for decades championed the Palestinians with courage and determination, has, in large part, had it with the Palestinians.

The reason is terrorism. The reason is murder. The reason is that the rulers of Gaza are people who see an intrinsic value in the killing of Jews for the sake of increasing the number of dead Jews in the world.

The rulers of Gaza cannot bring themselves to accept the concept of sharing the Holy Land with the Jews.

The best that the rulers of Gaza can do is to bring an end to hope among their own people, and ours as well.

They believe that the Jewish state is temporary and that the Jews will soon abandon it to Islamic rule.

After all this time, you'd think they'd know the Jews a little better.

There are no strangers in Israel

I can be an annoying rabbi. Every Shabbat, I harangue my congregants to greet any new faces and say hello to visitors to the synagogue. To me, a community that isn't welcoming isn't a true community.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Unfortunately, we've lost the art of being welcoming. People are uncomfortable making small talk with new people. Greeting strangers is actually taboo in larger cities. Urbanites mumble a perfunctory "hi" to salesclerks and don't dare make eye contact with others on the street. In the suburbs, neighbours barely know each other's names.

Perhaps we're too busy, or just too rude, to say hello. In our Blackberry-laptop-cellphone culture, we're always occupied with anything or anyone but the person standing in front of us. Communities are now "virtual" – anonymous megabytes masquerading as true companionship. Why say hello when you can post greetings on Facebook?

But living in a culture of remote controls and remote friendships leaves us hungry for true community.

The Talmud relates that Rabbi Yochanan Ben Zakai made a point of offering greetings to strangers. His greetings weren't just an expression of one rabbi's sensitivity. They reflected man's existential need to connect with the people around him. Man, the social animal, needs to say hello to keep his soul alive. Indeed, TV shows that feature small towns like the fictional Mayberry, and friendly gathering places like the bar in Cheers, derive their popularity from our hunger for true community.

The commuter who rides the bus with her face in a book and looks away from other people on the elevator can turn on the TV and vicariously experience a much friendlier place.

Israel is one place where community values live on. The old proverb, "Strangers are just friends you haven't met yet," could be its national motto. People strike up conversations everywhere – taxis, restaurants, bus stops. Israel feels like Mayberry. It's like a small town stretched over a small homeland.

The secret to Israel's warmth might be related to exile. Maybe, after long being second-class citizens, Jews are happy to finally belong. Maybe years of homelessness and wandering have made Jews better hosts. Perhaps Israel's warm spirit reflects the giddy joy of a people delighted to be in a homeland they can truly call home.

On a trip to Israel last month, my wife and I happened upon Mira, a jewelry maker with a store in downtown Jerusalem. Long after a necklace was chosen and the purchase made, we chatted with her, discussing our lives, families and values.

It was another country and another language, yet nothing got lost in translation.

We immediately connected, because in Israel, there are no strangers. We all come from the same shtetl and are happy to finally be home again.

Canada has made a good start on Durban

What a pleasure it is to hail a Canadian foreign policy decision that's been made boldly, was stated clearly, and is already having an impact.

Canada's decision to boycott "Durban II," the United Nations' second World Conference Against Racism, scheduled for 2009, made Canada the leader in this fight against anti-Zionism, anti-Semitism and racism. In 2001, under Liberal prime minister Jean Chrétien, Canada dithered as the important conference against racism in Durban, South Africa, became an anti-Israel and anti-Jewish hatefest. This time, Canada was the first nation to repudiate the charade and to refuse to fund NGOs who behaved so miserably last time.

Following Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper's moral move, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni announced a more conditional boycott. Hailing "Canada's courage," Livni told the Global Forum to Combat Anti-Semitism that Israel would not participate "unless it is proven that the conference will not be used as a platform for further anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic behaviour."

The United States has proceeded more cautiously, considering that President George W. Bush doesn't want to handcuff his successor. Still, in December, the United States voted against the UN budget because part of the money would fund Durban II. And the Americans have also talked about boycotting the conference's preparatory meetings, which were so vitriolic last time. These prep sessions will probably be equally toxic, considering that Libya is chairing, Cuba is vice-chair, Iran is on the committee, and the biased UN human rights council backs the whole effort. U.S. Jews need to ask their presidential candidates to promise to oppose Durban, and to fight the broader issue of UN bias.

But the effort must move beyond the Canadians, Americans and Israelis. Durban's poison cannot be fought alone. Leaders must convince the Europeans and the Africans to avoid another debacle.

The organized Jewish community and Israel should invite Mary Robinson to lead the effort to convince Europe. Robinson is the former UN High Commissioner of Human Rights who presided over the first Durban disaster. In the waning days of the conference, she finally denounced the anti-Semitism on display there. Since then, especially when activists have protested her many academic honours, she has insisted that she did all she could to stop the ugliness in 2001.

Addressing the graduates at Emory University in 2004, where there was an uproar about her appearance similar to the uproar I started over her honorary doctorate at McGill University, Robinson proclaimed: "Let me just say again that I find the very concept of anti-Semitism repulsive, that I have taken action against it all my life, that my only motivation at all times has been to further the cause of human rights for all people." She also acknowledged the "hurt and pain, which the Durban process evoked."

A timely prize for a powerful voice

Sitting at a session of the international symposium to combat global anti-Semitism, organized by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, I felt – rather than heard – a hum. My cellphone was vibrating in my pocket. Ordinarily, I power down during meetings and conferences. But here, in Jerusalem, it seemed like an affront to the national ethos to turn off my cellphone for any reason at all.

As surreptitiously as possible, I glanced at the display: 4:03 p.m. It was my brother calling from Be'er Sheva. At the first opportunity, I stepped into a corridor to return the call.

His voice came through, excited.

"Ida Fink won Pras Yisrael! They announced it on the news at four. I knew you'd want to know right away."

Pras Yisrael – the Israel Prize – is an award conferred by the Israeli government to honour excellence and lifetime achievement in a rotating set of fields. The most prestigious award in the country, Pras Yisrael was established in 1953 and is awarded annually. The award is announced some time before Yom Ha'atzmaut, Independence Day, and conferred on that day in Jerusalem in the presence of the president, the chief justice of the Supreme Court, and the Knesset. This year – Israel's 60th – Ida Fink was selected to receive the Israel Prize for literature, in recognition of the excellence and significance of her work, joining the ranks of such luminaries as Shmuel Yosef Agnon, Aharon Appelfeld, and Leah Goldberg.

Readers of this column who are familiar with Fink's subtle and luminous writing are nodding in approval. My students at York University are gripped by her work, particularly her stunning collection of short stories, A Scrap of Time, finding it powerful and profound.

I phoned her immediately to congratulate her. I had been sipping coffee with her at her Ramat Aviv apartment only a few days earlier. She had no inkling then that she was up for this important honour. She learned of it a mere two hours before my brother heard it broadcast on the radio.

Fink was born in Zbaraz, Poland, in 1921 to an educated, professional family that was well-integrated into Polish culture. At the time the Nazis invaded Poland in September, 1939, Fink was 18 years old, preparing for a career as a pianist and studying literature and music.

Her studies were abruptly terminated, and the family was soon confined to the Zbaraz Ghetto. In 1942, she and her younger sister accepted false identity papers and left the ghetto. A fair-haired, blue-eyed young woman, Fink did not look identifiably Jewish. The two sisters survived the war by concealing their identities. Fink's novel, The Journey, is a fictionalized

Robinson now has an opportunity to expunge the stain on her record from the first Durban conference and prove the sincerity of her subsequent announcements. If she took the lead in spurring the Europeans to avoid the mistakes of last time – including monitoring the preparatory conferences – she would help undo the damage that the first conference did to the cause of human rights.

Similarly, Africans – and African-Americans – must be mobilized on this issue. The sad truth is that the ugly, unnecessary, irrelevant demonization of Israel and Jews that occurred in Durban, 2001, distracted many from the important work against racism the conference had convened to fight. I spoke to Africans who viewed the whole fight over Israel as a smokescreen to help Europeans avoid being held accountable for centuries of racism. Israeli, Canadian, and American diplomats should send a clear message to their African colleagues. The Africans should tell their Middle Eastern friends to keep the focus on racism – meaning black-white issues – rather than derailling the conference with an anti-Semitic food fight. In the United States, leaders such as former secretary of state Colin Powell – who was so disappointed by the outcome last time – should be invited to make a worldwide call to keep the focus on racism and away from Israeli-Arab or Jewish-Muslim tensions.

Canada has taken an honourable and heroic stand. Canada has made an important start. The time has come to start building the right coalitions of conscience to avoid another unconscionable hatefest – in the formal conference and among NGOs as well.

account of the war years.

After the war, Fink married, and in 1957, she moved to Israel with her husband and daughter, setting up a home in Holon. She knew not a word of Hebrew. At the age of 36, she began to learn the aleph bet.

She worked at Yad Vashem recording the testimonies of other Holocaust survivors. At home, she began to craft short stories about wartime experiences and their aftermath. Her stories capture the daily details of life and death under the threat of genocide, as well as the interplay of memory, bereavement and trauma. Her speciality is short stories – slivers of remembrance, some as brief as three pages – that focus on moments of revelation and moments of radical change.

Early on, publishers rejected her stories, telling her that her writing was too subdued for her subject. Fink persisted, developing a voice that was subtle yet powerful and haunting.

When her first collection of stories was published in the 1980s, it earned high praise from reviewers, and she has gone on to receive many prestigious international awards, including the first Anne Frank Prize for Literature, the Moravia Prize, the Yad Vashem Prize, and now, Pras Yisrael. At 87, she is in frail health, so the prize is timely.

I have known Fink since the early 1990s and have the pleasure and honour of considering her a friend and mentor. If you have yet to read her stories, let this award prompt you to do so now.

Hamas has squandered its gains

Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement, formed its first government two years ago this month after posting a victory in the Palestinian parliamentary elections. Much to everyone's surprise, Hamas, having boycotted the previous election in 2005, won 76 of 132 seats, crushing its secular nationalist rival, Fatah.

In retrospect, Hamas' triumph should not have been surprising. In municipal elections in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip leading up to the national elections, Hamas trounced Fatah. Hamas fared well due in large part to Fatah's complacency. Fatah, founded by Yasser Arafat in the 1950s and regarded as the touchstone of Palestinian nationalism, had drifted into a cycle of self-satisfaction, cronyism, mismanagement and corruption.

Fatah's faults were magnified in the wake of the 1993 Oslo peace process, which mandated the establishment of the Palestinian Authority. Critics accused Fatah of converting the PA into a fiefdom, siphoning funds from the international community into offshore bank accounts, neglecting the needs of the people and failing to win meaningful concessions from Israel in peace talks.

Hamas, thanks to the fairly frugal lifestyle of its leaders and the respect it attained through its web of schools, clinics, mosques and libraries, was widely seen as a corruption-free movement whose one and only interest was the well-being of the Palestinians.

In contesting the January 2006 legislative election, Hamas, founded by Sheikh Ahmed Yassin in December 1987 at the outset of the first Palestinian uprising, campaigned on a platform of reform and change, a populist slogan of immense appeal.

Two years on, though, Hamas appears to have squandered much of its popularity. As Hamas marked the 20th anniversary of its founding three months ago, a poll released by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, an independent polling agency based in the West Bank, found that Hamas has lost ground. Were new elections to be held, the pollsters discovered, Fatah would beat Hamas by a margin of 49 per cent to 31 per cent, while Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the PA, would defeat Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister, by a 56 to 36 per cent margin.

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

It's not hard to understand why Palestinians are generally disillusioned with Hamas, an organization dedicated to Israel's eradication and bent on replacing it with a fundamentalist Islamic state.

Since Hamas' swift and violent takeover of Gaza last June, following the breakdown of its tenuous coalition government with Fatah, Israel has branded Gaza an "enemy entity," sealed all border crossings, imposed a blockade and curtailed fuel and electrical supplies. Only food, pharmaceuticals and medical equipment have been allowed in.

Gaza's usually anemic economy has spiralled into a tailspin and poverty has deepened. By all accounts, 80 per cent of its 1.5 million inhabitants, mainly refugees crammed into 360 square kilometres of land, live a hand-to-mouth existence. The Palestinians are suffering, and last week eight British human rights organizations said that the humanitarian situation in Gaza has not been as worse since 1967. But the Israeli government will only lift the siege once Hamas recognizes Israel's existence, renounces terrorism and abides by agreements signed by Israel and the PA.

Ismail Haniyeh

Hamas, having flatly refused, has instead offered Israel a long-term truce and warned it may launch a third uprising. In the meantime, Hamas continues to fire Qassam rockets, mortars and Katyushas into Israeli border towns, heightening tensions and setting the stage for an Israeli invasion of Gaza.

Nearly two months ago, in an attempt to sabotage the blockade, Hamas blew up sections of the walled barrier in Rafah separating Gaza from Egypt. Hundreds of thousands of Palestinians poured into Egypt, buying $150 million worth of goods before the border was resealed 12 days later.

Israel was of two minds about this unsettling event. On the one hand, it was concerned that the rush of Palestinians into Egypt might spell finis to the blockade. On the other hand, Israel secretly hoped that Egypt – which controlled Gaza from 1949 to 1967 – would take responsibility for its affairs. Dashing all such notions, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak retorted that Israel's "dream" of "throwing" Gaza into Egypt's lap was a non-starter.

Indeed, Egypt adopted a tougher policy toward the Rafah crossing, saying that further breaches would not be tolerated and that violators would be shot.

Hamas has demanded a role in administering the Rafah crossing, but it's debatable whether Israel will agree. Prior to the latest series of events, the border point was controlled, on the Gaza side, by the PA in conjunction with European Union monitors. Israel supervised proceedings by video camera.

This is not the only problem that must be resolved. As part of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in the summer of 2005, Egypt stationed 750 police officers in the border region. When Palestinian radical groups in Gaza – such as Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade – began shelling Israeli towns and kibbutzim, Egypt offered to double its police force in the Rafah area. Israel balked, saying that its 1979 peace treaty with Egypt limited the number of armed Egyptian personnel that could be deployed along the border. Given Hamas' success in breaching the border, Israel may yet reconsider its policy. In the meantime, Israel is building a separation fence straddling the Egyptian border.

Alternatively, Israel has another option. It can reach a ceasefire agreement, or hudna, with Hamas. Mindful that Hamas has taken credit for a succession of suicide bombings that have killed nearly 500 Israelis since 1994, Israel opposes a truce.

Yet, judging by a poll released two weeks ago, 64 per cent of Israelis believe that Israel should conduct direct talks with Hamas.

A hudna, or temporary truce, would be nothing new. In June 2003, thanks to pressure exerted by the PA and Egypt, Hamas unilaterally declared a ceasefire. It ended after 45 days, obliterated by a round of cross-border warfare pitting Israel against Hamas.

Less than six months later, Hamas proposed a 10-year truce in exchange for a complete Israeli withdrawal from the territories and the establishment of a Palestinian state. Israel rejected the offer as a smokescreen, a thinly disguised attempt by Hamas to regroup, rearm and prepare for a new round in the future.

Shortly before Israel's withdrawal from Gaza, Hamas again observed a shaky ceasefire. But it, too, broke down, only to be briefly revived in November 2006.

Last April, after another outburst of fighting, Hamas repudiated the truce and launched a barrage of rockets and mortars into Israel. Five months ago, Hamas renewed its call for a truce, but Israel dismissed it as a ploy.

Last month, Hamas had a change of heart after having rejected a proposal by the PA to broker a truce. "We are ready to study any plan or initiative that can stop the current escalation in Gaza," Haniyeh said in reference to the upsurge of fighting. Ahmed Youssef, Haniyeh's adviser, said that a truce was possible if Israel lifted the blockade and reopened all border crossings.

More recently, Hamas said it would agree to a truce only if Israel ends all military activity in the West Bank.

Last week, after the latest surge of fighting, during which four Israelis and more than 100 Palestinians were killed, Mahmoud Abbas offered to mediate a truce.

Israel has ruled out a truce, at least for now. But some Israelis, such as minister without portfolio Ami Ayalon and the former director general of the foreign ministry, David Kimche, favour a long-term ceasefire.

It remains to be seen what approach Israel will choose. But this much is certain: Hamas, though it has lost some popularity since last summer, will continue to be an important player in Israel's turbulent relations with the Palestinians.

JDL head sues Arab group for defamation

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The leader of the Jewish Defence League (JDL) in Canada is suing the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF) for defamation.

Lawyers for Meir Weinstein advised CAF president Khalid Mouammar in a letter last week that the suit is being launched over a document posted on the organization's website that suggests Weinstein is "part of a right-wing terrorist group, a racist and a supremacist."

The letter adds: "The references to Mr. Weinstein are false and untrue. The damages to Mr. Weinstein as a result of your libelous statements... are substantial."

Weinstein reactivated the JDL a few months ago after the group had been dormant for several years.

The document that prompted the lawyers' letter ran on the CAF website last week, but was subsequently removed. It's a copy of a statement issued by Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), a student-based organization active on university campuses. The document linked the JDL to an "arson attack [that] targeted the bulletin board of EAST (the East African Students Group), which carried posters and information against racism, Islamophobia and military occupation."

"This attack follows the re-activation in Canada of the JDL, the only Jewish group labelled by the FBI as a 'right-wing terrorist group,'" the SPHR news release states. "On Feb. 4 at Ryerson University during events held by black and Palestinian students, around 20 JDL members harassed students attending the lecture without police interference. This sent a message to the JDL and other Jewish supremacist individuals that it is acceptable to target visible minorities in our cities."

SPHR also called on Toronto police to "investigate any links that could be made between the attack on the East African students group and the reconstitution of the JDL in Canada. Inaction on the part of the police will send the wrong message to those who perpetrated this heinous act."

Weinstein, who is mentioned by name in the SPHR release, said about 50 JDL supporters gathered peacefully outside the Ryerson lecture and handed out written material. He said he plans to also sue SPHR, but started with CAF because "they are the main Arab organization that meets with government officials and the most respected organization in Canada."

"The purpose is the have them stop spreading false allegations about myself and the JDL."

Weinstein said he recently reconstituted the JDL in Canada because of concerns over growing anti-Semitism and anti-Israel agitation on campuses.

"We have taken the initiative to combat the spread of hate on campuses and cities in Canada," he said. "The allegations on their website [attempt] to degrade our organization so that anti-Israel incitement can continue without opposition."

"No one will be allowed to silence us. We're going to exercise our lawful, democratic rights as Canadian citizens to stop hate," he said.

CAF executive director Mohamed Boudjenane said the organization had received the lawyers' letter.

"We'll look at it and we'll definitely react to it," he said.

NCSY program mixes Shakespeare, Judaism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

One year ago, Nicole Gruz and Avital Zelter would not have believed that a high school English course could change their lives.

The two 17-year-old public school students, took part in the National Conference of Synagogue Youth's (NCSY) Shakespeare in Jerusalem summer program, in which they toured Israel for four weeks in July while taking a fully accredited English literature course.

Gruz, a Grade 11 student at Stephen Lewis Secondary School, said that although her family is from Israel, she had never travelled there independently, and she got an entirely new perspective of the country.

Led by English teacher David Wagman – head of English at Westmount Collegiate in Thornhill and at Ner Israel Yeshiva – and NCSY's Shoshana Neuman who directed last year's trip, 20 students spent six hours a day travelling to every corner of the country and incorporating it into their English studies.

"Everywhere we went turned into an English lesson," Gruz said. "While on top of Masada, we wrote an essay about what we saw, and then we had a unit on anti-Semitism and the Holocaust before going to Yad Vashem."

Zelter, a Grade 12 student whose family is also Israeli, said she had been to the Jewish state 11 times, "but never like this. I've always had the 'Israeli experience' but never the Jewish experience. We went to historical places and learned the background of our religion. I got an English credit and a love of Judaism in four weeks."

Gruz said she is motivated to return to Israel to continue her studies when she graduates. "After this experience I want to learn more and more. It ended up so much more than an English credit."

Neuman said the study portion of the trip was taken very seriously by the students. "All assignments had to be completed, and on the days that were set aside for students to do school work, we were always there to help out. They received a lot of attention so their skills improved. They got so much out of the course in an inviting way."

Dana Grossman, director of NCSY summer programs, said that many teens take high school credits abroad, "but this is the only one in Israel. It is important to learn about our heritage."

This year's program, which will be headed by a different teacher, runs from June 30 to July 28, costs $5,990, and scholarships are available. The course includes sightseeing in all parts of Israel and a literature program that includes Canadian Jewish poets such as A.M. Klein, Leonard Cohen and Irving Layton. Students will also study Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, and works by Amos Oz and Shalom Aleichem.

For more information, call Grossman at 905-761-6279 or visit www.ncsysummer.com.

Canadian Jews pedal hard for Israeli hospital

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

There was a sense of camaraderie and hope last week at Adath Israel Congregation as scores of charity-minded cyclists and their sponsors gathered to celebrate their fundraising accomplishments at a gala in honour of Israel's Alyn Hospital.

Located in Jerusalem, Alyn is one of the world's foremost pediatric rehabilitation centres, focusing specifically on treating children with special needs for the past 76 years.

Last week's Toronto event, titled "Memories and Dreams Night," was jointly organized by both the American and Canadian Friends of Alyn charities—the latter is a burgeoning support chapter of the former—and marked the first time members of the Canadian group were formally feted for their charitable work.

Canadian participants raised $500,000 of the $3 million raised for the hospital last year in the annual Wheels of Love bike ride, a five-day trek across Israel.

To qualify for a spot on the tour, each rider must guarantee $2,000 in sponsorship and pay a registration fee for the trip to Israel.

The ride was started in 2000 by nine Israeli cyclists who wanted to raise money for the hospital and has since expanded to some 500 riders from 13 countries, including 75 from Canada last year (up from 57 in 2006).

The increased Canadian presence drew the eye of Cathy Lanyard, executive director of the New York-based charity, who travelled to Toronto to be at the event and congratulate the Canuck riders.

Also present at the event was Israel's consul general to Toronto, Amir Gissin.

Joel Kula, director for Alyn Canada and Israel Ellis, co-chair of the event, have been the driving volunteer force behind the Canadian Alyn grassroots movement for the past few years.

"We're trying to increase awareness of Alyn," Kula told The C.J.N. "The hospital has needs 365 days a year."

Kula said he first became aware of the hospital through his participation on an action committee at Beit Rayim Synagogue.

"We stumbled on Alyn on the Internet and immediately started allotting funds to it," he said.

Like many others at the Adath Israel event, both Kula and Ellis were proud repeat riders.

Ellis recalled his riding experiences.

"There's times when you're on the bike and you just want to get off," he said. "But as the challenges intensified, I thought about the children of Alyn... and how every day of their lives represents a challenge greater than mine."

He added that the reason for hosting a Canadian Alyn event was to "establish a stronger group to advocate for Canadian riders and consolidate the idea of 'chevrah.'"

Lanyard told The C.J.N. she was in town not only to attend the event, but also to promote another Alyn initiative called the Mitzvah of Love, which encourages school children to sponsor events to support the hospital.

"Wheels of Love has put a face to Alyn. We have ordinary people who push themselves beyond their normal maximums, because they care and they can," Lanyard said. "[Mitzvah of Love] is about empowering a kid to embrace their own [charitable instincts]. It's about healing the world one step at a time."

After a video presentation that showed the work Alyn does with severely disabled children, Gissin addressed the crowd.

But instead of talking politics—his usual topic—Gissin opened up on a personal level to discuss how his role as a father to a child with special needs was influenced by what he's seen at Alyn.

"Twenty-five years ago... I spent three months visiting a close friend in Alyn. While there, I saw a bed with a baby girl who had been abandoned by her family because of terrible disabilities," Gissin said.

"She had a life expectancy of less than a year. But Alyn staff took it upon themselves to adopt this child. She was carried by nurses all hours of the day. That was a gift of love [and] it was the first time I was exposed to what love can do. It was a lesson for life."

He continued, choked by emotion: "I've done some important things in my life. But before everything else, I'm a father. Nothing has prepared me better for [fathering a child with special needs] than that experience. Nothing. They deserve your support."

The next Wheels of Love ride is scheduled for Nov. 9 to 13 in Jerusalem.

Charges dropped in anti-Semitic vandalism case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There's an uncharacteristic weariness in Alan Schwarz's voice, but disappointment piled on top of disappointment can do that to a man.

Last week, Schwarz and the rest of his family were handed a double dose of bad news. First they were told by the Crown attorney in Durham region that charges will be dropped against an alleged young offender who had been charged in connection with the trashing of their rental property and its vandalism with anti-Semitic graffiti.

Next their insurer called to let them know their policy did not cover the $131,000 damage caused in the rampage, which left the building in downtown Bowmanville "destroyed" and covered with racist epithets.

Swastikas were painted on the front door and on the inside, along with, "F...k Jews," "Kike," "white power," and "SS."

No one, it seems, is responsible. Schwarz told The C.N., and his family has been left alone, "on an island," forced to deal with an incident police have been unwilling to investigate as a hate crime. "We're bearing the brunt and we did nothing wrong," he said.

Adding insult to injury, "For Sale" signs on the property have been removed three times.

Schwarz feels let down, by the Crown and police in particular. "The day it happened, police said it was not a hate crime. What was it?" he asked.

"The whole idea of this house being destroyed as a rental property is secondary to the swastika on the front door," Schwarz said. "All this horrible racist stuff that will go unpunished because no one investigated it as hate crime."

"The [Jewish] community ought to be concerned. This is a very bad message. Someone can write swastikas, KKK, white power [in your house] and you're left to your own avail."

In mid January, Durham Regional Police laid criminal charges against a youth in connection with the incident.

The young offender, who cannot be identified, was charged under sec. 441 of the Criminal Code with causing damage to a rental property, an indictable offense that carries a maximum sentence of five years in jail.

At the time, police said following through to a conviction was problematic unless witnesses stepped forward. "I have no doubt we have the right person. The trouble is finding witnesses," said Const. Kevin Stuart of Durham Regional Police.

Stuart said a longstanding tenant had turned the home into a virtual "flop-house" with an open door allowing all kinds of people to come and go.

The problem is "proving who actually did the damage," he said.

Assistant Crown Attorney Michael Hill said at the time that if a conviction were attained, "the ugly, hateful things on the wall are something that could form part of the submission on sentencing."

However, Schwarz was told last week that following a pre-trial meeting that included the Crown, defence counsel and a judge, it was decided there was insufficient evidence to proceed.

Reena fundraiser planned for April 5

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The co-chairs of the fourth annual Not Just Another Saturday Night are hoping to make this year's event bigger and better to raise money for Reena, an Ontario-based agency for people with developmental disabilities.

Over the past three years, Not Just Another Saturday Night has raised more than $75,000 for Reena services, including after-school programs, summer programs and respite care.

Steven Weisz, who is co-chairing the event with Adam Henechowitz and Zach Goldstein, hopes that this year's party, which is being held at the Dominion Club in Toronto on April 5, will help them pass the $100,000 mark.

"We've set out a conservative goal of raising $30,000 for this event," said Weisz, 29, who has been volunteering for Reena for the past three years.

He said they hope to attract 600 people to the evening, which will include an exclusive cocktail reception, an art show, live entertainment, such as cigar rolling and a handwriting analyst, and opportunities to win great prizes.

When Weisz volunteered three years ago, he and Henechowitz created Reena's New Leadership division, a volunteer group of young professionals.

"It all stemmed from the need to get young people, as we call them, the new leaders of the community, involved in fundraising for what we feel is a very worthy cause," Weisz said.

"We targeted people between the ages of 21 to 40, young professionals, who shared our common goal of wanting to get more involved and working with and helping people with developmental disabilities and creating a better life for them. Adam and I have no members who use the services, but we just feel that it is a great cause and the right thing to do."

Henechowitz said that he got involved with Reena six years ago after graduating from the University of Western Ontario.

"I had a background in health sciences and I started working for Reena because it was in the same field. I was working with the clients directly... I left there for another job, and then I started volunteering."

Although Henechowitz has been organizing fundraising events for years, he said he is most excited about the committee he is currently working with.

"We have a lot of volunteers on this year's committee that really believe in giving back to the community and getting involved even if you don't have personal connections to Reena. I've... done a ton of events in the community and this is one of the best committees we've put together - very dedicated people who are very dedicated to giving back."

Henechowitz said he hopes this year's Not Just Another Saturday Night will outdo the last three.

"The party starts at 7 p.m. with a VIP reception. During the VIP reception, we have an art show, where some local artists can come and exhibit their art. We've invited our sponsors and those with VIP tickets to come a little bit early for hors d'oeuvres and drinks and to look at the art. That will last until about 9 p.m., when we'll open the doors to the general public and have a cocktail reception. There will be live music and a DJ," he said.

The money raised will go towards Reena's New Leadership Endowment Fund. Weisz said they hope to fund programming with the interest from the endowment fund.

Although Reena isn't an organization that caters strictly to Jews, most of its volunteers are Jewish.

"Reena is open to the general public and the community of all denominations and faiths, but it's core values are consistent with Jewish values," Weisz said.

"We service the whole community, but the fundraising is done by Jewish people and that is in large part due to the fact that we believe that giving back and tikkun olam is part of our job and part of the reason that we're here. That's what we need to do and that is our obligation to the community."

Cohen learned to live with disability in rehab

On June 29, 1992, he and several pilots were being transported to an air base when the chauffeur fell asleep at the wheel and lost control of the car.

One of the pilots broke his arm and the others sustained scratches. The driver walked away unscathed.

Cohen broke his back.

"The only thing I remember was waking up in the hospital a day later," he said.

Suddenly, his dream of rising to the rank of a commander was shattered.

"It was a big blow," said Cohen, whose first name means sparrow in English. "I was like a bird, but my wings were clipped."

He sank into a depression. For a man who had always been active, the prospect of being a paraplegic was hard to bear. "It was a hell of a problem."

Cohen, who had been a scuba diver, kick boxer, mountain climber and sailor, and who loved the rush of adrenaline, was now disabled.

At rehab, however, he learned to live with and overcome his disability.

He also returned to the sports he had enjoyed as an able-bodied person.

"I'm still the same Dror," he said. "Some things change, but you're the same person."

Discovering that some sports, such as water skiing, were considered off-limits to the disabled in Israel, Cohen founded the Challenge Association.

The association, with a membership of about 2,000, encourages people with disabilities to test the limits of their fitness.

Asked what advice he can offer to the recently disabled, Cohen said, "Stay open-minded. You can do anything you want, if you set your mind to it. You can get yourself together and move on."

Cohen's visit to Toronto was co-sponsored by the Mishorim Development Group, a real estate company headed by Gil Blutruch and listed on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, and Inter-Canel Ltd., an Internet high-tech company whose chief executive officer is Avi Gerber.

Blutruch's company, which controls rental properties, shopping centres and hotels, expanded its operations to Canada in 1998 and now owns the Horseshoe Valley ski resort near Toronto.

Israel then exercises restraint for as long as possible, almost certainly much longer than any other nation would if facing similar attacks on its population. When Israel finally responds with force, the media are there in record numbers to critically report on Israel's self-defence actions.

This was the case earlier this month when Israeli forces entered Gaza with the aim of stopping the Hamas "militants" responsible for firing Qassam rockets at the Israeli town of Sderot and longer-range Iranian-supplied Grad rockets at the city of Ashkelon. Intense media coverage followed.

In "4 achievements in Gaza" (Ynetnews.com, March 4), veteran commentator Ron Ben-Yishai argued that Israel gained international legitimacy with its military operations in Gaza, "because the ongoing [Hamas] attacks on Ashkelon make it clear that Israel did not pounce on the Palestinians for no reason."

But it's hard not to think that Ben-Yishai is seeing the western media through rose-coloured glasses.

Consider, for example, Peter Armstrong's March 2 story for CBC News: Sunday. Armstrong provided much footage of destruction, injury and death in Gaza, including the tragic deaths of civilians along with scores of Hamas members.

However, Armstrong failed to provide any context for why Israel was carrying out the attacks. When Armstrong finally mentioned the Hamas rocket attacks aimed at Israeli civilians, he did so only to make the point that Israel is responsible for starting the violence: "The escalation of violence began last week. Five senior militants were killed in an Israeli air strike. Hamas launched back, unleashing dozens of rockets on southern Israel."

Armstrong made no mention of the fact that Hamas has launched hundreds of rockets over the past several months, and that it was allegedly planning to carry out a major operation against Israel. (Since 2001, Palestinians in Gaza have launched thousands of rockets into southern Israel.)

In this grossly one-sided story, Armstrong reports: "The United Nations convened an emergency session in New York. The daily rocket fire was condemned, but [United Nations] Secretary General Ban Ki-moon saved his toughest criticisms for Israel."

In fact, on Mar. 1, Ban told the UN Security Council: "I condemn Palestinian rocket attacks, and call for the immediate cessation of such acts of terrorism, which serve no purpose, endanger Israeli civilians, and bring misery to the Palestinian people. I call for an end to these attacks." (The next day, the United Nation's own news service, reporting on Ban's remarks, deleted any reference to "acts of terrorism" and thereby arguably set the message for other media reports.)

On CTV's National News, March 1, Janice Mackey Frayer also reported on the human toll in Gaza. But Mackey Frayer made it clear that Israel's strikes in Gaza were a response to Hamas' aggression: "What is driving the offensive is Hamas' arsenal of rockets that can reach farther into Israeli territory, like the ones here [showing damage in Ashkelon], some 15 kilometres north of Gaza's border, putting more than 100,000 people within range. And so, Israel sees its actions as defensive measures."

Frayer's report is proof that balance and context can be achieved in a two-minute TV news item.

On the commentary side, not to be overlooked was the National Post's Mar. 3 editorial, "Palestinian self-destruction." The paper drew attention to a 13-month-old Palestinian girl killed by shrapnel in northern Gaza. But it appears that the shrapnel came from a Palestinian rocket that went off course.

The Post argued: "Her death by the Palestinians' own rocket fire perfectly symbolizes the self-destructive pathology that has afflicted the Palestinians since the 1960s. Palestinian leaders would quite literally prefer to slaughter their own people than turn Gaza into a normal country that deals on civilized terms with its neighbours."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

By RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC

Our sages teach, "All the festivals are destined to be nullified [in the Messianic age], but the days of Purim will never cease to be observed." (Midrash Mishlei 9:1)

This startling comment may be understood if we consider the placement of Purim in the sequence of the other Jewish holidays. It may be suggested that the progression of our holidays correlates to the entire timeline of Jewish history. Passover, falling in Nissan, the first month of the Hebrew calendar, would correspond to the spiritual state of the Jewish people at the beginning of their history. Purim, celebrated during Adar, the last month of our calendar, relates to the spiritual state of the Jewish people at history's climax.

Each of our holidays marks a critical, miraculous occurrence during our history. Our rabbis explain that there are two kinds of miracles. Supernatural miracles powerfully point to the hand of God behind them. These are called "revealed" miracles – nigleh in Hebrew. Other miracles are much more subtle and ambiguous. These "concealed" miracles – nistar in Hebrew – are often not even perceived as miraculous.

Passover is the holiday par excellence of the revealed miracle. The year-long parade of spectacular supernatural plagues that struck Egypt prior to our Exodus 3,300 years ago left a profound impression upon our young nation. God left no doubts about who was redeeming us. Even our Egyptian taskmasters understood, proclaiming, "It is the finger of God!" (Exodus 8:15).

The climax of the Exodus was the dramatic salvation of the Jewish people and drowning of their pursuers at the Sea of Reeds. We became so electrically aware of God's presence there that each Jew was practically able to point to the Shchinah and proclaim, "This is my God!" (Rashi, Exodus 15:2). Indeed, our sages in the Mechilta declare that a simple maidservant was able to see more at the splitting of the sea than the greatest prophets would behold in the future.

At the end of the Jewish calendar year, we encounter the holiday of Purim, whose miracles correspond to the spiritual level of the Jewish people at the end of history. The story of Purim is recounted in Megillat Esther. The name of God is curiously absent from this biblical book. This omission seems to reflect the fact that His presence seems to be absent from this story of the salvation of the Jewish people from the genocide-bent Persians. Our near-annihilation seems to turn around as the result of coincidences, palace intrigue, incredible timing and extremely lucky breaks.

The hidden world

Yet those who are spiritually sophisticated understand that the Purim story is not simply serendipity – the hand of God is definitely behind each twist and turn of the plot. Indeed, the name of the book, Megillat Esther – the scroll of Esther – in Hebrew can also mean, "the revealing of that which is hidden." The sensitive reader is able to sense God's unmistakable fingerprints on every page, because Purim corresponds to the Messianic age when "the knowledge of God will be as widespread as the waters that cover the seas" (Isaiah 11:9).

The spiritual level of the Jewish people at the Purim stage of history will be very finely tuned. We won't need God to split the sea or bloody the rivers for us to know He's there. We'll be able to perceive Him even at small flowing streams where He's hidden within the quietness of nature.

When our sages claim that all holidays will be nullified in the Messianic age, they may mean that during this time of heightened spiritual sensitivity, we won't require the overt supernatural manifestations of His presence that typify other biblical holidays.

Rabbi Michael Skobac is director of education with Jews for Judaism Toronto.

By RACHAEL TURKIEINICZ

This year, the holiday of Purim comes at the same time that we begin reading the book of Leviticus. It's an interesting juxtaposition, since our celebration of Purim emphasizes the topsy-turvy nature of the holiday, and Leviticus begins with the description of the details involved in ritual sacrifice. On the one hand, the strangeness of Shushan and the foreignness of sacrifice almost line up. On the other hand, one text almost speaks of a loss of reference points and the resulting abandon of discipline, while Leviticus emphasizes the strictness of detail and discipline.

Yet these two descriptions, Purim and sacrificial law, teach us something important about ritual. Within the scroll of Esther, there is no mention of God's name. The trials and tribulations of the Jewish people in ancient Persia are recounted to us as if they dealt with history alone, with no appeal to God and no help from above. There is a moment in the text when Esther and all the Jewish people fast. We assume this fasting is a sign of repentance and spirituality, a turning toward God, but we are left with that assumption unconfirmed, as the text never relates to it in those terms. There is never a prayer uttered, and there's never a moment of beseeching the Divine.

The other side of the spectrum occurs in the book of Leviticus, when the opening statements describe how one is to bring a sacrifice, which animal to bring and what the kohen should do with the various body parts. If an appendage is not placed on the altar properly, not facing the right direction or not washed properly, the sacrifice is invalid – regardless of the intent of the person. It is communication with God that attends to detail in a way that seems foreign to a modern reader.

The two books are so vastly different in their approaches that one can only question which model reflects the Jewish one. Perhaps we are to solve all our problems on our own and never appeal to God, or perhaps we are to appeal to God with every detail in question and await direction. Interestingly, we don't decide the question, since the importance is not in the answer, but in the question itself.

These two texts do not describe two opposing models, but two defining ones. Whether or not a Jewish person believes they are on their own in dealing with everything without appealing to God, in reality they are involved with God, since they are dealing with their lives from within a Jewish reality. Choosing to fast is an expression of soulful communication, while not turning to God in an overt way is still part of a spiritual relationship. This defines one side of a Jewish engagement with God.

The other side is defined by a relationship that cements itself in attention to detail and particularity. The Leviticus relationship is as real as the Esther relationship. One reflects a more hidden and generalized spirituality, while the other reflects a more overt and detailed one. They are both equally true.

The choice between Esther and Leviticus is not made within the model but within the person. Midrash Tehillim states that the person whose prayer is answered is the one who "lifts the hands with their heart in them." Only we and God know what is truly in our hearts. Therefore, only God can judge whether our prayers contain our hearts.

There are some people for whom the Purim engagement with God is their true expression, and there are some for whom the details of Leviticus open their hearts. The two models are not representative of right and wrong, but a reflection of latitude. Shmot Rabbah beautifully states this point when reflecting that "we are all equal before God while in prayer."

Jericho is probably the best-known archeological site in the Holy Land, with the possible exception of Jerusalem. It has been dug a number of times since the beginning of the 20th century, when the land was still under Ottoman control.

The first excavators were German. This isn't surprising, since the Ottoman Empire was allied with Germany during World War I. Prior to that, Kaiser Wilhelm II had been busy trying to increase German influence in the Middle East and had even visited Jerusalem during one of his trips before that war.

However, the British have been the major excavators of Jericho.

Their first effort at that famous tell was in the 1930s, during the period of the Mandate. The man in charge was John Garstang, who had also excavated the site of Hazor (which I have written about in a previous column). Garstang's excavation caused a small sensation when he claimed to have found evidence of the Israelite destruction of Jericho caused by Joshua.

But it would be Kathleen Kenyon whose name would be inextricably linked with the excavations of Jericho. Kenyon made Jericho a household name in Canada when she chose A. Douglas Tushingham as her co-director. Tushingham was chief archeologist of Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum. As a result, newspapers across the country had a field day with the excavations, and the Canadian public became aware of this important archeological site.

Kenyon began her excavations at Jericho in 1952, and she dug there until 1958. Her excavations turned up some fascinating details that would rewrite the history of that famous site and call into question some cherished beliefs. Kenyon was the first to practise the new methodology of excavating that she had learned while working with the legendary British archeologist Mortimer Wheeler. It now bears both their names and is known as the Wheeler-Kenyon method. Basically it involves meticulous excavation, careful recording, and using the stratigraphy at the side of a trench to match up finds with specific soil levels. Ultimately, the idea is to recreate an entire tell from the final published report of the archeologist.

Using this new technique, Kenyon came up with some amazing discoveries. She turned up evidence that Jericho was one of the earliest settlements ever unearthed, dating to the dawn of the Agricultural Revolution, which saw the start of the domestication of both plants and animals. This cultural breakthrough dates back some 10,000 years and was a major milestone in human existence, paving the way for the rise of cities and civilization some 5,000 years later. Coincidentally, this is exactly the same amount of time separating us in the present from the dawn of civilization some 5,000 years ago.

But the most controversial evidence Kenyon turned up dealt with the dating of Joshua's conquest of Jericho. In fact, there was no evidence of it. Using her meticulous methodology, Kenyon found that at the time of Joshua's supposed conquest, Jericho lay in ruins, probably having been destroyed by the Egyptians a few hundred years earlier when they were adding Canaan to their empire during the New Kingdom around 1550 to 1100 BCE.

Kenyon's discoveries have been the source of a great deal of controversy ever since. Some have speculated that the level of Joshua's conquest may have eroded in the intervening time, but nobody has convincingly refuted her findings.

The excavations of Jericho are a prime example of the danger in using archeology to try to prove the historicity of the Bible. Although the Bible does mention verifiable historical events, it's not a history book in the modern sense. It's a chronicle of Israel's faith, and faith by its very definition defies proof.

Sweet lessons in a basket

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The ninth chapter of the Book of Esther states in Verse 19: "Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwell in the un-walled towns, made the 14th day of the month of Adar a day of gladness and feasting, a holiday, and of sending portions to one another."

That's why on March 21, thousands of years after the Book of Esther was written, Jews around the world will be scurrying from doorstep to doorstep depositing baskets laden with goodies at the homes of friends and strangers, too. Today, a look at one of the most delightful customs in the Jewish calendar: mishloach manot.

Why does the Megillah command us to perform this mitzvah? Surprisingly, one source traces this tradition to the evil Haman. As Rabbi Yehudah Prero explains, "Haman described the nation of Israel to Achashverosh as a 'people scattered abroad and dispersed amongst the people.' Some commentators explain that Haman was pointing out that the Jewish nation was vulnerable because they did not all get along: there were disagreements and disputes among them so that in their hearts they were scattered and dispersed... To foster feelings of closeness, kinship, and love, we send gifts to each other on Purim." [tinyurl.com/2q43en]

Several sites go into great detail about how to perform the mitzvah properly. L'Chaim examines the proper time to deliver mishloach manot, the quantity of food to be sent and the importance of using an agent to deliver the gift. [tinyurl.com/2twsby] Darche Noam looks at the custom through traditional sources such as the Gemarah and the Rambam.

[tinyurl.com/2vvgae] Although the Megillah clearly states that we should exchange food on Purim, curiously, there is no blessing associated with the mitzvah. Rabbi

Yechiel Weinberg says this makes perfect sense when you consider human nature. If there were a blessing, it would have included the word "v'tzivani" ("and He has commanded us"). However, it is preferable to give of your own free will from a sense of love for your fellow Jew. If one gives mishloach manot because one is commanded to do so, this would lessen the element of love. [tinyurl.com/2oarjm]

In that light, CLAL, the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership, has created a meditation that can be recited as you put together your mishloach manot: "May I prepare and give these gifts with a full and open heart. May we be blessed on Purim and on each day of our lives with light, gladness and honour, and with the gift to express our friendship." [clal.org/r21.html]

Surely you can send off something more imaginative than a tub of candy. The folks at Virtual Jerusalem have shared some alternatives. "One year I delivered a breakfast shalach manot: a cup of hot coffee, bagel, butter, hard-boiled egg and orange juice... Another with a fish motif: a small can of tuna, gummy fish, chocolate fish, etc." [tinyurl.com/3e49te] Aish.com's dip-themed suggestion includes whole-wheat za'atar pita chips, guacamole and Salsa Mexicana. [tinyurl.com/2r9vzg]

If you do want to give in to your sweet tooth, try whipping up Purim Poppyseed Candy, Hazenblosen [tinyurl.com/6e8hg], Persian Rice Cookies or Halvah with Walnuts. [tinyurl.com/ppq2z]

Rina Peled wants to fill her gift basket with something more substantial than sweets – such as kindness, consideration, love and other qualities she longs to give of herself. Writing in Hebrew in Shaloch Manot of the Heart, she tells us that her daughter's teacher should get a basket filled with "consideration" for the hard work she puts in. Her own kids should receive gifts of "tranquility and acceptance," while her husband deserves "unending kindness." And "maybe this year, I'll attach to the basket I send to my father... a bit of forbearance and patience. Something that will symbolize the fact that I will wait until he finishes his sentences, and I won't interrupt as if I knew what he was going to say... something that will show him that he is truly important to us all." [tinyurl.com/2eq8ds]

UWO business students explore Israel's economy

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Nicole Demarsh signed up for a trip to Israel that focused on the country's economy, she had no idea how dramatically it would change her perceptions of the Jewish state.

"It was really hard for me to conceptualize and imagine what the country would be like. I really had a hard time trying to get a visual picture in my mind," said Demarsh, 22, who travelled to Israel from Feb. 21 to March 2 with 29 peers from the University of Western Ontario's Richard Ivey School of Business to learn about Israel's booming economy.

"Now I actually have a perception of what the country is, what it entails," said Demarsh, who is Catholic. She was one of 20 non-Jewish students and 10 Jewish students who spent 10 days touring the country and meeting some of Israel's most successful entrepreneurs, politicians and journalists.

"We thought that bringing a mixed group of people to Israel, Jews and non-Jews, and focusing only on the economy, and talking about various Israeli companies and why they are successful in Israel, we figured we could educate the students and get students to think about investing in Israel," said Noah Slepov, director of Jewish and Israel affairs for London Jewish Campus Services and one of the trip's organizers.

The tour, which was funded by private donors and the Canada Israel Committee (CIC), included stops at Teva Pharmaceuticals, Israel Aerospace Industries Ltd., Given Imaging and the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

The speakers the group heard from included Jon Medved, co-founder and CEO of Vringo, a service that allows subscribers to share videos through their cellphones; Aluf Benn, diplomatic editor of the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz; and David Azrieli, an Israeli-Canadian who heads Canpro Investments Ltd.

The students sat in the board room of the Azrieli Centre listening to David Azrieli talk about his Israeli business success stories.

"It was really neat to see such a small country, very young, and to see the success that it has," Demarsh said.

She said she was impressed with Azrieli, a Montreal developer who had great financial success in Canada, but returned to Israel for ideological reasons and was determined to find success in Israel, too.

"Regardless of how politically challenged the country can be, the economy is the real story in Israel because it is a knowledge-based economy, with people who are being ingenuitive, creative and coming up with great ideas and great products. Working on campus for the last four years, there has been virtually no emphasis on the economic side of Israel," said Slepov, adding that shifting the focus from Israeli politics to its economy is a great way to advocate for Israel.

But the organizers made sure to give the students insight into Israel's social and political aspects as well, because they felt it would help give them a complete picture of the economic situation.

"If you take a look at a magazine like The Economist, economics is about knowing everything. It's about knowing the political climate, it's about knowing the culture. In order to make smart business decisions, you have to know about the society itself," Slepov said.

"One of the things they have to know about Israel, to know about the economy, is who are these people? Where did the tension in Israel come from? CIC, to their credit, when they got on board with this project, they expressed to us how important it was to take them to places like Yad Vashem, places like Masada, to meet with politicians, for them to get a better understanding of Israel."

He said that when the group met with Benn, he didn't speak about the political crisis in Israel. Rather, he spoke about the psyche of Israelis – "not wanting to be losers" – and the Israeli mentality that affects all aspects of their lives, including business.

"One of the things that I think spoke to people is that the Israelis are in a situation that they don't have a lot of natural resources and instead of scapegoating and complaining, and finding ways to blame people for their lack of resources, they've taken things into their own hands and said, 'How can we maximize the situation we're in? How can we as a people move forward?' They've put their energy into building the country."

For the residents of Sderot, living under rocket attacks, 30 seconds can be the difference between life and death

Not a day goes by when the Red Alert Warning System does not sound onto the City of Sderot. Children who would ordinarily play freely in an outdoor playground have less than 30 seconds to be ushered into their shelter before the next rocket comes slamming into their lives.

These concrete shelters quickly become the children's classroom and playground. Who knows how long they will have to remain here.

Na'amat Canada Toronto has taken on the responsibility of raising the necessary funds to transform the eight dismal shelters attached to the Na'amat Neve Eshkol and the Tzelon Daycare Centres in Sderot, that were recently struck by Katyusha rockets, into colourful safe havens for these small children.

Fundraiser for programs at D.A.N.I.'S PLACE

Entrepreneurs impressed with the Ivey group

For Slepov, one of the highlights of the trip came during a meeting with Leon Koffler, the founder and chairman of Super-Pharm. Koffler asked the students how he should respond to New-Pharm, a rival pharmacy that reportedly was planning to cut its prices to take market share away from Super-Pharm.

Slepov said Koffler was very impressed with the students' strategic responses.

"He offered the students a permanent spot around his board table if they stayed in Israel."

But Slepov wasn't surprised that some of Israel's most successful entrepreneurs were impressed with the Ivey group.

After having interviewed 50 applicants for this trip, the organizers were only able to offer spots to 30 students based on their resumes and interviews.

"I was blown away by the level of these students. A lot of them have been working at multinational companies the last couple summers [and] a lot of them had already been hired by multinational companies for next year. We just picked the students we thought were at the top of their class, and also [so] that the demographics of the trip would reflect the demographics of the school."

He said the trip itself was very multicultural, which was evident when participants toured the Old City in Jerusalem, the Church of the Nativity and the Arab Quarter.

"It opened them up to each other and they bonded in a way that was really unpredictable... They learned more about each other's religions in this one week than they would have in their whole careers as students because of the open nature of Israel itself," Slepov said.

He added that the students also learned that there is a huge disconnect between the media's portrayal about everyday life in Israel and what really takes place.

"They had no idea that Israel was such an open society, that it was so multicultural, that there were so many people who were so different."

But the overall message Slepov wanted the group to understand was how important a strong economy is to maintaining stability in a region.

"One of the things that I think the students came away with was recognizing that there is a link between the economy and stability and security. For there to be peace in any region in the world, people need to be in jobs, and people need to be able to feed their children," he said.

SO MUCH FUNUKAH!

CELEBRATE YOUR BAR/BAT MITZVAH LIKE A ROCK STAR!
TWO GREAT LOCATIONS IN TORONTO

THROW A BAR MITZVAH—OR BUSINESS LUNCH—THAT ROCKS!

Whether it's a bar mitzvah, bat mitzvah, "Bubbie's" birthday or a business banquet, you'll always be treated like a rock star at Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre (formerly the Skydome).

With a combined 27,000-square feet, including nightclubs and streetside patios, Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre offer a vast array of configurations for a wide variety of events, from five to 500 people, breakfast through late-night.

Marcelo DeOliveira, sales and marketing manager for Hard Rock Cafe: "We've hosted countless bar mitzvahs, wedding receptions, product launches and press conferences. We've put on events for all types of companies, from Deloitte & Touche and The Toronto Star, to BMG Music. Guests love Hard Rock. It's a very unique environment."

As if to make his point, DeOliveira walks a visitor past some of the priceless rock memorabilia hanging on Hard Rock Cafe Toronto's walls, such as Bob Dylan's autographed guitar from the cover of a 1984 live album and a handmade mariachi suit he wore on tour. Guests will also see a pair of sketches by John Lennon, a fur-trimmed purple jacket that belonged to Prince and an outrageous pair of platform shoes from the closet of Stanley Eisen — better known as Paul Stanley of KISS — as well as a beautiful custom instrument once owned by Canadian guitar virtuoso, Alex Lifeson, of Rush.

And as a testament to the old adage, "rock 'n' roll never dies," Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre boasts dueling walls of The Rolling Stones' and The Beatles' memorabilia. So far, The Beatles are ahead with 23 pieces, including the hand-written lyrics to "Get Back." But if Brit Rock isn't your thing, you can check out some cool stuff from this side of the pond, like the guitar Jimi Hendrix used when recording "Little Wing," the jacket Buddy Holly wore on tour or Bo Diddley's guitar "Lucille." There is a tribute room to the "King" himself, where you can get a peek at Elvis's silk pajamas, among other things.

After the tour, DeOliveira explains that this is all part of the experience, that his staff will design exactly the experience a guest is looking for. "For instance, you can have a sit-down dinner or a buffet. We have great sound, great lighting and video monitors throughout the cafes. We can set up for dancing or karaoke. We can even put together really fun loot bags from our Rock Shop. Whatever you need. Because to us, you're a rock star."

For more information on either cafe, contact Marcelo DeOliveira, 416-362-3636, toronto_salesmanager@hardrock.com, hardrock.com/toronto.

Hard Rock Cafe Toronto is located on Yonge St. at Dundas. Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre is located at 1 Blue Jays Way, Gate 1.

Volunteer comes face to face with victims in Darfur

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

There was nothing that could have prepared Yoni Levitan for the tragic first-hand accounts he heard from victims of the genocide in the Darfur region in Sudan.

Earlier this year, Levitan, 23, the volunteer executive director of the Canadian branch of Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND), travelled to Sudan with an NGO called Canadian Aid for Southern Sudan (CASS), which is run by Liberal MP Glen Pearson and his wife, Jane Roy.

Levitan, a Queen's University graduate and the former vice-president of operations for Queen's Hillel, was invited to join their annual CASS trip, along with Liberal MP Carolyn Bennett and a student and lawyer from London.

Levitan, a first-year student at Osgoode Law School, spent a week in southwestern Sudan, in an internally displaced persons (IDP) camp in a village called Rumol, and at a Catholic mission compound in Kenya, learning first-hand about the human cost of the conflict that has left hundreds of thousands dead, and almost three million displaced over a span of five years.

During Levitan's time in the IDP camp, he interviewed about three dozen people, some of whom arrived just days before on foot, on 10- to 15-day journeys through the desert.

One of the women he spoke with, Nybol, a mother of eight, told him about the day her husband and brother-in-law were killed when her village was attacked.

"When they fled the village, five of her children went missing. She only had three of her children when she left. She doesn't know where they are. They could be in another camp somewhere else. They could have also been killed like her husband and she just doesn't know," Levitan said, adding that Nybol continued to hope for the best for her remaining children, including their going to school.

He recalled a man he interviewed who wanted nothing but to show him a large bump on his back he developed from a beating before he fled his village.

"There was another woman I met and she had two of her children murdered right in front of her eyes, and that was all she wanted to tell me. She didn't want to tell me anything else about her family, she didn't want to talk about her journey here, she didn't want to talk about any other message to bring back to Canada. She just wanted to tell me about her two children, and to her all that mattered was that her children wouldn't die in vain."

Levitan, who had been working for the past two years to raise awareness about the plight of countless Darfuri refugees, said that the act of sitting and speaking with them about their stories gave them hope because it showed them there are people outside of Sudan who care.

Because of this, Levitan said he and the rest of the CASS group were warmly welcomed and treated with respect.

"Everyone knew we were there with a development organization, and we were there to bring these people's stories back to Canada and try to get them help. So everyone had a lot of respect for us and accordingly, wanted to make sure we had a positive experience," Levitan said.

What really surprised him was how upbeat and full of life the children were, and how respectful the community was when it came to the property of others.

"The social norms were really amazing. When there were food drops from the UN, they could just leave hundreds and even thousands of pounds of food in the middle of the field because it is just the norm in that culture, that you don't take something that doesn't belong to you. They could just leave crates and crates of food in the middle of the field, and no one would touch it until an administrator came and distributed it," he said.

As much as Levitan tried to prepare himself for what he would experience on the trip - reading first-hand accounts, and watching documentaries - he wasn't able to predict the effect it would have on him.

"The first thing that jumps to your mind is all these numbers. Four hundred thousand estimated dead and 2.5 to three million displaced, and you hear all these numbers and there is a kind of parallel to the Holocaust. What does six million mean? Or 1.5 million children? Same with Darfur... It really helped give meaning to what Darfur means to me because it really helped personalize it for me. I got to see first-hand that this is the face of contemporary genocide and this is the face of the world's indifference."

He said one of the biggest challenges was coming to terms with the fact that he couldn't help them with their immediate needs.

This young Sudanese child, a victim of the crisis in Darfur, was one of the many children who was thrilled by something as simple as having his picture taken, and then seeing it on the screen of the digital camera. [Yoni Levitan photo]

"You're just thinking you want to help these people, but you want to also be able to think long-term and address the root causes. It just really tears at you because you want to do something right then, but you don't want to perpetuate what's going on."

For example, Levitan said family friends, who are doctors, donated a shopping bag full of cough medicines, pain killers and even baby formula to bring to the IDP camp.

"They didn't have a medical clinic at the IDP camp, but they did have a pharmacy in a hut. I took everything out, and literally with a shopping bag of medicine, I doubled the inventory of the pharmacy that services thousands and thousands of people," he said.

"On the one hand, you're happy and grateful that you're able to help, but at the same time, it is very hard. The first thing you want to do is help the people you see. It's hard to step back and think about what the root causes are. Widows and orphans and disease and malnutrition - all these things are the symptoms of genocide.

These women showed Levitan what people mean when they said they have nothing to eat. They had resorted to eating leaves. [Yoni Levitan photo]

But Levitan said that despite their hardships, they still have hope and the desire to make life better for their children.

"It's helped me realize that trying to foster an environment that is conducive to peace in Sudan is not an easy thing, but if these people can say that their lives can get better... it gives me the strength to say that in the end, this will not persist indefinitely.

"As brutal as the situation may be, STAND and other organizations may be able to help create an environment that fosters peace and stability in Sudan."

Cotler urges India to quash Itzhayek sentence

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal human rights critic Irwin Cotler is stepping up his pressure on both the Canadian and Indian governments for the release of Montreal businessman Saul Itzhayek, who has been incarcerated in India for nine months since being sentenced to three years in prison for an entry visa offence.

Cotler told reporters last week that Canadian officials should urge the Indian president or cabinet to use any one of the executive powers they have to free Itzhayek. These might include a pardon, suspending his sentence, transferring him in a prisoner exchange, or deporting him to Canada or Israel, where he also has citizenship.

Cotler said Indian law provides for these executive remedies even while a case is before the courts.

'This is not how friends should treat
each other's nationals'

Itzhayek was convicted last May of entering India on an expired visa from Nepal, where he was on a business trip. According to his testimony, the Indian police guaranteed him safe passage into India, then arrested him and asked for a bribe if he wanted to be let go.

The only news Cotler said he has on Itzhayek is that he was denied being released on bail while his appeal goes through the courts.

Cotler said he was recently told by Defence Minister Peter Mackay that he raised the case of Itzhayek with the Indian foreign minister during his five-day business mission to Mumbai and New Delhi that concluded on Feb. 22. Mackay is also minister of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

"I appeal to a fellow democracy and Commonwealth member to invoke any executive remedy it sees fit to end the pain and suffering of Mr. Itzhayek. This is not how friends should treat each other's nationals," Cotler said.

Itzhayek, 42, and his family are residents of Cotler's Mount Royal riding.

Cotler said he doesn't believe that ratcheting up the pressure on India could be counter-productive.

"This is not an adversarial campaign. We have not sought to embarrass the Indian authorities," he said.

Although Itzhayek's and the Indian police accounts of why the Montrealer was arrested conflict, Cotler said he doesn't believe that Itzhayek violated Indian law, and that he was, in fact, a victim of entrapment.

"Even if we accept the Indian officials' version of what happened, the sentence was excessive and becomes abusive, by Indian standards, for what is essentially an administrative breach."

French ruling lets survivors claim for lost livelihood

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A group that advocates for Shoah victims whose property was confiscated in Nazi-occupied France is urging people who lost their livelihoods under the Vichy regime to file for state compensation after a precedent-setting ruling that redefined property to include non-physical assets.

Last June, the administrative tribunal of Paris overturned a 2004 decision by the Commission pour l'Indemnisation des Victimes de Spoliations (CIVS) — a government body set up in 1999 to handle cases of property seizure during the war — to deny compensation to a Jewish dental surgeon for the loss of his patient base during the war, when he was not able to practise.

The tribunal's ruling set a precedent regarding the seizure of property from French Jews during World War II, because previously, claimants could only received compensation for the seizure of physical assets, said Jean-Jacques Fraenkel, a Holocaust survivor who, in 1999, founded La Coordination Off Shore, a group that fought the case in French court.

"That judicial decision opens up the possibility for all applicants, including Jewish families who had a business in France and therefore a clientele, to seek reparation from CIVS for loss of non-physical property such as a clientele, whether it was a cap manufacturer, a home-based tailor, a professional, a businessman," said Fraenkel, whose family was killed in Auschwitz-Birkenau.

In its ruling, the administrative tribunal said CIVS "had committed a clear error in judgment in rejecting the application for compensation for the loss of the above-mentioned non-corporeal property that had been taken from [the dentist]" — in other words, his patients.

Fraenkel is telling descendants of Jewish victims who had property seized — including those who have already been compensated and those who are preparing to seek compensation — to complete a supplementary application for compensation for their loss of clientele.

Survivors or their descendants who think they qualify for compensation as a result of last year's decision can apply to CIVS themselves or have this done by a lawyer, Fraenkel said.

"It can be tricky," he added, "because, despite the tribunal's decision, applicants will also have to fight CIVS, which will do its best to reject any new claims. In order not to have their application rejected, therefore, they need meet the requirements set out by CIVS."

Fraenkel and La Coordination Off Shore are making themselves available to people who want to seek compensation, to inform them of the steps necessary to make a claim.

For those who want help in preparing their case, the lawyers who worked on the earlier case will, within an agreed fee scale, take the files and plead the cases before CIVS.

"Eligible parties can send their file by registered mail to Maître Christian Roth, the lawyer who pleaded the case against CIVS before the administrative tribunal of Paris. He will study the file to verify that the application falls under the new precedent. Roth will then inform the applicants if their file is admissible," Fraenkel said.

If it is, Roth will receive the fee agreed upon with La Coordination Off Shore, as well as a percentage of the resulting compensation.

For French applicants, the fee is about 700 Euros, or about $1,000 (Cdn).

"I think it will be less for those living in Canada," Fraenkel said, adding that "all the preliminary verification to see if the file is admissible is free."

Roth speaks French, English and German.

Rabbi's assailant gets four years in jail

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A man who attacked a Jewish community leader and his guests from the streets of the Russian city of Ivanovo has been sentenced to four years in prison.

Last June, Rabbi Zvi Hersheovich of Montreal, his wife Chayale and their eight-year-old daughter were assaulted by youths while walking in downtown Ivanovo with Ervin Kirshtein, chair of the city's Jewish community, as well as local community member Valery Makushev.

On March 3, the Ivanovo Leninsky District Court found local resident Sergey Novikov, 21, guilty of hate-motivated assault. In addition to the jail term, the court ordered Novikov to pay 80,000 rubles (about $3,300 Cdn) in moral damages to Kirshtein and 40,000 rubles to Makushev, according to the Russian news service Interfax, which quoted the Ivanovo region prosecutor's office press secretary, Valentina Kruchinina.

"Novikov was found guilty of humiliating the dignity of a group of persons on ethnic reasons and attitude to religion, an act committed publicly, including violence, hooliganism and premeditated infliction of bodily injuries not dangerous for human life," Kruchinina is quoted as saying.

The attack occurred on the first day of Rabbi Hersheovich's visit to Ivanovo, an industrial city of more than 500,000 residents about 350 miles northeast of Moscow.

Rabbi Hersheovich, a member of the Lubavitch community, is now spiritual leader of the Stavropol Jewish community, his former colleague in Montreal, Rabbi Israel Bernath, told The CJN.

CIJA, Cotler join forces to fight anti-Semitism

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Mount Royal Liberal MP and renowned human rights advocate Irwin Cotler is putting the finishing touches on his new International Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism.

Cotler, along with British MP John Mann — who chairs the British all-party parliamentary committee against anti-Semitism and commissioned a 2006 inquiry into anti-Semitism in the United Kingdom — launched the coalition last month with an announcement at the Global Forum for Combating Anti-Semitism in Jerusalem. The new coalition will be run under the auspices of the forum.

Speaking to The C/N from Ottawa late last month, Cotler said he has approached fellow parliamentarians from all the major political parties to begin assembling a Canadian version of Mann's all-party inquiry.

He also outlined the task forces he will put together over the next year to combat anti-Semitism in all its guises.

"I'll head up a task force on genocidal anti-Semitism," he said. "There will be one on state-sanctioned anti-Semitism, [another] dealing with state-supported anti-Semitism like those of Hamas and Islamic Jihad... I don't think people realize these groups are state-supported."

The coalition will also deploy a task force to look into anti-Semitic terrorism — what Cotler calls "specific acts of terror targeting Jews inside and outside of Israel" — and a legal remedies task force to be headed by David Matas, senior legal counsel to B'nai Brith Canada.

Cotler said the coalition has also approached individuals with expertise on anti-Semitism to act as advisers for his coalition, including former Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky; Gregg Rickman, America's special envoy for monitoring and combating anti-Semitism; Per Ahlmark, Sweden's former deputy prime minister; and Mikhail Chlenov, secretary general of the Euro-Asian Jewish Congress.

Cotler expects the coalition to be fully "active and activated" by the time of the next global forum on anti-Semitism in 2009.

He added that Mann has indicated the next forum will be hosted by the United Kingdom.

Hershell Ezrin, CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), is also lending his organization's weight to both the coalition and the forum in the form of a website to fight anti-Semitism.

Hershell Ezrin

Irwin Cotler

CIJA's "Global Forum for Combating Anti-Semitism" website says that it will provide "a forum for the exchange of ideas and best practices to eliminate the scourge of anti-Semitism around the world."

Ezrin, who was also in attendance at the global forum — which drew almost 300 parliamentarians, academics, human rights activists and Jewish leaders from around the world to Jerusalem — said CIJA's presentation to the delegates last month was well-received, and he added that a number of nations and groups have already expressed interest in joining the fledgling Internet site.

As of last week, the website was still under construction, but Ezrin said it was on target for a May launch.

"We will integrate the work Cotler and Mann are doing," he said. "But one of the main conclusions to come out of the forum was to involve the non-Jewish community in combating anti-Semitism."

Citing his organization's ongoing success in promoting the initiative Fighting Anti-Semitism Together (FAST) — a coalition of non-Jewish Canadian business and community leaders that funds educational curricula encouraging students to speak out against racist activity — Ezrin said delegates showed "a great deal of interest" when it was revealed that nearly 800,000 Canadian students have participated in FAST programs over the last year.

"We wanted the international community to see what we've done," he said. "The U.S., United Kingdom and some others... wanted to see if an initiative taken by non-Jews would be something they could follow in their own countries."

Ezrin noted that one of the major pieces missing to effectively counter anti-Semitism is the ability to share "best practices" on the subject between people and organizations worldwide.

The CIJA website is intended to fill that void, he said.

"We want to build a knowledge-transfer site to meet people's needs... in both real time and in planned groups," Ezrin said. "We want to report action alerts, provide materials to experts and NGOs, parliamentarians and scholars around the world."

But the website will mostly be a members-only affair, he noted, saying that many organizations require confidentiality in order to effectively conduct their battles against anti-Semitism.

"We also agreed to build a compact, public site and post public information as well," he added.

Program helps hearing impaired follow Megillah

MONTREAL — A PowerPoint version of the Megillah developed by Montrealese Frank Duchoeny, which enables the hearing impaired to more fully participate in Purim, is now being used in North American synagogues and schools.

It is distributed through Our Way, a program for the deaf and hard of hearing under the New York-based Orthodox Union's national Jewish council for disabilities.

The entire Megillah, including the blessings, was put on a PowerPoint computer disk that projects the text in Hebrew and English side by side onto a screen, two to four verses at a time. The verses that are repeated aloud by the congregation are highlighted in a different colour to make it easy to follow along.

As the villainous Haman's name appears, humorous images, such as a raging bull or a rabbi stomping his feet, are flashed on the screen, with sound effects.

Duchoeny, the Our Way co-ordinator in Montreal, created the program four years ago for his 16-year-old son, who has been profoundly deaf since birth.

He gave credit for the idea to Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem.

More than 100 synagogues and schools in the United States and Canada requested the PowerPoint Megillah last year, and Our Way program co-ordinator Batya Jacob said similar numbers are expected this year.

The cost of the Megillah is a $100 donation to Our Way. Contact Jacob at 212-613-8127 or jacobb@ou.org.

Women can have aliyot, Orthodox scholar says

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — With his black attire, wispy beard and unassuming demeanour, Rabbi Daniel Sperber doesn't look like someone who is trying to shake up the Orthodox Jewish world.

Yet, the 67-year-old talmudic scholar from Israel is doing just that with his outspoken advocacy of greater inclusion of women in Jewish ritual.

Most contentiously, Rabbi Sperber argues that there's no prohibition in Jewish law against women being given aliyot and reading from the Torah in synagogue (other than those aliyot that are reserved for kohanim and Levites).

He is president of the Jesselson Institute for Advanced Torah Studies at Bar-Ilan University and rabbi of the Menachem Zion Synagogue in the Old City of Jerusalem.

His rare recent visit to Montreal included a meeting with members of the Rabbinical Council of Canada (Montreal section), a public lecture at Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, and speaking with supporters of the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, which sponsored his trip.

According to his interpretation of the commentaries of the sages of the first four centuries of the Common Era, "it is completely permissible" for women — and children — to read the Torah during worship.

"The basic texts say all people, including women and children, can be called to the Torah," he said in an interview.

"Like it or not, radical changes have taken place in society with regard to the status of women... Many Jewish women today are learned and are studying Torah at advanced levels. There is a thirst among them for spirituality and a means of expressing their religious devotion. Excluding them is an affront to the dignity of the individual."

He said he understands the resistance to change, but believes it is inevitable.

Rabbi Sperber is viewed with great suspicion by his more traditional colleagues, and his assertions have even been called dangerous. He admits that his is very much a minority opinion, but he believes that in the not-too-distant future, it will be mainstream among the modern Orthodox.

"More and more congregations in Israel and the United States are gradually extending more opportunities to women. No doubt there will be more," he said.

"The Orthodox establishment is trying to stymie this, but the consequence is that they are strengthening streams of Judaism that they object to."

Although Halachah may contain no prohibition, Rabbi Sperber said women rarely were able to exercise their rights because most were illiterate in ancient times.

By the medieval era, Judaism had absorbed the larger society's attitude that women were "chattel" and not really independent persons. Women's participation in the synagogue came to be regarded as offensive to men, he said.

The British-born Rabbi Sperber holds a doctorate from University College in London in ancient history and Hebrew studies. He is descended from a long rabbinical dynasty, and his father settled in Wales before World War II, having come from Transylvania. The family was strongly Zionist and Rabbi Sperber made aliyah in 1968.

He said he respects the counter-argument that tradition or custom carries as much weight as the letter of the law, but he can't accept it. "The social situation has changed and when circumstances change, tradition must change, too."

Those are fighting words in some circles.

"The opposition has been extremely respectful," he said. "We have agreed to disagree. The critics have found it very difficult to refute my arguments."

Banning women from synagogue honours is more political than legal at its root, he said.

"There is a feeling that this is an alien import from the feminist movement, that it is a slippery slope and that women will make greater demands, and the whole nature of synagogue worship will change. Give them an inch and they will take a mile," he said.

Rabbi Sperber said he doesn't support mixed seating during worship, but he said there's no need for men and women to be separate, for example, at weddings or lectures.

He also said he can't accept women being counted in a minyan, because that would be a violation of biblical text, which is not subject to change. Rabbi Sperber does believe women can act as advisers on all aspects of halachic issues, as well as sit on synagogue councils and religious affairs committees, and work as mashgichim.

As for women rabbis and judges of a rabbinical court, Rabbi Sperber said that "each issue has to be examined in its own right."

He sees the boundary between the left wing of Orthodoxy and the right wing of Conservative Judaism starting to blur, but he thinks any merger is unlikely because of Conservative Judaism's "much greater degree of flexibility in interpretation" of the law.

"Modern Orthodoxy is the true hope for Judaism," he said. "Unfortunately, it lacks a central leadership, and what leadership there is, is not particularly forceful or activist."

MONTREAL — The Quebec Press Council has rejected a complaint that an editorial cartoon published last year in La Presse was anti-Semitic or discriminatory.

Giovanni Bruno complained to the council about the June 18, 2007, cartoon by Serge Chapeau, which depicts Action Démocratique leader Mario Dumont as a chassidic Jew with earlocks, wearing a huge shtraiml.

He is saying: "...and next week, I will be courted by the nude cyclists of the Plateau. Don't miss that!"

The headline is "Mario Dumont courted by the Jewish community."

The cartoon was prompted by a story the paper had carried on the front page a few days earlier about its discovery that retired Liberal senator Leo Kolber had hosted Dumont, the new opposition leader, and other Jewish community leaders at a private meeting at his home.

In its decision, the council said: "While the cartoon may have shocked the plaintiff, it did not contravene the code of ethics, and Mr. Bruno has not demonstrated in what way this cartoon would be anti-Semitic."

Bruno also charged that La Presse editor André Pratte had resorted to "falsehoods and half-truths" in his response to B'nai Brith Canada's public denunciation of the cartoon, a complaint the council also dismissed.

Pratte had responded that the cartoon's message was not directed at the Jewish community, but rather at Dumont.

La Presse lawyer Philippe-Denis Richard argued before the council that the cartoonist had the right to use satire to depict Dumont's visit with the Jewish community. His intention was to convey Dumont's readiness to look anywhere for support.

The news that Dumont had had dinner with Kolber prompted other cartoons in Quebec newspapers. Le Devoir depicted Dumont wearing a T-shirt bearing "MK" and "pareve," saying, "I am now certified kosher."

Sherbrooke's La Tribune had Dumont with dollar signs in his eyes as he greeted two men wearing kippot and earlocks, and carrying briefcases.

Tanenbaum donates $1 million to rights museum

Senate approves legislation turning institution into national entity

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the C/JN

WINNIPEG — Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment chairman Larry Tanenbaum last week donated $1 million to Winnipeg's soon-to-be-built Canadian Museum for Human Rights, the brainchild of the late media mogul Israel Asper.

Tanenbaum was joined by Jim Temerty, founder of Northland Power, and Toronto lawyer Donald MacDonald, who also contributed $1 million each. Their donations were announced March 6 at Toronto's Marshall McLuhan Catholic Secondary School.

In making his gift, Tanenbaum said he hoped the museum will help Canadian young people understand human rights violations of the past and what they can do to improve human rights in the future.

He and Temerty, a Ukrainian-Canadian, both encouraged other Canadian businesspeople to donate to the museum.

MacDonald, the father of a disabled child, said he hopes the museum will help sensitize Canadians to the consequences of discriminating against people with disabilities.

In an interview, Asper's daughter, lawyer Gail Asper, chair of the Friends of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, told The C/JN she was "humbled by the tremendous support" of the three donors.

"The goal of the museum is to inspire people to take personal action and personal responsibility for the protection and advancement of human rights in Canada and around the world. The museum is not just a place where we are chronicling history," she said.

"The museum will contain the first national gallery in Canada dealing with the Holocaust. This is something that is long overdue for Canada. It's highly appropriate that the gallery dealing with the Holocaust and anti-Semitism today be in the museum for human rights," she added.

"It's important to remind people that the Holocaust happened not just because of Hitler's will to destroy the Jews, but because of the indifference of the world and complicity of the world. We have to inspire the citizens of the world to work together to ensure that the Holocaust doesn't happen again, and that Jews are not persecuted, and of course, that the world steps up and speaks out about any other people that are being persecuted."

Asper said the fundraising campaign for the museum, which is set to open in 2010, is at "a critical juncture."

She and the supporters of the museum have raised $88 million out of the $105 million in private donations needed before an April deadline, after which construction costs will go up, which could mean the project has to be scaled back.

Approximately $17 million in private donations has come from Ontario.

Last week, legislation making the museum a national entity passed the Senate. The bill previously passed in the House of Commons with the unanimous consent of all parties.

Asper hopes the legislation will spur a flurry of donations so that the remaining $17 million in private capital can be raised.

The museum, which will be the first national museum in Canada outside the Ottawa region, is a $265-million project. When the private capital is raised, the government of Canada will put forward $100 million, the province of Manitoba will contribute $40 million and the city of Winnipeg will contribute $20 million.

The federal government will also contribute approximately $22 million in annual operating funding.

The museum has the support of 50 ethno-cultural and human rights groups across Canada.

Asper said that "the idea is that the museum should be a hub of museums of conscience in the world."

She added: "The museum's website will reach tens of thousands of students around the world and the museum should be a catalyst for conferences on human rights issues."

Food, Scrumptious Food

Food has been chef's passion since boyhood

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Food, food, food. Anthony Rose, the executive chef at the Drake Hotel, always knew what he wanted, even at the tender age of 13.

With his sights set on the hospitality industry, Rose, now 34, used his bar mitzvah money to finance his studies at the California Culinary Academy in San Francisco.

Having suitably honed his skills, he returned to his native Toronto two years ago to take up out at Schwartz's, the legendary Jewish-style delicatessen.

In a sense, food was in his blood.

His mother Linda, a real estate agent, is a great baker whose brisket dish and matzah ball soup elicit rave reviews. His father, Joel, a lawyer, is a wine connoisseur.

Rose's wife, Kymberly, the mother of their son, Simon, has managed two restaurants and is "an amazing baker" and a "fantastic cook." Recently, she launched Green Eggs Toronto, a food website.

"I always loved, loved food," said Rose, who cooked for his siblings, Randi, a cardiologist, and Lorne, a lawyer when they all lived at home.

And he fondly remembers his grandfather bringing steaming hot bagels for family breakfasts.

As a young man, Rose's tastes were rudimentary, to say the least. "My favourite meal was a hamburger slathered in ketchup," he admitted.

Rose, having abandoned the misbegotten idea of becoming a forest ranger, refined his taste buds as an apprentice chef at Toronto's Centro restaurant.

His mentors, David Lee and Marc Thuet, encouraged him to study at the California Culinary Academy, where he spent two years.

There he came under the influence of California cuisine.

"You support your local farmers and you cook with the seasons,"

Rose explained. "This is pretty much the way people have always cooked. It's fresher, it's supportive of the local economy, it's tastier and it's sustainable environmentally."

After graduating from the California Culinary Academy, he worked in a tavern in upstate New York and then, at among other places, at the Alias, a neighbourhood bistro in New York City's Lower East Side.

One of his mentors, Jonathan Waxman, taught him the meaning of simplicity and the importance of flavour.

Above all, he learned that you can't satisfy a customer unless you please yourself.

"You have to love what you're doing. Cooking is my passion. It's inside me. I've never really done anything else."

One of Toronto's few professional Jewish chefs, he serves up a medley of mouth-watering dishes at the Drake.

His appetizers range from mixed greens, tossed with candied hot walnuts, Macintosh apples and Benedictine blue cheese, to hot smoked trout, accompanied by polenta fries, mustard and garlic.

His "classics," or entrees, are the gamut from aged striploin with wild mushroom ragout and black truffle aioli to sauteed potatoes and parmesan dumplings with wild mushrooms, roast squash, sage, chili and chestnuts.

At home, he and his wife share the cooking. When they eat out, they tend to frequent Italian, Chinese and Mediterranean restaurants.

He hasn't plotted out his future, but he's certain that he'll be collaborating with Jeff Stober, the proprietor of the Drake. As Rose put it, "We work together very well."

BAKED ONTARIO GOAT CHEESE AND GRILLED RADICCHIO WITH WALNUT DRESSING

1 lb. soft unripened goat cheese
6 heads radicchio, cut in quarters-
1 1/2 cups deeply toasted walnuts
1 cup extra virgin olive oil
1/4 cup white wine vinegar
1 bunch oregano leaves picked juice from 2 lemons salt and pepper
2 tbsp. chili flakes extra virgin olive oil for drizzle

Heat gas or charcoal grill to medium. Season radicchio quarters with salt and pepper, extra virgin olive oil and chili flakes. Grill radicchio on all sides until there is a little char, but they're still a little firm to the touch. Set aside, cool and rough cut.

In a blender, put 1/2 the walnuts, 1 cup extra virgin olive oil, vinegar, salt and pepper. Blend until smooth. Season with lemon juice, salt and pepper. Arrange radicchio on plate, crumble cheese on top, drizzle vinaigrette, scatter walnuts and finish with oregano leaves and a drizzle of extra virgin olive oil. Makes at least 10 servings.

his present position at the Drake, located on trendy Queen Street West.

Rose, an amiable fellow who talks, thinks and dreams about food, specializes in California cuisine, which celebrates fresh seasonal fare, and in farmhouse cooking, which emphasizes simplicity.

But being inventive, Rose has no problem venturing into new territory.

Last week, in honour of the Taste of Iceland festival - which runs until March 16 and publicizes Icelandic's first non-stop flight between Toronto and Reykjavik, set for May 2 - Rose collaborated with Icelandic chef Hakon Orvarsson to cook up a storm.

At a media luncheon at the Drake, the pair laid on a memorable meal of Nordic proportions.

An appetizer of pickled herring on Icelandic rye bread was followed by a first course of shredded salt cod soup and root vegetables garnished with horseradish.

The second course, consisting of grilled Ontario lamb, smoked lamb sausage, mashed rutabagas, potatoes and pickled red cabbage with caraway, was topped off by an unusual dessert, rhubarb tart.

"My Russian ancestors would have been familiar with that," he said.

Rose is no stranger to the kitchen. By the time he was 14, he was flipping pizzas in a pizzeria.

And when he studied geography and geology at Montreal's Concordia University, thinking he might be a forest ranger, he hung on his parents by the Court.

Question. My ex has been ordered by the court to make support payments. He is not doing so. I found out that he finally took on a job after two years and where he was working. I called FRO and they garnished his wages. After two weeks of garnishment he left/quit his job. He told me himself that he quit.

He is in arrears to me for over $5,000. I found out today from our children that his common law wife has now gone to work. He is staying home and not working so that he doesn't have to pay support. How does this work due to the fact that we are not divorced and he is living common law? Can her wages be garnished?

Answer: If he quit work the Court would likely order the same amount of support as if he was still working at the job he quit.

Have the FRO enforce that, and if he defends on the basis that he quit his job he will get nowhere with a Judge. However, his common-law spouse is in no way liable, unless she is hiding his assets in her name. If she married him, she still would not be liable. Her wages cannot be garnished. If he doesn't pay, the FRO will likely suspend his driver's license, his passport and possibly have a Judge throw him in jail. Finally, your rights to child support do not change upon divorce.

Question. A father paid child support for his son faithfully until he turned 18, never missing a payment. At 18 the son stopped attending school and the court authorized child support payments to end.

Now the son is nearly 21 years of age and has come back to sue the father for payment of his OSAP loan, residence at college, books, etc. Is this allowed?

The father remarried and has two daughters, one going on 16 and the other one going on 18 and she will be going to college, provided father does not have to pay for the son.

Answer: I question whether the father would be responsible for repayment of a loan which is his son's obligation. But he may well be responsible for reimbursing his son for at least part of his education costs.

When child support ended at age 18, it was child support payable to the custodial parent, not child support per se. The child may well have retained his rights for support, including schooling, if he is still deemed to be dependent

Celiacs can enjoy Purim treats, too

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The C.J.N.

Purim is one of the few holidays when we can eat sweets with abandon. We feast on hamantaschen, cookies, chocolate treats and other goodies on this festive day. But not everyone can partake of the hamantaschen and cookies.

Celiacs, people who can't tolerate gluten, can't eat anything made with wheat, oats, rye, spelt or other glutinous grains. Since celiac disease is quite prevalent these days it's important to include some gluten-free treats among the mishloach manot offerings.

If there are no nut or peanut allergies, one can add chocolate covered almonds or pecans and/or chocolate-dipped dry fruit to the platter or basket, which would be suitable for most celiacs. However, finding sweet recipes without all-purpose flour or graham cracker crumbs can be a challenge. The following gluten-free recipes come from Mamma Now Cooks Like This!: The Best of Susan Mendelson (Whitecap Books, 2006) and could satisfy the sweet tooth of any dessert aficionado.

ROCKY ROADS

- 1 cup butter
- 2 lb. semi-sweet chocolate
- 1 1/2 cups hazelnuts
- 2 cups whole almonds
- 1 10-oz. bag mini-marshmallows or whole marshmallows cut in quarters

Preheat oven to 350 and lightly grease and flour a 13x9-inch baking pan. Melt butter and chocolate in the top of a double boiler and allow to cool.

Toast nuts on a cookie sheet in preheated oven for 10 to 12 minutes or until golden. Cool. Stir marshmallows and nuts into slightly cooled chocolate mixture. Spread into prepared pan. Refrigerate for 2 to 3 hours. Cut into small squares. Makes 30 squares.

LYNN'S CHOCOLATE PUDDING CAKE

Susan Mendelson's twin sister Lynn Mendelson, also a cookbook author and caterer, is known for her baking. Her chocolate pudding cake is one of her signature recipes. She recommends using a high quality chocolate for this recipe. "The better the chocolate, the better the cake."

- 6 eggs
- 1/2 cup plus 1 tbsp. sugar
- 1 1/4 cups sugar
- 1/2 cup butter
- 1/4 cup water
- 14 oz. semi-sweet chocolate, chopped and melted

Preheat oven to 350 and line a 9x5-inch loaf pan with buttered parchment paper. Mix together eggs and 1/2 cup and 1 tbsp. of sugar.

Melt butter in water over medium-high heat, then add 1 1/4 cups sugar and stir until it dissolves. Add hot sugar mixture to egg mixture. Whisk melted chocolate into egg-sugar mixture. Pour batter into prepared pan. Run a couple of inches of water in a larger pan and place loaf pan inside it. Bake 75 to 80 minutes, until set. Chill. Garnish with whipped cream (optional). Makes 10 to 12 servings.

ALMOND FUDGE TORTE

Mendelson makes this recipe with all-purpose flour, but she has also adapted the recipe for an uncle who has celiac disease, substituting rice flour for wheat flour.

- 1/2 cup almonds, toasted and ground
- 1/2 cup rice flour
- 1 cup butter
- 7 oz. semi-sweet chocolate
- 1/4 cup sugar
- 1 1/2 tsp. coffee liqueur
- 4 eggs

Preheat oven to 350 and grease and flour a 9-inch round cake pan.

Combine and set aside nuts and rice flour. Melt butter and chocolate. Let cool for a couple of minutes, then add sugar.

In a separate bowl, mix eggs and liqueur and then add to chocolate mixture. Now add dry ingredients. Bake in prepared pan for 25 minutes. Do not overbake. Cool. Place cake on rack with plate underneath. Pour Lazy Gourmet Glaze (recipe follows) over top and gently spoon over sides. Decorate with 8 to 10 whole almonds. Makes 10 servings.

LAZY GOURMET GLAZE

- 1/4 cup butter
- 4 oz. semi-sweet chocolate
- 2 tbsp. whipping cream
- 1 tbsp. coffee liqueur

Melt butter and chocolate together. Mix cream and liqueur and blend into melted chocolate. Makes about 1/2 cup.

Hamas admits training in Iran, Syria

By RUTH MARGALIT

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas has sent hundreds of militants to train in Iran and Syria in the past two years, a commander in the Iz al-Din al-Qassam military wing of Hamas said in a rare interview with The Sunday Times of London.

Speaking on the record but on condition of anonymity, the Hamas commander, already a senior figure in his late 20s, told the British newspaper that Hamas had been sending militants to Iran for training in both field tactics and weapons technology since Israel pulled out of the Gaza Strip in 2005. Others, he said, go to Syria for more basic training.

"We have sent seven 'courses' of our fighters to Iran," he said in the interview. "During each course, the group is trained to increase our capacity to fight."

The most promising members of each group stay longer for an advanced course and return as trainers themselves, he said. "We send our best brains to Tehran. It would be a waste of money to send them and then have them come back with nothing."

The report confirms assessments made by Shin Bet Director Yuval Diskin last week in a speech in front of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee. "Hundreds of Hamas members have been sent to Iran for training, and not training periods of a week, two weeks or a month, but for long-term, high-quality training," committee member MK Zvi Hendel, of the National Union party, quoted Diskin as saying last Tuesday.

The Sunday Times' report suggests that these assessments were right and that so far, 150 members of Hamas' military wing have completed training in Tehran, where they study for between 45 days and six months at a closed military base under the command of the elite Revolutionary Guard force.

An additional 150 are currently undergoing training in Tehran, the commander said. Conditions at the base are strict, he said, adding that a further 650 Hamas militants have trained in Syria under instructors who were themselves trained in Iran. Sixty-two Hamas militants are currently in Syria, he said.

'Monstrous attack must bring about major change'

Regardless of any differences of opinion, we are all part of this pain."

The yeshiva occupies an almost mythical place in the psyche of the national religious camp. The movement that subsequently became known as the "settler" movement was born there.

Rabbi Avraham Kook, who founded the yeshiva in 1925, was the founder of religious Zionism. His son, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook, headed the yeshiva for decades and famously told his students, "Close the Talmud and go settle in Judea and Samaria."

And settle they did.

It was from the study halls of the yeshiva that a generation would establish Jewish settlements in the hills of the West Bank and sand dunes of Gaza.

Many of the boys who study at the yeshiva travel there from their homes in West Bank Jewish settlements that their mothers and fathers helped establish. Among the yeshiva's graduates are the elite of the settler movement: rabbis, prominent scholars and Knesset members.

In announcing the tragic deaths, the yeshiva released a statement in which its rabbis described their institution as "the great Torah centre, in the holy of holies of the nation, the heart of the State of Israel."

Just three weeks before the Six Day War in 1967, on Israel's 19th Independence Day, Rabbi Zvi Kook used his address to his students to bemoan the loss of the biblical heartland in the West Bank.

Nearly weeping, he asked, "Where is our Jericho? Where is our Nablus?"

His students were stunned by his unusual lamentations and seemingly without warning found themselves in those same places within weeks of his talk.

"Within religious Zionist circles, that speech was very quickly seen as an outburst of prophecy," said Yossi Klein Halevi, a senior fellow at the Adelson Institute for Strategic Studies at the Shalem Center, a Jerusalem think-tank. "The Mercat Harav yeshiva's significance is far deeper for the religious community than politics. The politics are an expression of prophecy."

"So this is an assault of place of prophecy," he said, referring to the attack.

Many of the religious Zionist community's rabbis have called on the Olmert government to take a more decisive, military stand to protect Israel.

"Within that community there is deep anger, even rage, at what is perceived to be the government's inability to turn the tragedy into strength, and for the religious Zionist community, it compounds the tragedy," Klein Halevi said.

"What that community wants to see is a decision by the government to go to war with the intention of winning. Whether that's against Hamas or Hezbollah now or in the future, whether it relates to Iran, the religious Zionist community is desperate for a government decision to fight the enemies of Israel with resolve."

The yeshiva in its statement reflected this sentiment, saying: "This monstrous attack must bring about a major and substantial change. We call upon and demand from the government of Israel to wake up and to fight to the end, without mercy, against the enemies of Israel."

Terror strikes Jerusalem yeshiva

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

A gunman stormed into the Yeshivat Mercatz Harav complex in west Jerusalem on March 6, mowing down students who had gathered in the library for the traditionally intensive pre-Shabbat classes.

The gunman was killed by a police SWAT team, according to Israeli media reports.

Eight boys – seven of whom were aged 15 to 19 and one aged 26 – were killed and nine more wounded when the gunman entered the yeshiva in Jerusalem's Kiryat Moshe neighbourhood and opened fire in the library. Three of the wounded were in critical condition.

Seven of the students injured were still hospitalized at Hadassah University Hospital, Ein Kerem and at Shaare Zedek Medical Center, Jerusalem, as of last weekend.

As of the weekend, the condition of the three students at Hadassah Ein Kerem had improved, but one was still in intensive care for observation. A hospital spokesperson said all of the students had multiple gunshot wounds.

Hamas initially claimed responsibility for last Thursday's attack, but later retracted it.

Ala Abu Dahim, 25, from the village of Jabal Mukhbar – a neighbourhood where Palestinian residents hold Israeli ID cards that give them freedom of movement in Israel – was shot and killed during the massacre.

Several residents of Jabal Mukhbar said he had been a driver at the yeshiva he attacked. His family set up a mourning tent last Friday and hung green Hamas flags outside their home.

As of Monday, eight people had been arrested by the Israeli authorities on suspicion of abetting Abu Dahim.

Mercatz Harav is the ideological seedbed for Israel's national religious movement, which combines Orthodox piety with pioneering Zionism. Many of the yeshiva's alumni have gone on to top posts in politics and the military.

Witnesses reported blood splashes on the pavement outside the seminary, where anxious relatives milled among ambulance staff and security forces.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas condemned the yeshiva shooting. Meanwhile, Israel said it would continue U.S.-backed peace talks with the Palestinians despite the attack.

In Canada, Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier offered condolences to the victims' families and to the Israeli government.

"Canada condemns this terrorist act in the strongest possible terms. It does nothing to advance the Palestinian cause," he said.

"Canada calls on all Palestinian leaders to reject such atrocious terrorist acts, which are contrary to the peace process."

Calling it a "senseless tragedy," Liberal opposition leader Stéphane Dion extended his sympathies to those affected and said that his party "joins the international community in condemning such deplorable acts of violence."

Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who recently was asked to head a new international coalition to combat anti-Semitism, addressed the House of Commons the day after the attack and called for the "culture of hate" in the Middle East to end.

"It is this state-sanctioned hate and incitement that leads to Hamas missiles targeting Israeli civilians in Sderot and Ashkelon, and terrorist attacks in Jerusalem," he said.

On its website, the NDP called the loss of life "tragic" and said the party "condemns all violence against civilians and calls on all sides to categorically reject using violence against civilian populations."

North American Jewish leaders also decried the attack.

Speaking to The C/N last Friday, Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, urged the government and the people of Canada to understand the "toxic theology of hate" that's being inculcated by extremists in Israel.

"After this horrific attack, there's a need for Canadians to understand what Israel is faced with... the ongoing attacks and the culture of terror we have to struggle with," Ronen said. "Wanting and encouraging a peace process is one thing, but a [real] understanding of the situation Israel is faced with has to be the framework that the government and opposition uses to engineer their [policies]."

In the United States, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations – the central co-ordinating body for American Jewry – called the attack "barbaric" and said it demonstrates "the need for Israel to take whatever measures are necessary to prevent, deter and destroy those who perpetrate such heinous crimes."

For some members of the Jewish community in Canada, the tragedy hit close to home.

Nadav Eliyahu Samuels, a 15-year-old boy who holds Canadian, British and Israeli citizenship and is a student at Mercatz Harav, was shot several times in the legs and chest.

The National Post reported that he was placed in intensive care at Jerusalem's Hadassah Ein Kerem hospital, and although he was in stable condition last week, he was breathing with the help of a ventilator.

Nadav, whose father is a Toronto native who moved to Israel in 1983, made annual trips to Toronto with his family to visit his grandparents, Sandra and Laurie Samuels.

York University Professor Martin Lockshin, who studied at Yeshivat Mercatz Harav for four years from 1970 to 1974, has fond memories of his time there.

"The years that I spent at Mercatz Harav were some of the richest years of my life from an intellectual and religious perspective," Lockshin told The C/N in an e-mail from Jerusalem, where he is on sabbatical.

"This was a cowardly attack on defenceless teenagers who were just trying to study Torah and develop their minds."

Meir Buchnick, a 24-year-old from Hashmonaim, a city between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, is currently spending a year at Kollel Torah MiTzion in Montreal studying and teaching there.

He said he studied at Yeshivat Mercatz Harav as part of a high school program that gives students the opportunity to study there for days and even weeks at a time.

Buchnick said that when he first heard the news, he was shocked.

"Because I live in Israel... this one hit really, really close. For anyone who lives in Israel, he knows how big and important this yeshiva is. It is the core of all the seminaries in Israel. To hear that something like that happened... I was in total shock," he said.

"I know a few people who still study there. Thank God, none of them were killed or injured. One of the first things I had to do yesterday was make phone calls to find out and hear if, God forbid, something happened to a friend. Thank God none of them were hurt."

Buchnick added that in spite of continued attacks on Israelis, they must stay strong.

"Mercatz Harav was founded by Rav [Avraham Yitzhak HaKohen] Kook and it was Rav Kook's inspiration and guidance that taught us that no matter what, even with all the hardships and with all the pain, we still have to continue going on. The terrorists want to break our spirit and we can't let that happen."

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Toronto's Kehillat Shaarei Torah has three children currently living and studying in Israel.

As he does each week, Rabbi Tradburks sent out a mass e-mail to his congregation last Thursday with Shabbat announcements and his thoughts. Last week, he wrote about the young victims of the attack.

"The first thing I think of is my own children. Knowing they are not in danger is a relief. But reading the news is not easy. I have been in Mercatz Harav. When they say the terrorist entered the library, I think they mean the beis midrash. There can be hundreds of people sitting and studying there. It is not hard to visualize the helplessness of these high school boys, the chaos."

Rabbi Tradburks told The C/N that his daughter, who lives about a 20-minute walk from the yeshiva, heard the ambulances and immediately called home.

"She called our other kids and within minutes, they called us, hoping it was before we had heard the news, just to tell us everything was OK," he said.

"My son, Elie, is at Yeshivat Hakotel and one of the boys who was killed was the son of one of the teachers at Yeshivat Hakotel. Yochai Lipschitz was one of the boys."

He said that his other son, Yosef, who studies at the Mir Yeshiva near Meah Shearim, learned about the massacre when another student announced that he wanted to recite psalms for the dead.

Rabbi Tradburks said that his three children attended the funeral for the eight victims at Mercatz Harav before the families of the victims went their separate ways for the individual funerals.

Jerusalem bore the brunt of the Palestinian suicide bombing campaign of 2002 and 2003, but since then, effective Israeli countermeasures have largely stemmed the bloodshed in the capital.

Many Jerusalemites have voiced exasperation at the slow pace at which the West Bank security fence is going up in the city due to bureaucratic holdups and legal challenges by Palestinians who stand to lose land to the project.

"This tragedy shows the enormous need to attend to the fence," said Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski.

Israel & the Jewish World

Shooting sparks closure

Israel shut down the West Bank and the Gaza Strip after last week's terror attack on the Mercat HaRav yeshiva in Jerusalem. The closure was launched at 1 a.m. last Friday, just hours after a killer walked into the cafeteria of the yeshiva in west Jerusalem and opened fire, killing eight students before being killed in retaliatory fire. Police also limited access to Friday prayers at the Al Aqsa and Dome of the Rock mosques in Jerusalem's Old City to women and men 45 or older and bearing identity cards from inside Israel. Thousands of police were deployed throughout Jerusalem.

Arabs may repeal offer

The Arab League is considering a review of its 2002 plan for comprehensive peace with Israel. Arab League foreign ministers meeting last week in Cairo deplored Israel's recent offensive in the Gaza Strip and said regional peace prospects were in doubt. Under the 2002 offer, Israel would be recognized by the Arab world in exchange for giving up land captured in the 1967 Six Day War and agreeing to a solution to the Palestinian refugee problem. Israel has welcomed the initiative but balked at placing preconditions on peace talks.

Israel Briefs

The Arab League stopped short of saying it would withdraw the offer, or of calling on the Palestinian Authority to curtail U.S.-sponsored peace talks with Israel.

New sanctions on Iran

Israel welcomed the new round of sanctions against Iran last Monday, voicing hope that it would succeed in getting Iran to abandon its uranium enrichment efforts. The UN Security Council stepped up sanctions aimed at curbing Iran's nuclear program. By a vote of 14 in favour and one abstention, the Security Council decided March 3 to impose a third round of sanctions against Tehran, including financial blacklisting and an expanded ban on selling technologies to Iran that could be used for military projects. Iran defied the two previous sanctions resolutions, in 2006 and 2007, though independent analysts said its economy was hit hard by the measures.

Carter, Annan offer to help

Jimmy Carter and Kofi Annan have offered to broker a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas. The former U.S. president and former UN secretary general recently proposed to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that they act as go-betweens in truce talks between the Jewish state and the ruling Palestinian Islamist faction, Army Radio reported. Should they come, Carter and Annan would require Israeli permission to enter Gaza, which has been under embargo since Hamas took power in 2006. According to Israel's Army Radio, Jerusalem opposes the initiative but has yet to make a final decision.

3 held in bomb plot

Philippine authorities said they foiled an alleged plot to bomb the Israeli and U.S. embassies in the country. Three Middle Eastern suspects were arrested under counter-terrorism regulations, Manila officials said. Associated Press quoted local sources as saying there was intelligence indicating the suspects planned to attack the Israeli and U.S. embassies, as well as possibly the British and Australian missions. The Philippines has an active Al Qaeda wing, Jemaah Islamiyah.

Captivity, beating of French Jew echoes horrors of Halimi

By BRETT KLINE
JTA

PARIS — French authorities are saying the recent captivity and beating of a 19-year-old Jewish man in a Paris suburb was committed by delinquents, related to money and fuelled by alcohol. But the Jewish community here is instinctively linking the Feb. 22 incident to the torture and murder two years ago of Ilan Halimi, a 23-year-old French Jewish man.

"Everyone is thinking about Ilan," said pharmacist Danielle Brami in the Belleville district of Paris. "We know very well that the two incidents are not the same. But people were very scared when Ilan was killed, and now this incident also provokes fear — fear that Jews are in danger."

In last month's incident, Mathieu Roumi was held for nine hours in a garage by six men of various ethnic and religious backgrounds aged 17 to 25. They handcuffed Roumi, then beat and kicked him over money he allegedly owed them.

They then scribbled "sale juif" — "dirty Jew" — with a marker on his face while making references to Halimi, who was kidnapped and tortured for three weeks before he was dumped on the streets. He died shortly thereafter.

Roumi was held in Bagneux, where he and his attackers lived, and the same suburb just south of Paris where

A memorial ceremony for Ilan Halimi at "La Grande Synagogue de la Victoire" in Paris on February 23, 2006.

Halimi was killed by a gang calling itself the Barbarians. More than two dozen people, notably gang leader Youssef Fofana, go on trial soon for Halimi's murder.

Unlike Halimi, however, Roumi knew his aggressors and went with them voluntarily to an apartment to discuss their financial dispute before he was taken to a nearby garage.

The alleged assailants were arrested Feb. 27 and held for several days before being formally charged with violence linked to the religion and alleged sexual orientation of the victim, acts of torture, and sequestration by an organized gang.

Believing Roumi was a homosexual, they had forced him to swallow cigarette butts and suck on a condom-covered stick. They also wrote "dirty fag" on his face and yelled their admiration for Fofana.

Jewish community officials say the fact that an ordinary argument over money in the neighbourhood could escalate into a violent captivity with an anti-Semitic nature is dangerous.

"There is a kind of banalization of anti-Semitic acts going on here," said Joel Mergui, the head of the French Consistoire, the Jewish body of religious affairs. "These guys knew each other from the neighbourhood, but they handcuffed him for nine hours and scribbled 'dirty Jew' on his face."

Richard Prasquier, the president of the Jewish umbrella organization CRIF, said Roumi had a non-Jewish mother and his father "is not connected to the Jewish community."

Prasquier was only informed of the affair on Wednesday morning, though police had told the Jewish community's protection service when officials confirmed the anti-Semitic character of the violence.

The CRIF head said there is nothing to indicate any breakdown in communications.

"The police had to conduct their investigation, and they did their job," he said.

Police said the six suspects, who reportedly admitted their actions to police, were unemployed and have had trouble with the law.

Roumi has been out of school for two years and has no criminal record, but he has been involved in cases of theft, the sale of stolen objects and vandalism, his father, Jean-Paul, was quoted as saying in the Le Figaro newspaper Thursday.

"These guys are all delinquents and apparently not too bright," said Armand Funaro, an osteopath in upper Belleville. "It used to be that petty criminal activity in tough suburbs stayed just that, but now there is this anti-Semitic element, and it is scary. And Bagneux is a nice place, not at all a ghetto."

"In Tunisia, these things did not happen to us, but in secular, republican France they happen."

Funaro became more agitated as he went on. His voice rising, he said, "The public school system is failing. The kids who become losers are ignored by the system and by the general public. The Gallic French have always ignored petty criminality in the suburbs, and if it turns anti-Semitic often enough, they will ignore that also. And that is bad for the Jews in France."

Former yeshiva student finds hip world-music band

By RHONDA SPIVAK

Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — Basya Schechter, who was born into a haredi family of seven children in Borough Park, Brooklyn, taught herself to play guitar when she was 19 years old.

"I was never taught to read or write music, and I still can't," says Schechter, but that hasn't stopped her from making music that is rich, innovative and highly original.

Today, the singer, songwriter and multi-instrumentalist performs a unique blend of world music. With her band Pharaoh's Daughter, which she formed in the mid-1990s, she fuses Middle Eastern and Jewish chassidic sounds, giving it a hip, modern edge.

Last month, Schechter performed for the first time in Canada at a sold-out concert presented by the Rady Jewish Community Centre in Winnipeg.

As a child, Schechter grew up singing zmirot at the Shabbat table with her family and was surrounded by Hebrew music that her father played at home. She went to an all-girls yeshiva, and there spent her time inventing six-part harmonies with her friends. The prayer-filled cadences of those childhood years are woven into her music, which is layered and complex, and frequently has a chanting quality to it.

"As children in yeshiva, we translated texts from Hebrew to Yiddish, from one language that we didn't know into another language we didn't know. Even though I didn't really understand what I was doing, I liked it. I liked the chanting, and it has never left me," Schechter says.

She eventually widened her horizons when as a teenager she went on a tour of Israel, Africa and Turkey with her guitar in hand. The rhythms of her inspirational journey, to Egypt, Central Africa, Kurdistan and Greece, resonate in her music, and her extensive travels have produced music with a scintillating world beat vibe.

Pharaoh's Daughter is good-sized band. Schechter plays oud (a Middle East string instrument), guitar and percussion, as well as singing; her bandmates include keyboardist Jason Lindner; accordion player and vocalist Uri Sharlin; and drummer Yuval Lion. Daphna Mor plays recorders and other instruments, along with contributing vocals. A bassist, a violinist and others round out the band.

The name Pharaoh's Daughter is an English translation of Schechter's first name, Basya.

"Basya means daughter of God, and is the name that was given to Pharaoh's daughter in the Bible when she rescued Moses as a baby in the river in Egypt," she says.

The title of Schechter's latest album, her fifth, is Haran, a place she visited in Turkey. "Haran is where Abraham first started his journey in the Bible, and that's why I was drawn to the name," she says.

In Haran, Schechter sings in biblical Hebrew, Aramaic, Hebrew and Yiddish, and the influence of her Sephardi upbringing is evident in many of her selections.

For example, her soulful rendition of Kah Ribon, sung in Aramaic, is a prayer titled Ya Ribon (Master of the Universe), written by a Sephardi rabbi. It was a zmirot that was sung around her Shabbat table.

In another innovative selection, she uses passages from Shir Hashirim, which Schechter says she chose "because both the male and female appear to be equal." At other times, the words in her music appear to be a collage of Hebrew and Aramaic texts.

One of Schechter's personal favourites from Haran is the Hebrew Yonati. "I like it because it feels round. I feel like I can float on the music. It's new and it's different," she says.

In an earlier album, titled Exile, the songs Schechter wrote are in English. The title track of the album is about giving birth. It has a particularly beautiful melody that sounds like folk music mixed with "dye, dye, dye" sounds that are typical of chassidic niggunim.

Pharaoh's Daughter has performed in New York, at Central Park's Summer Stage Series and at the Lincoln Center; in London, England's prestigious Queen Elizabeth Hall; and this past December the band toured Israel and was featured at the Sephardic Music Festival.

Schechter expects to be back performing in Israel this summer. "All of my siblings live in Yerushalayim, and my parents are also making aliyah," she says. She considers herself the "rebel" in the family because she is not Orthodox and prefers to live in the heart of the New York, where she's close to the music scene, rather than in Jerusalem. But, she says, "my family listens to my music."

When she's not touring or performing, Schechter plays in the ensemble that accompanies Friday night services in New York at Congregation B'nai Jeshurun.

Illuminating interviews paint candid portrait of Woody Allen

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Woody Allen once famously quipped: "I don't want to achieve immortality through my work. I want to achieve it through not dying."

Whether or not he achieves that wish, his name has already attained the poetic equivalent of immortality due to his extraordinary film career. Although the celebrated writer-director has often portrayed himself on screen as a comical Jewish-intellectual "nebbish" from New York, full of existential doubts, fears and paranoia, he has carved a distinguished niche for himself in American culture and the modern cinema.

My personal list of favourite Woody Allen films includes Broadway Danny Rose (1984), Hannah and Her Sisters (1986), Radio Days (1987), Husbands and Wives (1992) and Sweet and Lowdown (1999). I consider 2005's Match Point, starring Scarlett Johansson and Jonathan Rhys Meyers, to be his finest production. Sharply written and beautifully directed, it is superior even to the admirable Crimes and Misdemeanors (1989), which shares a similar plot.

In both films, a married man involved in an adulterous relationship murders his increasingly demanding lover and gets away with it, opening up central existential issues dealing with fate, luck, justice and the existence – or non-existence, as Allen often puts it – of God. A significant difference between them is that Allen played a minor comic character in Crimes and Misdemeanors, but wrote himself entirely out of the script of Match Point.

His filmography also includes Play It Again, Sam (1972), Annie Hall (1977), Manhattan (1979), Stardust Memories (1980), Zelig (1983), The Purple Rose of Cairo (1985), Everyone Says I Love You (1996) and at least a dozen others, almost any of which might have catapulted another director to the uppermost ranks of critical attention.

Allen made a string of mediocre and poorly received films in the mid-1990s. The period coincided with his breakup with his longtime partner, Mia Farrow, upon her discovery that he was having an affair with her adopted daughter, Soon-Yi Previn, whom he eventually married. Throughout the scandal, Allen kept to his rigorous output of roughly one film per year, but the quality dropped off – astonishing many loyal fans who thought his artistic vision could never fail him. Some critics assert his dry spell lasted about a decade and hailed Match Point as a sign that he had finally returned to form and was again at the top of his game.

Eric Lax, an American writer on the arts and author of a now-outdated biography of Allen, has conducted dozens of illuminating interviews with Allen on dozens of film sets, in hotel rooms and other locations over the last 30 years. An astute critic with no shortage of intelligent questions and observations, Lax's wide-ranging conversations with Allen provide a candid portrait of the artist in his own words. Film buffs and fans of Woody Allen will appreciate this opportunity to learn more about the man, his methods of filmmaking, his opinions on art and, above all, his means of nurturing his own prolific creativity.

Allen views his own abilities without delusions and with much apparent realism. He succinctly expresses his limitations as an actor as adeptly as any critic. He recognizes that he is a limited comic type on screen who would lack credibility as the protagonist of a serious drama. Consequently, he prefers to write himself out of scripts entirely (as in Match Point) or else to create only peripheral parts for himself (as in Crimes and Misdemeanors).

Despite his natural comic gift, he considers comedy less emotionally satisfying than serious drama. However, he has had limited critical success with his repeated forays into more serious, Bergmanesque-type cinematic landscapes, as in Interiors (1978), Stardust Memories and Shadows and Fog (1991). Serious drama is a higher form of art, he says.

"When comedy approaches a problem, it kinks it but it doesn't resolve it. Drama works through it in a more emotionally fulfilling way. I don't want to sound brutal, but there's something immature, something second-rate in terms of satisfaction when comedy is compared to drama. And it will always be that way. It will never, never have the stature of Death of a Salesman or A Streetcar Named Desire or Long Day's Journey into Night."

Allen utters high praise for cinematic masters such as Bergman and Fellini, but has no compunction against knocking – as if with a clumsy elbow – the great Bard of English literature from his traditional pedestal. Only a refreshingly creative mind like his could observe, with compelling originality, that Shakespeare is an unskillful playwright. Allen admits that he admires "not so much [Shakespeare's] plays but the words of the plays. They're written so beautifully. I don't find any of his comedies funny, but the speech is so magnificent, it's so gorgeous, that you're overcome by it. But I find the plays dumb and bumpkin-oriented and aimed at the groundlings. The serious plays have some really beautiful moments, but often they're not constructed at all well. But you sit through them because the language is so elevated."

Woody Allen in a scene from Broadway Danny Rose

Surprisingly, Allen says he has an innate sense of movie-making but no literary equivalent. "I didn't absorb literature in the same way as I absorbed movies or had comedy built into me. So when I finish a manuscript I have to show it to people and ask, 'Is this a book? Is this a novel?' It wouldn't surprise me if a person said, 'You have not written a novel. You have a good outline for a novel,' or 'This has the makings of a good short story.'"

Allen writes with pen and notepad, often producing many pages of near-finished scenes at a sitting. Although he seems to write quickly, he spends many hours deliberating about character and plot, and "the thinking is the writing; the writing is (just) the writing down." When he pens a comic line of dialogue, he often laughs as if hearing it for the first time. "I'm in the room and I write the joke or say the joke out loud and it's coming from my unconscious, so I'm hearing it and I laugh at it like a stranger." He has an extraordinary ear for dialogue and is known for his rare ability to write female and male characters with equal depth.

Another intriguing element of his creative modus operandi is his insistence that his cast members see only the pages of the script that they need in order to learn their dialogue; as in real life, his characters are otherwise kept in the dark about what is going to happen. "No one has ever complained to me about not getting a full script," he explained.

Indeed, big-name actors are usually thrilled to be invited to read for a part, even though Allen's production company cannot offer the mega-millions they might receive from a big-budget production. Even without the big bucks, many grab the chance to be part of Allen's cinematic "immortality."

Regarding his own artistic accomplishments, Allen acknowledges that he has had every opportunity to make a cinematic masterpiece, but has yet to do so, because he lacks the necessary determination and depth of vision. "I've had carte blanche for 35 years and I've never made a great film," he said. "I'd like to make a great film provided it doesn't conflict with my dinner reservation."

Celebrity hasn't turned Allen's head or made him a different person, it turns out: mostly, it just gets in the way of what he wants to do. "After I had my first successes, which I needed to get established, it didn't mean much to me," he said. "Not that I'm an ingrate. I'm thankful for my luck, but to me, no success or honour bestowed on me can alleviate my genetic gloom."

Conversations with Woody Allen: His Films, the Movies, and Moviemaking (Knopf) splices together many discussions between Lax and Allen. They are arranged thematically according to how Allen constructs movies – conception, writing, casting, shooting, directing, editing, scoring – with the result that there is a cut-and-paste quality to the flow of ideas. Reading everything Allen has to say about Match Point, for example, means flipping to more than a dozen pages throughout the book. Had this been a movie, I'm sure that Allen would have found a better way of editing it.

Purim story becomes a musical at Beth Tikvah

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The C.J.N.

With Purim around the corner, Beth Tikvah Synagogue's music director, Eyal Bitton, saw it as the perfect opportunity for an in-concert performance of his play about Queen Esther.

In Miss Persia: The Musical in Concert, the Montreal-born Bitton takes a light-hearted approach to the biblical story of Esther. The heroine, Hadassah, a young woman living in ancient Persia, takes on the identity of Esther to win the Miss Persia pageant and become queen.

"The seeds of this show actually started in 1997, while I was working on a musical The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz put on by the Yiddish Theatre of Montreal. I remember being very stimulated by this new field - I just tied onto musical theatre the year before," said Bitton, 38.

"I never really grew up being a fan of musical theatre, but in 1996 I was starting to have ideas for a very dramatic musical, which turned into The Child [similar to a King Arthur legend] and at the same time I had this burst of creativity.

"I wondered what Dreamworks and Disney's take on the Esther story would be. I've always enjoyed Aladdin and Beauty and the Beast because of their style and wide audience appeal," he said.

Striving to use Jewish tradition and history as a springboard, Bitton believes Jewish literature to be "ancient and rich, starting with the Bible's wonderful timeless stories that are universal. Having resonance with Christians as well as Jews, why not use them as source material?"

Bitton began creating Miss Persia in 1997 but got sidetracked writing and producing The Child, King David the Musical and Moses the Musical Saga.

Eyal Bitton, Beth Tikvah's music director, wrote the musical Miss Persia: The Musical in Concert and his wife, Michèle Tredger, plays the lead role of Hadassah/Esther.

"At one point I had to put it [Miss Persia] aside because The Child came together more quickly. Every year there was always a project that took priority. But since I've been at Beth Tikvah [nearly five years] developing programming with the musical committee and Cantor Tibor Kovari, I thought this year might be the right occasion for this show."

After presenting his idea to the synagogue's music committee last September, Bitton revised and wrote additional solos, duets and chorus numbers in his two-act play centring on the strong, courageous female character, Hadassah/Esther, played by Michèle Tredger, his wife.

The couple met when Tredger auditioned in Montreal for one of Ayal's plays. Recognizing her talent, he enlisted her help in recording a demo tape of Miss Persia in 1998.

Tredger, a Quebec City native, has performed in Second City's production of Tony 'n' Tina's Wedding; HMS Pinafore (at the Drayton Festival Theatre in Drayton, Ont.); King David the Musical (Winter Garden Theatre); and Moses the Musical Saga. She co-hosted The Producers and The Directors, which aired on Bravo and Star TV.

Miss Persia's 15-member cast includes Vancouver actor-singer Martin Lindquist as Haman. The production's keyboardist is Greg Gibson, the associate musical director of Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People.

Miss Persia will be presented by Musica Beth Tikvah on Sunday, March 16 at 7:30 p.m. It will be performed in concert, without costumes or a set. "It's like a stage reading - the full cast is on stage during the entire production, stepping forward if they're involved in a particular scene," Bitton says.

"If it's a really good show it can be performed on an empty stage without costumes. I don't want people to judge this based on the set. Let the work stand on its own."

For tickets to Miss Persia, call 416-221-3433, ext. 354. General admission $25; reserved section $36; students and seniors $18; and under 18, $10.

NEARLY 100 PARTICIPANTS GEARING UP FOR BETH TZEDEC'S 'SHOW OF SHOWS'

For the third year in a row, Beth Tzedec Congregation is busy working on its "event of the year" – an original Purim family musical titled The Sound of Purim, production of which involves a 12-piece orchestra, state-of-the-art lighting and sound, colourful costumes, creative sets and an army of nearly 100 participants, onstage and behind the scenes.

The high-energy show was concocted by Cantor Simon Spiro, known in Europe as "The British Jazz Singer" for his ability to combine successful careers in both the Jewish world and the world of pop music, and his wife, Aliza, an award-winning singer-songwriter from the United States. Together, they manage to infuse the members of the company (who range in age from five to 78) with infectious enthusiasm that spills easily from the stage to the audience.

The Sound of Purim combines elements of the Purim story with The Sound of Music and features fresh orchestrations adapted by Spiro from the Rodgers and Hammerstein melodies. "It's an utterly ridiculous musical romp through the Megillah, with Haman, Mordechai and some Austrian nuns," among other characters, offers Aliza Spiro.

Performances are at Beth Tzedec, 1700

Bathurst St., on Thursday, March 20, after the Megillah reading, Saturday, March 22 at 9 p.m., and Sunday, March 23, 3 p.m. Advance tickets are $5 for adults, $2 for children 13 and under; $10 or $5 at the door. 416-781-3514

Out of the Cold Art Exhibit: The first Out of the Cold Art Exhibit features works by guests of Holy Blossom Temple's weekly Out of the Cold program. Proceeds to assist the artists and the program. Holy Blossom Temple, Philip Smith Hall, 1950 Bathurst St., March 17 to 19, 7 to 9 p.m. Opening reception Tuesday, March 18, 7 to 9 p.m.

Hillel Ventures into Theatre: Hillel of Greater Toronto presents as its first major theatrical student production Anything Goes, the famous 1930s musical by Noel Coward. (According to Wikipedia, Anything Goes and Porgy and Bess are the only two 1930s musicals that are still regularly revived.)

The student group has ventured into theatre in order to "engage new students and appeal to those looking for a creative outlet for their interests in the fine arts," says the show's director, Rachel Saslove, program associate at Ryerson University for Hillel of Greater Toronto. Many students, she has discovered, "share a passion for both theatre and their Judaism."

Conversations with a few participants quickly reveal the passion and excitement they are bringing to the stage. "Judaism is a big part of my life, second only to theatre," said Audrey Amar, political-science student at the University of Toronto, "so the Hillel musical was really the perfect way to blend two of the major ways I define myself."

For Tamara Winegust, in third-year film at Ryerson, the Hillel play was "a great way to meet other students and reconnect with my love of musicals." Naomi Kraiden, in second-year theatre at York, said, "When I saw the poster... I jumped at the opportunity to audition. Not only is Anything Goes a great musical with wonderful and catchy tunes, but I was also excited to see a way of mixing my love for theatre and music with a chance to get involved with the Jewish community on campus."

Catch the excitement of Hillel's theatrical debut. Tickets are $20; $12 for students and seniors in advance, $20 at the door. Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. Wednesday, March 12, and Thursday, March 13. Doors open 7:30, show starts 8 p.m. 416-913-2424

Life In A Jar: The Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada presents Life in a Jar, a play about Polish heroine Irena Sendler who saved 2,500 Jewish children during the Holocaust. The play was written in 1999 by students from a Kansas high school; it has since taken on a life of its own, and been performed more than 2,500 times across the United States, Canada and Poland.

The four girls who wrote and perform the play did not know any Jewish or Polish people when they started the project. They have since visited Irena in Warsaw, met diplomats and survivors, and toured Auschwitz and Treblinka. Presented by the Kansas high school students at the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, 750 Spadina Ave. Thursday, March 27, 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $15 ($10 for students) from the Polish Jewish Heritage Foundation, 416-651-5014; or in person at the Miles Nadal JCC front desk. 416-924-6211, ext. 606

Remembering Sholem Asch: Friends of Yiddish and the Workmen's Circle mark the 50th anniversary of Sholem Asch, the giant of 20th-century Yiddish literature, with a lecture by Gerry Kane that examines the work of this prolific Yiddish writer, especially his controversial novel The Nazarene (Der man fun Natseret). Faked Shoah memoir spurs concerns

JTA

In the wake of the recent disclosure by the author of a Holocaust memoir that her best-selling book is a fake, historians are worried that such incidents will cast doubt on legitimate Holocaust scholarship and memoirs.

Holocaust deniers already are having a field day with the story, observers say.

A prominent article about the hoax is featured on the website of Holocaust denier David Duke, who asserts that the case casts doubt on all "outlandish Holocaust tales."

Deborah Dwork, a Holocaust scholar who says she warned the publisher of the book, Misha: A Memoir of the Holocaust Years, a decade ago that the book's veracity was suspect, is most concerned about how young minds will be affected by such fakery.

The effect on young people, "who are not grounded in history and who may only vaguely remember talk that a memoir was not true," she said, "opens the door to greater readiness to acceptance of Holocaust denier arguments."

Judy Gans stars in The Little Foxes

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Judy Gans has been a member of Stage Centre Productions' acting company for 19 years and over that time has appeared in 30 shows.

Her latest role is Regina Giddens in the classic American play The Little Foxes. Written by Lillian Hellman, it's the story of the Hubbards, a southern family torn apart by their ruthlessness.

The play was originally set in the genteel American South of the 1900s, but the Stage Centre production takes place in 1936, during the Great Depression. When the family's get-rich scheme runs short of cash, the Hubbards will do anything to keep their dream alive. This stirring tale of family hatred and greed was partially based on southerner Hellman's own experiences. Regina is the youngest of the three Hubbard siblings.

Gans, 52, tackles her roles by doing a lot of research about the plays she's performing in. She likes to find the core motivation of her character and reads up on how the playwright sees the character.

"It is a family motivated by power and greed. Regina has always felt left out, because when her father died he left the family fortune to her two brothers," Gans says. "She uses her southern charm to manipulate those around her so that she can get what she wants."

Judy Gans

"It is a wonderful part because it is incredibly challenging and very different from my own character and that is always so much fun to do. It is fascinating how to figure out why someone like this is the way she is and what motivates her to stop at nothing to manipulate her whole family and turn people against each other. It is one of those parts that come in your acting career because it is someone you can never imagine being, but is so much fun to play."

The show is directed and designed by L. Garth Allen and includes Brad Emes as Leo Hubbard; Edward Karek as William Marshall; James Marshall as Benjamin Hubbard; Varda Shomrony as Birdie Hubbard; Frank Keenan as Oscar Hubbard; Sara VanBuskirk as Alexandra Giddens; and Alan Washbrook as Horace Giddens.

A longtime Torontonian, Gans has stayed in the city, except for two years, from 2000 to 2002, when she lived and acted in San Diego. Gans is a semi-professional actor who is paid for her performances from time to time. By day, she works as an information co-ordinator at the Toronto Humane Society.

"Acting is not something I am pursuing full time. I act for the sake of the creativity, the art, and the opportunity to get to play all kinds of characters and not have to rely on it to make a living. I never really wanted it to be something I would be desperate about," she says.

Gans is the niece of actors Sylvia and Ben Lennick. Her parents, Ben and Gerry, were professional actors who studied at the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York. Her parents still act in community theatre. In fact, at 86, her father is performing in film and on television.

"I encourage people to come and see the show," Gans says. "Even though it is a drama, it is a lot of fun as well, watching the antics of these competing siblings try to outsmart each other to win in the end. Audiences will walk out perhaps thinking of people they know or perhaps someone in their own family, who are like the characters in the play."

Three founders of the contemporary German storytelling movement – Gidon Horowitz, Regina Sommer, and Martin Ellrodt – will share stories from their multicultural repertoires, and discuss their experiences as storytellers in modern Germany, using stories to build new cultural awareness, spark wisdom, and help their fellow-citizens to ask difficult questions about German history. They will be hosted by Toronto storytellers Dan Yashinsky and Eli Rubenstein.

Holocaust deniers having field day with hoax

Dwork is the director of the Strassler Family Center for Holocaust and Genocide Studies at Clark University in Worcester, Mass.

Lawyers for the Belgian-born Massachusetts author known as Misha Defonseca issued a statement last week saying the book was not true, that the author isn't Jewish and that her real name actually is Monique De Wael.

De Wael, however, defended her work. "This story is mine. It is not actually reality, but my reality, my way of surviving," she said in the statement apologizing for the fabrication.

In the memoir, the author wrote that she lived with a pack of wolves after the Nazis abducted her parents, searched for her parents across Europe for four years as a young girl and murdered a German soldier.

She also claimed her parents were Belgian resistance fighters killed by the Nazis.

Boston Globe writer David Mehegan questioned the book's legitimacy a decade ago.

Translated into 18 languages, Misha was made into a popular film now playing throughout Europe. The film, by French filmmaker Vera Belmont, is called Survivre

Avec Le Loups (Surviving with Wolves.)

Deborah Lipstadt, a historian and expert on Holocaust denial, compared the incident to that of Benjamin Wilkomirski, whose popular Holocaust memoir Fragments was similarly discredited.

In the case of Misha, De Wael and her ghostwriter, Vera Lee, filed a lawsuit several years ago against the book's publisher, Jane Daniel, for insufficiently promoting the book in the U.S. market.

In 2001, the pair won an enormous judgment against Daniel when a judge tripled a jury's damages and awarded the two more than $30 million.

As the complicated story surrounding the book unravelled last week, the Belgian newspaper Le Soir reported that not only were De Wael's parents not killed by the Nazis, but they actually collaborated with them.

Relatives of De Wael's father, Robert, told Le Soir that Robert De Wael was responsible for denouncing a number of fellow townspeople to the Gestapo. He was not killed by the Nazis, relatives said, but died of natural causes after the war.

When townspeople learned about this after the war, Robert De Wael's name was removed from a Brussels monument to those who had died at the hands of the Nazis.

The Little Foxes

The play shows how big business operated back then, and Gans says it hasn't really changed to this day – ruthlessly taking over communities and not caring for the environment or the people who live there.

The Little Foxes runs from March 6 to 9, 13 to 16 and 19 to 22 at Fairview Public Library Theatre, 35 Fairview Mall Drive, Toronto. For tickets, call 416-299-5557 or visit www.stagecentreproductions.com.

Holistic World Expo opens at convention centre

By BENJAMIN GLEISSER
Special to The CJN

In the health care industry, today's buzzword is "empowerment." This means giving people a sense of control and informing them of the choices they have for managing their health.

One of those choices is holistic medicine, which is in the spotlight at the Holistic Statistics show that more people are embracing holistic medicine and looking to create a holistic lifestyle. According to a 2004 study by the Pew Internet Project, about six million people log onto the Internet every day to search health-related websites.

According to the study, 51 per cent sought information dealing with nutrition, vitamins and supplements (up from 44 per cent in 2002), while 23 per cent looked for data on experimental treatments and experimental medications (up from 18 per cent).

According to the American Holistic Health Association, a holistic lifestyle encourages people to balance and integrate their physical, mental, emotional and spiritual sides; establish respectful, co-operative relationships with others and the environment; make wellness-oriented lifestyle choices; and actively participate in their health decisions and healing process.

Murray says strengthening the mind-body-spirit connection is the key to good health. "Once you start taking better care of yourself, you feel lighter and more open to the mental flow of life. When you feel better, you have a more positive attitude. And people who become more joyful quite often become more consciously aware of a higher power. After all, spirituality is part of the healing process."

One of the Holistic World Expo's featured presenters is author and motivational speaker Bijan Anjomi, 64. Born in Iran, Anjomi came to the United States when he was 19 years old to study engineering. He went on to create his company, Effortless Prosperity, drawing on his Jewish background and knowledge of philosophy and world religions.

According to the company's website, www.effortlessprosperity.com, its aim is "to assist in opening people's hearts to joy, peace and a life of Effortless Prosperity." The company sells books and CDs, and Anjomi gives workshops worldwide. He has recently spoken about health, spirituality and empowerment in India, China and Japan.

Anjomi says that he has not been sick for a day in the past 18 years. "I stay healthy through clean living. I have no desire to smoke, drink or do drugs. I meditate a lot and stay connected to spirit. And I constantly choose to experience joy and peace, and avoid dark emotions."

At the expo, Anjomi will give two lectures: "Effortless Money - What is the Energy of Money?" and "Fantastic Relationships - No Matter What!"

"Both of my talks are about recognizing the opportunities for happiness around you," he says.

"If you believe you can have money or be loved, then you will attract money and love into your life. If you don't believe it, you will not attract these things you desire. However, if you're unhappy with who or where you are, then you have the power to change your life."

Presenters and vendors at the expo include Body and Hair Direct and Premier Spa Boutique, which import organic skin-care products from Israel; Leda Health Innovations, which imports and manufactures natural skin-care products for pregnant women and babies; Advantage Health Matters, which offers a line of organic nutritional supplements; BioPro Technology, whose products aim to block harmful radiation emissions from wireless electronic products; and Just For Me Music, which sells educational yet fun music for children.

"The songs on my CDs talk about things like food groups, the alphabet and safety issues," says Mark Alexander, the executive producer of Just For Me Music. "What makes the CDs unique are each one is personalized with a child's name, therefore he or she will pay more attention to the information in the song."

And how do children's music CDs fit in at a holistic health show? "Music and spirituality go hand in hand," Alexander says. "Every religion prays with music. Plus, children have a love of music. Songs touch the spirit of everyone."

For more information about the Holistic World Expo, call 416-966-2626 or visit www.holisticworld.org.

Bijan Anjomi

World Expo, March 14 to 16, at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

The event features guest speakers and about 200 exhibitors offering items ranging from nutritional supplements and organic baby-care products to chips that claim to block harmful radiation from cellphones and reduce the risk of getting cancer. There are also yoga, homeopathic medicine, biofeedback and massage therapy demonstrations.

"This event is for people who are already living a healthy lifestyle and for those who have heard about wellness and are looking for ways to change their life," says Yvette Murray, the show's producer.

"We don't see ourselves as 'New Age' tree huggers... Our aim is to provide knowledge for people who want to know more about empowering themselves. There's something for everyone here."

Israel & the Jewish World

Poland reaches out to expelled Jews

JTA

WARSAW — Poland will ease the way for Jews to reclaim citizenship 40 years after the start of massive expulsions.

In a letter released Monday, Polish Interior Minister Grzegorz Schetyna said he would "order the implementation of the appropriate procedures today."

Piotr Kadlick, the president of the Union of Religious Jewish Communities in Poland, told JTA he had already received verbal confirmation that Schetyna endorsed the plan to re-naturalize Jews who fled between 1968 and 1970. Some 15,000 Polish Jews were deprived of their citizenship.

Historians today look upon the period as a vast anti-Semitic campaign born of Soviet anti-Israel policies.

In fact, Kadlick said, it has been agreed that these former Poles actually never legally lost their citizenship. Once the decision is formalized, Jews who fled Poland can go to a Polish consulate in their new home country and "reconfirm their citizenship" as if they had never lost it, he said.

The decision to repatriate Polish Jews follows recent stepped-up pressure by Kadlick and Jewish advocacy groups in Poland. Golda Tencer, the head of Poland's Shalom Foundation, recently told the Polish newspaper Dziennik that President Lech Kaczynski had not yet answered her request of last October.

Schetyna said the problem could have been solved by Kaczynski, but "he did not take that opportunity."

Kadlick said the policy would apply particularly to Polish Jews who went to Israel, "because those who went to other places had no problem getting back their citizenship" up to now. He added that he doesn't think the number of applicants would be very big, but he felt "very good about it because it shows that we as a Polish Jewish community can have dialogue with the Polish government. It is important."

Pray Ball! Jewish boys of spring tuning up

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — "The spring is a time of rebirth. It is the season when flowers bloom and the buds of trees begin to open, and a time when many birds return home from their warm southern climates. It is also a time for baseball."

The words are those of Rabbi James Gordon in his book Pray Ball! The Spiritual Insights of a Jewish Sports Fan. The rabbi of Congregation B'nai Shalom of Buffalo Grove, Ill., uses sporting events and athletes as his analogies to illustrate how the games they play tend to reinforce important traditional Jewish values.

For example, he explains: "Many parallels exist between a minyan and baseball. According to the American League, which follows the designated hitter's rule, 10 players are needed to start the game and each is of equal importance."

As for the upcoming season, there's a good chance there will be a minyan.

The Milwaukee Brewers just completed their first winning season in 15 years at 83-79, thanks in no small part to third baseman Ryan Braun. The son of an Israeli father, who was the fifth overall player taken in the 2005 Major League baseball draft, took the National League by storm last year when he arrived on May 25 from AAA Nashville and slugged his way to a .334 average, 34 homers, plus 97 RBIs in just 113 games. The 24-year-old University of Miami grad was subsequently named the National League rookie of the year.

If the six-foot-two, 200-pound Braun is to add more to his arsenal in '08, he'll have to sharpen his fielding skills. The second-highest drafted Jew (next to Ron Blomberg) had a Major League worst 26 errors at the hot corner and was often yanked in the late innings. In spring training, the 24-year-old Mission Hills, Californian was working out in left field and chances are better than 50-50 the outfield will soon be his calling card.

Boston's Kevin Youkilis, 29, enjoyed a banner season and was a major contributor to the Red Sox World Series title in '07. The six-foot-one, 220-pound Cincinnati, a first baseman, hit a solid .288, smacked 16 taters and drove in 83 runs. He is batting second in the lineup, and few are better at drawing walks and setting the table for the big boppers who follow. His main drawback is a lack of speed, stealing only four bases last season.

Seven-year veteran right-hander Jason Marquis of the Cubs went 12-9 as a starter last year, but Chicago's swirling winds helped to inflate his ERA to an unflattering 4.60. He's a workhorse, though, starting 33 games and going 192 innings. The former Brave and Cardinal starter, who will turn 30 this summer, is projected as the team's number 4 or 5 starter. The Cub's Jewish pitching coach Larry Rothschild is working with Marquis on the mental part of his game. He seems to falter in the second half of the season due to a lack of focus that appears to sap his confidence.

John Grabow, 29, bypassed arbitration in mid-January and was signed to a one-year contract with the Pirates. In 63 games and 51.2 innings last season, the left-handed reliever compiled a 3 and 2 record and ERA of 4.53. What he needs now, and it'll be difficult in Pittsburgh, which finished last at 68-94, is a solid season in 2008 that might earn him a more secure pact.

Colorado's right-handed starter Jason Hirsh is being counted upon to be the club's number 5 starter in '08. Last year, the 26-year-old pitched in 112 innings and compiled a record of 5-7 and an ERA of 4.81. An imposing figure on the mound at six-foot-eight and 250 pounds, he ended his season last year in early August when he fractured his right fibula. Prior to that a sprained ankle hampered his development.

Ian Kinsler, 25, of the Texas Rangers is about to begin his third season enjoying the security of a five-year extension at $22 million, signed in late February. The six-foot, 200-pound second sacker who hails from Tucson, Ariz., showed some pop in his bat last year with 20 homers, along with a .263 average and 62 RBIs. The golf enthusiast also played well defensively and scored 96 runs.

Another 25-year-old Ranger is relief pitcher Scott Feldman who spent part of last season in AAA Oklahoma and got into 29 games with Texas, sporting a 1-2 record and somewhat inflated ERA of 5.77. The right-hander out of San Mateo College, who was born in Kailua, Hawaii, stands six-foot-six and weighs 225. According to his manager, Ron Washington, Scott was working on a slightly different delivery during the off-season that has given his ball more movement.

After giving managing in the low minors a try in 2007, outfielder Gabe Kapler, 32, wants back into the fun room. The former Red Sox muscle man has been signed to a one-year contract with Milwaukee and hopes to make it as a bat off the bench and a backup outfielder. The nine-year veteran from Hollywood, with a lifetime BA of .270, plays the game with flair and will be a welcome addition to the Brewers.

There comes a time, both in and out of the sports world, when youth must be served. Houston catcher Brad Ausmus, who has caught more than 1,800 games in the majors, is pushing 39 and has finally been designated as the backup receiver with the Astros. A fine defensive catcher with a lifetime BA of .252, he is known as one of the best ever as a handler of pitchers. Few will disagree that the Dartmouth grad is managerial material or at least a coach-in-waiting. He will this year help tutor his replacement, J.R. Towles.

Mike Lieberthal, 36, a 13-year catcher with Philadelphia who played 38 games with the Dodgers in '07, is retiring; Los Angeles failed to pick up his option. The two-time All-Star hit .274 in his career and whacked 150 homers.

So far in early March, no team has, surprisingly, shown any interest in free agent Mets' outfielder Shawn Green. In 2007, he batted .282, hit 10 homers and had 71 RBIs in 446 at bats. It's entirely possible that the final chapter of the now 35-year-old's career has been written. From the Blue Jays to the Dodgers, the Diamondbacks and the Mets, the 1991 first-round pick had a career average of .283, wallowed 328 home runs and drove home 1,070 runs. Not hall of fame numbers, certainly, but few Jewish players were better and carried themselves with more dignity and class.

Also looking for work in the majors, are right-handed reliever Craig Breslow, 27, in Boston and left-hander Mike Koplove, 31, in Cleveland.

Don't miss WORSHIP

Almost Oprah

A friend and colleague once told me that it's better to fail as yourself than succeed as someone else and get trapped.

From years of creative endeavours, I also accept the following as scripture: you can't please the audience by predicting what they want.

If there were a "true" formula, we wouldn't have crappy films. Please yourself instead, and let the audience find you. There is someone for everyone, and you can be appreciated for your authentic self.

Now, if your authentic self is a jackass, I'll make some recommendations.

I took a maturity test last year and scored "80 per cent child brain." It was concluded, scientifically, that if pressed, I'd respond with the emotional depth and physical panache of an eight-year-old.

It's fascinating to wake up, as an adult, and become aware that you're actually missing key interpersonal tools. But the same way baking can be taught, the ingredients of an authentic relationship are well explained and available to you in Lies at the Altar: The Truth About Great Marriages, my reading recommendation for this month. It's great for relationships, however you define them, and it actually teaches empathy, not just promotes it.

Note: some people don't appreciate being given a "How To" manual in the middle of a relationship.

When I was 10, my father gave me Dale Carnegie's famous book How to Win Friends and Influence People. All I remember was a book called How to Make Friends, Loser. I still self-medicate when recalling the gift's hidden judgment.

Recently, I read a nice CJN article about the value of knowing one's self and the dangers of aimless people-pleasing. When you own your goals, limits, passions and negative triggers, you will actually function more clearly.

Every T-shirt and calendar recommends the first part: "To thine own self be true."

But no one is a singularly self-pleasing package, a sustainable island of happiness. I certainly get by with a little help from my friends.

So, I believe in pleasing others. But I no longer try to please everyone. That's the horse pill I'll call maturity, which, in my case, is only budding.

I've learned to displease people that I love dearly, but I offer them alternate affections, as they do to me.

In film, I've met great actors who are not great for a part. It's that simple. But once a part is filled, the acting still has to be top-notch.

Casting films and partners seems similar. Once the right person fills your heart, the relationship still has to be top-notch. All the proper etiquette should be there. I think we get tired of exhausting our best selves by dating from early in our youth, and we can overcompensate for an otherwise healthy attitude of "pleasing ourselves," becoming too dependent on self-gratification.

But that's only half the deal, since once you find the right partner, you have to revisit an investment scenario.

Money doesn't double in your closet. You have to invest it. The same goes for love. First, know your authentic self. Second, stop dating child-brainers. Third, behave like you did in high school on Valentine's Day.

Upon reflection, I'll simply say that I invested in the wrong people – not bad people at all, just the wrong ones for me. Everyone is right for someone. And once you know yourself well – once you've cleaned out your fridge of mouldy vices and past-prime attitudes – you can know what you're shopping for.

In the film Meet Joe Black, Brad Pitt's character says it best: "It's OK to take care of a woman. She takes care of you."

Once you are the right person, you'll attract the right person, and I'll wager it's OK to invest there. Please them.

Pleasing others is not wrong. Pleasing the wrong people, however, is wasted effort. And knowing your authentic self is the best way to highlight the tasks and people that you should most invest your precious time in.

Getting ready to get muscular

In my last column, I spent a lot of time discussing cardio equipment for your workout room. Now I want to share with you some of the options in resistance training equipment.

We all know that producing muscle is good for your body and overall health, but how do we do that? Well, there are many different ways, but all you really need to start is an exercise ball or a bench, small weights or bands, and a small piece of floor.

Home gym units are great, but there are so many out there, and everyone wants to sell you the biggest, most expensive piece. The truth is, if you are older or a beginner, and joints are a problem, looking into a home gym unit may be your best bet.

A machine will support you and help keep you in proper form more easily than free weights. I tell my clients to shop around and sit in the equipment – give it a try.

Some machines are heavier than others. You want to make sure the piece has most, if not everything, you want to work your body, and that you can lift it. Most machines come with a book and/or a poster-like instruction manual to show you different exercises that you can do with the equipment. I recommend using a trainer or expert in the field to show you how to properly, effectively and safely use your equipment.

There are also other choices besides a big piece of equipment. I like variety, so I don't have a home gym unit, but many different, but smaller pieces, such as a bench, an exercise ball, a variety of free weights, body bars, tubes, medicine balls, Pilates ring and balls, as well as some fit disks for core training. You don't need all that to get started, but I think you get the idea.

I always recommend hiring a trainer to make sure you're working out safely and effectively. The last thing you want to do is work really hard for nothing, or hurt yourself.

FITNESS CORNER

By FELCY ZOMPARELLI

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Life can break my heart. I'm sure you feel the same from time to time. Life can do that.

Most recently, my heart was broken by the troubling reality that 8,000 rockets have been fired into Sderot and that these erratic killers have hurt so many. My heart breaks for the people of the city, in which a little boy almost lost his arm and families huddle together underground, while rockets bombard their homes day in and day out. Parents know it is their job to keep their children safe. How must they feel about their task as rockets rain down on them?

My heart breaks for the fathers and mothers of our Israeli brothers and sisters who have fallen in the line of duty while defending Eretz Yisrael and the Jewish people. It breaks for all Israeli parents who are witness to their child going off to battle.

URBAN WRITER

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the spiritual leader of Shas party and former chief (Sephardi) rabbi of Israel, bids all Jews to pray for the safety of Israel Defence Forces soldiers. He asked that these prayers not only be said on Shabbat but on Monday and Thursday as well, the two weekdays when the Torah is read.

"Our soldiers, the Israel Defence Forces, contribute themselves selflessly, enter the lion's den... how they need to be blessed. Had it not been for them, would we have time to study the Torah? To turn to the books?" he said.

Let us pray then, so as to mend our broken hearts, to protect our sons and daughters and so that we can live like Jews.

And my heart bleeds for the 14-year-old Palestinian killed during the fight as the violence spilled over into the West Bank after the Gaza incursion.

My heart breaks

Fourteen is young, too young to die. And the children, infants who were killed in Gaza were only that, little beings born into the misfortune of a war zone and misdirected by their leaders. I can only be sad for the loss of life when that life is so young. It will not impede my resolve to secure our State of Israel and the Jewish people, but I will never get used to the fact that children lie lifeless in a morgue, stilled by bullets and battle. We are told never to celebrate the death of our enemies, and most of us are good at that. We are also told by our teachings that everything is a creation of God.

My heart breaks knowing that it is the Israelis who are on the front line of our physical fight to ensure the continuation of the Jewish people. Our partnership with them seems so uneven. And as I get older, the faces of the fallen soldiers posted on websites look so much younger. 18, 19, 20. So much younger.

If your heart is breaking for Israel, for the innocent blood shed, for all those children dying around the globe through war, famine, disease and poverty, then you are awake.

Share your thoughts with others. Thank the IDF for sticking up for us, for securing us. Think about our Israeli family on a daily basis. We must never forget that young Jewish boys and girls are fighting, often to the finish, to make sure that we in Canada and the rest of the world fear less those who are intent upon destroying the Jewish people.

There are many innocent people suffering, Jews and Arabs, as this war continues. There are many children dying in wars throughout the world. We are meant, as Jews, to be conscious of this and to pray, and to stand up in defence of peace and truth.

Do so and perhaps one day our hearts will be fuller and cease to break so often. Let us hope that the other side does the same.

Hanna Schacter, Grade 6

A summons to the people

Judging by her playful depiction of some of its well-known celebratory aspects, there can hardly be any doubt that sixth-grader Hanna Schacter loves the holiday of Purim. She delightfully conveys the joy of the occasion wrought by the costumes, smiles, laughs, masks and noisemakers that are its merrymaking instruments.

Second-grader Shaina Gotovsky more forcefully emphasizes the imperative only implied by Hanna: "Celebrate Purim in Canada," she writes affirmatively without even slight compunction.

She summons her people, both young and old, to raise the flag of happiness in memory of Persian Jewry's rescue from genocide some 2,500 years ago.

Of course, where children fling themselves with playful delirium, adults tread more warily.

Indeed, the commemoration of thwarted genocide, it must be acknowledged, is a religious space, in which wariness is a most appropriate antecedent to revelry and merriment.

Our ancient rabbis understood this very well. That is why they ordained a protocol for celebrating Purim that combines the profound with the frivolous; the sombre with the light-hearted; high tension with sigh-laden relief.

In his essay about Purim, which is part of his superb, marvellously instructive book The Jewish Way, (Simon & Schuster), renowned educator Rabbi Irving Greenberg, expounds upon and explains the many-layered meanings of the holiday in its very obvious Diaspora context.

At every turn and twist of the dramatic narrative, Rabbi Greenberg points out its theological messages, hidden wisdoms and constantly recurring parallels to the modern and pre-modern Jewish historical experience of Diaspora life.

We, the older celebrants of Purim, cannot avoid thinking of the deeply cutting parallel in our own time to the ominous existential condition faced by the Jews of Persia so long ago.

Ever since he ascended to power some three years ago, the observation has been often made that the genocidal threats of Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad eerily, creepily, menacingly echo the threats made centuries ago by his vile countryman, Haman the Agagite.

CANADA

Trade Negotiator Dies

TORONTO — Simon Reisman, the feisty and outspoken chief Canadian negotiator of the 1988 Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, died March 8 in Ottawa of cardiac arrest. He was 88. He died in his sleep at the Ottawa Heart Institute after having a pacemaker operation a few days earlier. The Montreal-born Reisman joined the federal public service in 1946 and left in 1975 to become a consultant. He returned in 1985 to lead the trade talks.

Chabad Opens Camp

TORONTO — Chabad of Mississauga is starting the first permanent Jewish day camp in the western GTA suburb. Camp Gan Israel, for kids three to 10, runs from July 7 to Aug. 10. Mississauga is home to some 3,000 Jews. For details, visit www.jewishmississauga.org, or call 905-268-4432.

WORLD

Cdn. Cities Promoted

NEW YORK — Edmonton and Vancouver are among emerging Orthodox communities in North America that the Orthodox Union is encouraging observant New York-area Jews to move to. At an April 6 event in New York, the OU will showcase 13 cities, including Denver, Houston, Dallas, Edmonton and Vancouver. The cities were chosen for their religious infrastructure — including a day school, Orthodox shul and access to kosher food — and their growth potential.

Prayer Won't Change

ROME — The Vatican's point man on Jewish relations said the Pope plans no further changes to a prayer that has riled Jewish leaders. Cardinal Walter Kasper, speaking on German TV last week, said there's no need to change the Good Friday prayer because "it is entirely correct from a theological perspective." Cardinal Kasper was to meet with Jewish leaders last week to discuss the controversy. In June, Pope Benedict XVI upset many Catholic-Jewish interfaith leaders when he revived the Latin, or Tridentine, Mass, a liturgy that includes a prayer for the conversion of Jews. Last month, he released a revised text of the prayer that removed the most offensive passages, but retained the prayer for conversion.

Bounty on Barak

TEHRAN — A radical Iranian student group placed a $400,000 bounty on Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak. The Islamic Student Justice Seekers made the call March 9, the Iranian News agency IRNA said. It also offered $300,000 each for the killing of two other senior members of the Israeli security establishment, Mossad chief Meir Dagan and Amos Yadlin, head of military intelligence. The bounties are revenge for last month's killing of Hezbollah mastermind Imad Mughniyah, for which the group blames Israel. It asked backers to donate a kidney to increase the bounties.

Former Senator Dies

CLEVELAND — Former Ohio Senator Howard Metzenbaum died March 12 at his home in Florida at age 90. Metzenbaum, Ohio's first Jewish Senator, was appointed by Ohio governor John Gilligan to fill an unexpired term in 1973. He won a seat in 1976 and served three full terms, retiring in 1995. The Cleveland-born Metzenbaum was a millionaire who co-founded an airport parking lot firm. A lib-

Belgium To Pay Holocaust Restitution

BRUSSELS — Belgium will pay $170 million in Holocaust restitution.

Belgium's banks and the government agreed March 11 to pay the Jewish community and families of Holocaust victims whose property was stolen by the Nazis. Some $54 million will be paid to claimants. The rest will go to a trust to promote Shoah education and help poor Jews.

Of the total amount to be paid out, $69.8 million comes from the government, $85 million from banks and the rest mostly from insurance companies.

About half of Belgium's 50,000 Jews died in the Holocaust. Last year, a government-sponsored report declared that Belgium had officially and unofficially collaborated with the Nazi persecution of Jews.

eral Democrat, he championed worker and consumers rights, and a law mandating a waiting period to buy a handgun. He backed the Jewish community on a variety of issues, including civil rights, hate crimes laws and religious freedom, and he voted consistently with supporters of Israel.

Jewish Amulet Found

VIENNA — University of Vienna archeologists unearthed an amulet in a third-century grave bearing the Shema prayer. The find in eastern Austria represents the earliest sign of Jewish inhabitants in present-day Austria, the university said. The silver amulet contains a gold scroll with the words of the Shema inscribed in Greek. The grave of the child is one of about 300 graves in an ancient Roman cemetery discovered in 1986 near the town of Halbtun. The Jewish amulet was identified in 2006 and will go on public display next month in the Burgenland State Museum in Eisenstadt.

Israeli Part of Scandal

NEW YORK — The alleged procurer in the prostitution scandal surrounding former New York governor Eliot Spitzer has an Israeli passport. A federal magistrate in New York ordered Mark "Michael" Brenner, 62, a dual Israeli-American citizen, held without bail after his arrest last week related to allegations he headed the Emperors VIP Club, described by police as a high-priced prostitution ring. It reportedly supplied escort services to Spitzer, who resigned in disgrace last week over the affair.

She'arim to close its doors in June

Financial problems cited as reason

By FRANCES KRAFT
 Staff Reporter

Parents and staff of the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School reacted with dismay, confusion and — in some cases — anger to last week's announcement that the school will close in June, and that talks are in progress for its students to attend an existing Jewish day school next fall.

Under the new arrangement, students would be in a separate program that would address their special learning needs under the auspices of another school, which officials have yet to name.

"The sad conclusion is that [She'arim] in its current format is not financially viable," Sidney Braun, She'arim's co-president, said at a meeting last Wednesday night at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC).

"We're carrying an accumulated deficit from previous years... It would be an irresponsible act on our part to continue in the current format."

Braun is one of five members of a joint management committee that was formed earlier this year to work with She'arim.

The decision was made by the school's board based on a recommendation from the joint management committee, consisting of two representatives each of She'arim and of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, as well as Paul Shaviv, director of education of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

She'arim, which was established 27 years ago, is housed in rented premises at the BJCC, which is slated to be demolished and replaced starting in 2009.

The school serves 75 students from Grade 1 through Grade 8 with learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, and mild forms of autism.

At its peak two years ago, She'arim had 97 students. This year, 25 students will graduate, leaving only 50 at the school for next year. Increasingly, "feeder" day schools are attempting to address special education needs themselves, school principal Kathy Manoin told The CJN.

She'arim has been dealing with funding issues for some time. Last year, it experienced a deficit that its executive director, Faigie Davids, attributed to a large 2007 graduating class and a subsequent loss of tuition.

The school, which has a $1.5-million annual budget, received cash advances from the federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz — formerly the Board of Jewish Education), so that it could pay its staff.

Robert Harlang, who chairs the joint management committee, fielded most of the questions at the meeting. He became chair at the request of the federation, but doesn't work for the federation and is not on its board.

Parents also wanted answers from Seymour Epstein, the federation's senior vice-president for the Mercaz, who was seated toward the back of the room, but took the microphone at the audience's request.

One woman expressed confusion about how the proposed changes would help, because much of the school's financial problems have had to do with the low ratio of students to teachers at a special needs school.

Harlang said there were also factors relating to overhead, rent, the school's ability to fundraise, and declining enrolment.

The cost of educating one child at She'arim for a year is about $20,000, Epstein said. Annual tuition is about $18,000.

Last year She'arim fundraising events netted about $500,000.

But, now, "no one will give money to a sinking ship," protested one mother.

Parents were trying to understand how things could have changed so dramatically since a December meeting, when they say they were told that the school had no debt.

"We have an operating deficit that has caught up with the school," said Braun, adding that the school has been operating with a deficit for the past eight years.

"Our fundraising ability cannot cope with our operating costs. Every month, we are going deeper and deeper into a situation that is not sustainable."

Glimmers for the future

There are, of course, wide cultural, historical and sociological similarities between American and Canadian Jews. But in terms of the Jewishly manifested aspects of our kinship, there are also certain differences between us that are worth noting and have, in fact, often been noted by various authors in the pages of The C.J.N.

Nevertheless, despite those differences, we always pay close attention to news about the Jews of America.

Such is the way of kinkfolk love. Moreover, current trends within American Jewry may portend future behaviour among Canadian Jews.

Thus it was with great interest that we read of a study released two weeks ago by the Steinhardt Social Research Institute at Brandeis University that brought into doubt existing beliefs concerning a diminishing affinity among young American Jews to the State of Israel.

The study is titled American Jewish Attachment to Israel: An Assessment of the "Distancing" Hypothesis. Its lead researchers are Theodore Sasson, Charles Kadushin, and Leonard Saxe.

The press release announcing the results of the study was straightforward: "There is no consistent evidence in surveys conducted among national samples of American Jews that either younger individuals or adults have grown more distant from Israel. On the contrary, the survey evidence reveals surprising resilience of American Jewry's connection to Israel."

This is a very important and a wonderfully heartening finding.

But is it a correct finding?

Not everyone agrees.

It seems that those "surveys conducted among national samples of American Jews" to which the Steinhardt study refers are the surveys conducted by sociologist Steven Cohen.

Cohen, the renowned chronicler of Jewish life in America has long warned of the decrease in the number of Jews in the United States and of the worrisome disengagement of younger Jews in particular from interest in the State of Israel.

As JTA noted in its coverage of the study, "the Steinhardt paper looks like a stab at Cohen, who has long been at intellectual odds with Steinhardt researchers – who are based at Brandeis – and, in particular, with the director of the Steinhardt Center, Len Saxe."

The key machloket, difference of opinion, between the respective Cohen and Saxe groups of researchers centres on the interpretation of data related to intermarried families.

"What is really happening, says the Steinhardt report, is that Jews tend to become closer to Israel as they grow older," JTA noted. "So, when one looks at age cohorts year by year, there tends not to be a dropping off in affinity for Israel. Older Jews simply feel closer to Israel."

Cohen draws a less sunny conclusion, based, once again, on his sterner views of the impact of intermarriage on collective Jewish life.

"The Steinhardt survey does a good job of showing that Jews who identify as Jewish are indeed staying close to Israel," Cohen told JTA. But "it is missing the point that intermarried Jews and their children are falling away from Israel."

But both the Saxe and the Cohen groups agree that there is a relatively new and potentially watershed development that may have a profoundly positive impact on the nature and extent of the engagement of future generations of American Jews with Israel: birthright Israel.

"The success of birthright Israel," the Steinhardt study notes, "which has brought more than 120,000 North American Jewish young adults to Israel for educational trips, challenges old patterns of engagement with Israel and is creating a generation of adult Jews who have a different relationship to the Jewish state."

That Steinhardt himself, and Charles Bronfman, were the driving philanthropic forces behind birthright Israel in no way diminishes the soundness of the conclusions concerning the program's success. Birthright Israel and the like-minded and even follow-up programs that it spawned may yet prove to be a saving intervention in the Jewish or at least Israel-oriented evolution of a large portion of future American Jews.

Irrespective of the correctness of competing interpretations of the impact of intermarried couples on the future of Jewish life, one conclusion is certain: visiting Israel fosters attachment to the country. The more that Jews travel there, the more they develop a sense of responsibility towards the country.

Since the inception of birthright Israel, greater numbers of young Jews are consistently travelling to Israel. We can therefore hope, and perhaps, expect, that in the coming years, increasing numbers of younger Jews will feel for Israel – and for their own sense of belonging to this small but rather remarkable people – more than they do now.

The report, American Jewish Attachment to Israel: An Assessment of the "Distancing" Hypothesis, can be downloaded at www.brandeis.edu/ssri.

Shuls write to premier urging action on poverty

'We are guided by tikkun olam, and we need to put [it] into action'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

An open letter to Dalton McGuinty from 18 Ontario synagogues urging the premier to keep an election promise to fight poverty was co-ordinated by a Darchei Noam Congregation committee.

The Reconstructionist synagogue recently formed a social justice advocacy committee to lobby the government on this issue.

Val Hyman, chair of the congregation's social action committee, said its focus has always been on housing and homelessness, and its projects include running an Out of the Cold program and volunteering for the City of Toronto's three-year-old Street to Homes program, which provides housing for people living on the street.

The congregation has also sponsored two affordable housing buildings near Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street. "This is all well and good, but nothing will change unless we try to influence the government," she said.

Hyman praised Rabbi Shalom Schachter, a member of the social justice advocacy committee and spiritual leader of Beth Israel Congregation in Peterborough, for "having the energy to contact all the synagogues and pull the whole thing together."

The shuls represent all four major denominations — Reform, Conservative, Orthodox and Reconstructionist.

Hyman said Darchei Noam is part of two interfaith social action groups, because its members believe that faith groups need a Jewish voice. "We are guided by tikkun olam, and we need to put [it] into action. We believe that housing is a right, not a privilege."

In December, Miloon Kathari, the United Nations special rapporteur on adequate housing, visited Canada, "and said he was mystified [to discover] that we are the only G8 country without a social housing strategy. He could not understand why we are not looking after our most vulnerable citizens," Hyman said.

"As Jews, we have a special reason for asking the premier to stick to his promise."

Myer Siemiatycki, co-chair of the newly formed advocacy committee and a professor of politics at Ryerson University, said Darchei Noam has always addressed homelessness on the front lines, "but this advocacy piece is new. We had our first meeting of the new year in January, and we realized that the Ontario government would soon be coming out with a budget. We wanted the Jewish voice heard."

"We realized that the best format would be to have as many synagogues behind us as possible."

The committee spent about two weeks getting congregations to sign on, "and we were thrilled and delighted with not only the response, but the breadth of the response," Siemiatycki said.

"This is an important reminder that the call for justice is a common ground that all Jews can share," he said.

In the letter, the shuls praised McGuinty for his commitment to target poverty, but said that "time is of the essence... and a child who missed a year's good nutrition or education, whose family dissolves under grinding economic pressure, will not easily make it up next year."

"We urge your government to put a down payment on its poverty fighting strategy in its upcoming spring budget."

He said that Rabbi Schachter received a fax from the cabinet office acknowledging the letter and asking for his return address.

"We're hoping this will lead to a meeting with senior officials," Siemiatycki said.

The synagogues that signed the letter were Beth Ezekiel, Owen Sound; Beth Israel, Peterborough; Beth Jacob, Kitchener; Beth Torah, Toronto; Darchei Noam; Holy Blossom Temple, Toronto; Am Shalom Congregation, Barrie; Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation, Toronto; Or Shalom Congregation, London; Shaarei-Beth El Congregation, Oakville; Solel Congregation, Mississauga; Temple Emanu-El, Toronto; Temple Har Zion, Thornhill; Temple Israel, Ottawa; Temple Kol Ami, Thornhill; Temple Sinai, Toronto; Temple Shalom, Waterloo; and Adath Shalom, Ottawa. Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation also signed the letter.

A LETTER TO THE COMMUNITY ABOUT SHEARIM HEBREW DAY SCHOOL

For many painstaking months, UJA Federation and the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre, have been working hard, through a Joint Management Committee, to resolve many challenges facing the school. We have discussed together possible options for She'arim, which is in the midst of a severe financial situation.

However, after meticulous analysis, and based on the advice of the Joint Management Committee, the She'arim Board has decided that She'arim, as it presently exists, cannot sustain itself financially.

Our top priority is the well-being of She'arim's children and their future education. With that in mind, the objective is working toward the concept of transitioning She'arim students from a free standing school to a unit within an existing Jewish school that would offer the best possible education, in a caring and supportive environment for children with learning disabilities.

In pursuit of this objective, we will not only be consulting with experts on special needs education, but also She'arim parents, who have so eloquently and passionately expressed their concerns, to which we are carefully listening.

Our goal is to place every single She'arim child next year in a Jewish school that understands and supports his or her unique needs. At the same time, UJA Federation and She'arim are committed to the successful conclusion of this school year.

The present crisis is primarily due to financial factors. It is not a reflection on She'arim's outstanding contribution to our community for 27 years. She'arim has given children with learning disabilities the opportunity of a Jewish education, which may have otherwise been inaccessible.

We are certain that, by working diligently together, we can assure She'arim's children of a high quality special education and sensitive consideration under these new circumstances.

Plea for unity

Ahmadinejad's threats against Israel and the Jewish people are real. They are not the demagogic stumpings of an election campaign or the cynical scapegoating of a faraway people for the ills of a local electorate. Like Haman before him, Ahmadinejad plots the destruction of Israel and the annihilation of Jews.

As loving parents and grandparents, we do our best – as did our forebears – to shield our own anxieties from the discerning eyes and knowing glances of our children and grandchildren.

But as Jews who are grateful for the majesty and privilege of belonging to this wonderful people, we are ever vigilant, constantly coiled, ready to spring to the defence of Jewish life, peoplehood, sovereignty, and of course, our children.

That is one of the reasons we celebrate the festival of Purim so earnestly, with such joyful intensity. As Rabbi Greenberg noted, "the celebration of Purim grows out of a wise acceptance of vulnerability. The truth is that life is deeply vulnerable."

The awareness of life's deep vulnerability, however, does not mean resignation or acquiescence in the face of superior odds or larger forces. And that is another of Purim's unique lessons related by Rabbi Greenberg in his essay.

"The Persian Jewish community as reflected in the Book of Esther, responded to the entire episode with a determination to survive as Jews and with a discerning reaffirmation of its Jewishness."

Human beings play a critical role in their own redemption, Greenberg writes. "One cannot pass the buck to the forces of history," he notes with succinct clarity. He is telling us, just as our sages did, that we cannot rely on miracles. We have to be the agents of our own redemption if we are to trigger Divine partnership.

Finally, Rabbi Greenberg emphasizes that Purim is also a plea for Jewish unity. The story reminds us of the steely strength that results when Jews – regardless of ethnic background, socio-economic status, education, affiliation, level of observance and shul membership – unite in common purpose in protection of our common destiny.

"Never write off assimilated Jews," he wrote. "They come out of the historical closet in the greatest crises, and when they are least expected. After the Holocaust, and in defence of Israel, thousands of hitherto marginal Jews rallied to fight for Jewish survival. I once heard the late [Rabbi] Jacob Herzog [a member of Haganah] tell of a key mission in a banana republic, trying to buy weapons for Israel in 1948. He ran into strong resistance. All appeared lost, when suddenly he obtained desperately needed arms through the intercession of a general. Afterward, the general secretly revealed to him that he was a Jew whose family had 'passed' to get into the aristocracy."

Therefore let us abide by Shaina's instruction to "celebrate Purim." But as we do, let us recall Rabbi Greenberg's lessons, and as always, let us also thank God that he has brought us to this unique day when we and our families convert fasting, mourning, weeping and worry into "light, joy, gladness and honour for all the Jews."

Chag Samayach.

Newspaper coverage of the Lebanon War was criticized at a conference of the Canada-Israel Committee as being inadequate and unsympathetic to Israel. Journalists attributed this to a lack of understanding of the issues involved, a desire to please the general public and the need to compete with television coverage.

Gov't's statement about Gaza disappoints

The Board of Rabbis of Greater Montreal finds it necessary to voice its great disappointment with the statement made by Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier on the current situation in Gaza ("Canada 'concerned' over Israeli measures," CJN, March 6).

Ever since 2007, more than 2,000 rockets have been launched against Israel for the sole purpose of indiscriminately slaughtering Israeli citizens. More than 200,000 Israelis are within range of these rockets.

No country on earth would tolerate such murderous tactics against its civilians. To suggest that Israel's response was excessive is indeed deplorable. Israel has a right and a duty to protect its citizens. It is the terrorists' use of civilians as human shields that is the reason for the loss of life.

We have in the past found most commendable the support given by the current federal government for Israel's stand against those who seek to destroy her. It is the terrorists who are solely responsible for the current violence. Let them cease and desist, and the violence in Gaza will come to an end.

Articles lacked context

Your March 6 issue contained two articles about events at York University. Both, unfortunately, lacked any context that might have helped readers understand the issues at York and in the community at large.

"Anti-Semitic graffiti discovered at York U" reported the discovery of anti-Semitic graffiti in Scott Library. Unfortunately as such graffiti are, they are not unique to York, and they are not unique to Jews. Anti-black and anti-Italian graffiti have also been found recently at the university, and anti-Indian and anti-Pakistani graffiti are present there and elsewhere. University students should be immune to the ideas and expressions of the kinds of prejudice the graffiti manifest. Sadly, they are not, but it is important to situate the CJN's reporting in the larger context, to ensure an adequate understanding of the world in which we live and of the ways in which we can combat hatred and prejudice, whether they are directed at Jews or at others.

York takes very seriously its obligation to promote understanding. That might have been clear to readers if the second article, "Educators discuss challenges of Holocaust education," which reported on a panel discussion at York about teaching the Holocaust in settings that might not be expected to be receptive to it, had received proper contextualization.

The article did not note that the panel was presented by the Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education at York University. That program, co-ordinated by the writers of this letter, is a unique initiative by York to fight prejudice at home and abroad by equipping future educators from Canada, Germany and Poland with the knowledge and skills to teach about the Holocaust and against anti-Semitism and other forms of racism and prejudice. It has been supported by the Appels and other individuals, as well as by governments, universities and charitable foundations in Canada, Poland and Germany since 2001. Almost all of its participants are non-Jews. The program is evidence of the strong, ongoing commitment of York to fighting all manifestations of prejudice, which is worthy of note.

Media neglects Holocaust memorials

Holocaust memorials seem to receive less and less attention as time passes and as the ranks of survivors shrink. Jewish media would perform a service to those who lost their lives by continuing coverage for the new generations, lest they forget.

"Neighbours Who Disappeared" an exhibit from the Jewish Museum in Prague, Czech Republic, supported by the Forgotten Ones Civic Association, is on display at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre until the end of March. It was considered important enough that the prime minister of the Czech Republic came to Toronto to officiate at its opening.

A Purim shpiel of President Shimon Peres

The duties and obligations of the president of the State of Israel are many as well as onerous. This small photo montage of Israeli President Shimon Peres depicts just some of the official state duties that he must discharge. Clockwise from top: 1. He helps some schoolchildren cross the busy streets of Jerusalem. 2. He tickles French President Nicolas Sarkozy during his recent visit to France. 3. He tries to remember the name of a fruit given to him by a youngster. 4. He gets fitted for a new tallit inside the presidential sukkah. 5. He ponders how he will be able to control his fly-away hair. 6. He listens to and appears to enjoy his favourite music aboard an IAF helicopter. 7. The music gives him a headache. 8. He freezes in the aura of Madonna's mystical glow.

Is McMaster the new frontier?

First held in 2005 at the University of Toronto, "Israeli Apartheid Week" has since broadened its scope considerably. Last month, there were "Israeli Apartheid Week" activities on 28 campuses across the globe, including eight in Canada. There is no evident shortage of funding to stage these events and, with each passing year, the week's programming has become bolder and more egregious.

Lawrence Hart
in Hamilton

And it now appears that what began as a university-based hatefest is now infiltrating our school system as well. This year, for the first time, high school students were bused in to take part in the Toronto event, thus setting a precedent that has obviously worrisome implications.

Whenever challenged, proponents of "Israeli Apartheid Week" have invoked their "right" of free speech as the foundation for their tendentious arguments and, almost without exception, university administrations have gone along with such subterfuge. That the very notion of "Israeli apartheid" is a recognized falsehood and an absurdity, and that even minimal acceptance of the term violates basic tenets of intellectual honesty, seems not to faze them.

However, there has been a ray of hope at McMaster University. In response to complaints from the Jewish Student Association on campus and a member of the community regarding an "Israeli Apartheid Week" banner and offensive anti-Israel handouts, McMaster's new provost, Ilene Busch-Vishniac, intervened. She called to account "Israeli Apartheid Week" organizers, telling them that their banner would not be permitted and that "their activities must show respect and tolerance for everyone" or there would be further consequences. It was a small step, but a very significant and courageous one, fully supported, incidentally, by the university's Human Rights and Equity Services and the McMaster Students Union.

Because of their actions, it was entirely predictable that university administrators would have to withstand a torrent of protest, some of it quite ugly. And they did. But despite what was perceived as some possible backtracking, it's still apparent, based on reported statements by university president Peter George, that the administration is defending its initial position.

Among his comments, George was quoted as affirming that "provost Busch-Vishniac had acted correctly three weeks earlier when she had disallowed a banner headlined 'Israeli apartheid' on the basis that it was unduly inflammatory."

It's perhaps too early to tell how all of this will play itself out both locally and nationally. Has McMaster become the new frontier in the fight against the hateful travesty that goes by the name of "Israeli Apartheid Week"? Only time will tell.

In future columns, I shall expand on what has brought us to this point at McMaster, with a particular focus on the roles played by our students, our faculty and our Jewish communal leadership.

A time to think about social justice in Israel

Aside from merrymaking, during Purim, observant Jews must perform four different deeds: read the Megillah; partake in a festive meal (seudat Purim); send gifts to friends and acquaintances (mishloach manot); and give charity to poor people (matanot le'evyonim).

The fourth of these mitzvot that gives occasion for a broader reckoning about poverty in Israel.

A report published last month by the National Insurance Institute on "Poverty and Inequality in Income Distribution in Israel," covering the period from July 2006 to June 2007, noted that the scope of Israeli poverty has been relatively stable in the last few years. It found that 24.7 per cent of the country's people are poor, with 20.5 per cent of families classified as "needy," and that the incidence of poverty among children is 35.9 per cent. That's 420,000 poor families, with 1,674,800 people, of whom 805,000 are children.

Particularly troubling are figures showing that 54.8 per cent of non-Jewish families live in poverty. A different study, also published this year, found that a whopping 56 per cent of Jerusalem's children are poor (a fact attributable to large haredi and Arab populations in the city). There was also an unexpected rise in poverty among the elderly: it increased from 21.5 per cent in 2006 to 23.5 per cent during the period studied. Other data shows that one-third of the country's dwindling number of Holocaust survivors are living below the poverty line.

By comparison, in Canada, where there's some debate about how to gauge poverty, figures show that between 4.9 per cent and 10.8 per cent of Canadians (up to 3.5 million people) are poor. According to one study, there's been a six-fold decrease in Canadian poverty over the past 55 years.

By contrast, there is other information that shows Israel's economy is robust. Unemployment is continually falling; inflation is low; wages, private consumption, investments and exports are rising; the GDP has been rising annually at more than five per cent for several years; Israel has the second-largest number of startup companies in the world (after the United States), and it has the largest number of NASDAQ-listed companies outside North America.

Yair Luorstein
in Jerusalem

Despite these signs of optimism, the poverty statistics are worrying.

Israel is moving away from social democratic economic policies and developing into more of a free market economy. The move began in earnest during Benjamin Netanyahu's tenure as finance minister from 2003 to 2005. Many of the economy's successes can be credited to the correct implementation of his policies.

Economic growth has indeed created many new jobs for those who want them, the notion being that these people and their families will become less of a burden on the public purse. However, Netanyahu's strategies also required deep slashes in government handouts, such as child and guaranteed income allowances, which in turn gave rise to further hardships among those who subsist on these allowances. As these payments were cut, many individuals and large families dropped below the poverty line.

The picture is still far from rosy. Complaints are being heard that, like too many other things, our financial system is imitating that of the United States and its laissez faire economy, in which the rich get richer while weaker elements in society are left by the wayside. Many view the situation as a social time bomb, an internal existential threat that's capable of affecting Israel's political situation.

But there are signs of hope, as both the private sector and the government have stepped in to help. NGOs, supported by good people from Israel and abroad, have set up a wide array of aid organizations that provide ample solutions for assorted groups of needy people and their problems. Soup kitchens have sprouted up around the country like mushrooms after a good rain. Volunteerism is flourishing.

The government, which was lambasted for allowing private groups to replace it in dispensing social services, has started implementing a partial about-face. Among other steps, it has boosted child allowances and old-age stipends, as well as payments to Holocaust survivors. It could do so because the treasury is currently full, with surplus shekels from taxes collected from successful businesses and a larger number of employees.

Poverty is both a personal and collective affliction, and no surefire elixir has yet been found. Much must be said for Netanyahu's policies and his setting the economy on a sounder track, but Israel needs a more progressive economic route, based on free market designs but also on social justice and Jewish ideals, such as matanot le'evyonim. Let's hope that many fewer poor people will be receiving charity next Purim.

Durban 2009: will the NGOs join Canada?

As the first country to pull out of the United Nations' planned 2009 Durban Review Conference, Canada has re-established its leadership in the field of human rights. Ministers Maxime Bernier and Jason Kenney have boldly declared that the 2001 UN-sponsored World Conference Against Racism (WCAR) "degenerated into open and divisive expressions of intolerance and anti-Semitism that undermined the principles of the United Nations." And the backing provided by both the Liberals and NDP shows that there's broad national support for their position.

This statement provided moral clarity, as well as belated recognition of the mistakes made in 2001, when Canada naively funded many of the participants in the NGO (non-governmental organization) forum at Durban. More than 4000 "delegates" adopted a declaration accusing Israel of "apartheid" and perpetrating a "holocaust." To prevent a repetition, Canada has pledged that any funding that it provides to NGOs can't be used to help them take part in the second Durban conference in 2009.

Following Canada's lead, French President Nicolas Sarkozy also declared that his government would stay away if the 2009 conference was likely to repeat the hatred of 2001. Other European governments are expected to follow, and U.S. officials have made similar statements, although they stopped short of a formal withdrawal. Israel — which pulled its delegation from the 2001 meeting — predictably announced that it would boycott a conference that promoted anti-Semitism.

In contrast, the silence — and in some cases active complicity of the NGO community — has been disturbing. Predictably, pro-Palestinian groups such as the Canadian Arab Federation attacked the decision for Canada not to participate, absurdly claiming that denunciation of anti-Semitism was a blow to "tolerance and multiculturalism in Canada."

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

Officials of wealthy and powerful groups such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, which claim to support universal human rights, are hiding behind vague formulations. Both organizations were active in the 2001 forum and failed to speak out against this travesty, and they've been active promoting the Durban strategy of boycotts, divestment and sanctions. Their recent statements condemned

Israeli attempts to end the rocket attacks from Gaza, with false accusations of "collective punishment" and "war crimes."

And the leaders of the radical Montreal-based group Alternatives, which is funded by the Canadian International Development Agency, absurdly said in a press release that "Canada should ask Israel to pay for damages caused by its army," immorally promoting the Palestinian strategy of terror.

Amnesty and HRW have also abstained from adding their names to a mild statement written by the Magenta group in Holland and the Jacob Blaustein Institute. More than 20 groups, including Human Rights First and Rabbis for Human Rights, declared that the 2001 conference included "violations of procedure in the preparatory and drafting processes... racist treatment including violence, exclusion and intimidation against Jewish participants, and the misuse of human rights terminology... With a few notable exceptions, the vast majority of groups was silent or refused to speak out."

The signatories pledged to reject hatred and incitement in all its forms, including anti-Semitism, to learn from the shortcomings of the 2001 WCAR, and to work together in a spirit of mutual respect. The members of the Canadian branches of Amnesty International and the donors to Human Rights Watch should demand that the heads of their organizations adopt this pledge.

They can point to the Ford Foundation, whose funds were also used by many anti-Israel NGOs to participate in Durban 2001, but which has since adopted a policy like Canada's to prevent a repetition in 2009. While some gaps in implementation have been uncovered by NGO Monitor (of which I'm executive director), Ford officials have said that they will examine each case. In contrast, the New Israel Fund has yet to adopt a position, which is disturbing, particularly for a group whose members are strong Zionists. The NIF has received $40 million (US) from the Ford Foundation in recent years, of which a considerable amount goes to radical Arab groups such as Adalah, which also played a major role in the NGO forum in 2001.

Adalah and other recipients of NIF "civil rights" donations are at the forefront of the anti-Israel delegitimation campaigns, often using terms such as "apartheid" and "racist" in documents submitted to UN groups. An NIF pledge to prevent its funds from being used for the 2009 Durban Review Conference would be of particular importance in preventing a rerun.

The Kirshner File

Iraq remains a troubled and divided nation

Five years after the United States and its allies invaded Iraq in a landmark preemptive strike, Iraq is mired in sectarian violence.

On March 20, 2003, the United States, supported by Britain and smaller forces from Australia and Poland, launched a massive land, air and sea attack on Iraq, bent on changing the political landscape in the Middle East. The objectives of Operation Iraqi Freedom, as enunciated by U.S. President George W. Bush, were to disarm Iraq, oust the Baathist regime in Baghdad and bring democracy to that long suffering country.

The Americans failed to find nuclear, chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction, but they did manage to overthrow the Iraqi government, headed by President Saddam Hussein. Whether they can build a civil society in a nation unaccustomed to democracy remains to be seen. Parenthetically, the war was not about oil, since Saddam, his animosity toward the United States notwithstanding, was only too glad to sell the precious commodity to the Americans. In other words, the Bush administration did not have to commit blood and treasure to secure Iraqi oil supplies.

Although it is now fashionable to dismiss the invasion as a catastrophic blunder, it made sense. Iraq was a serial aggressor, having precipitated a protracted war with Iran in 1980, briefly occupied Kuwait in 1990, fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel during the 1991 Gulf War and encouraged Palestinian suicide bombers. Iraq was also a brutal dictatorship where the rule of law was flouted, where civil liberties were ignored and where minorities, such as the Kurds, were routinely oppressed.

Saddam, emboldened by ancient Babylon's empire, was driven by visions of subjugating the Middle East to his imperialist whims. He was a great destabilizing force, a megalomaniac Arab leader whose naked ambitions exceeded his reach and whose intentions posed a clear and present danger to his neighbours.

Although the "coalition of the willing" conquered Iraq in less than three weeks, with a minimum of casualties, the struggle for Iraq really began after Bush, striking a triumphant pose aboard the aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln, declared an end "to all major combat operations" on May 1.

The optimism he projected was premature, to say the least. The United States soon faced an insurgency characterized by roadside ambushes and suicide bombings. The perpetrators, who exacted a fearsome toll, were disaffected Baathists who resented foreign intervention and yearned to return to power and starry-eyed jihadists – mainly Saudis – in the thrall of Al Qaeda's Islamic fundamentalism.

With Baghdad's fall in April, widespread looting broke out, leaving Iraqis with the disheartening impression that the Americans were not in full control. With an insufficient number of troops on the ground, the United States could not maintain order on a consistent basis. Donald Rumsfeld, then-U.S. secretary of defence, had disregarded a recommendation from a former army chief of staff, Gen. Eric Shinseki, that several hundred thousand soldiers would be required to pacify Iraq.

Not having heeded his sage advice, the United States paid the price for its misplaced confidence. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, the former commander of the U.S. expeditionary force in Iraq, said recently that the Bush administration's handling of the war was "incompetent" and that its outcome has been "a nightmare with no end in sight."

Facing the grim prospect of getting bogged down in a quagmire, the United States, in line with a proposal made by the Iraq Study Group in December 2006, has adopted a new strategy, popularly known as the "surge."

Since January 2007, 30,000 additional U.S. troops, backed by Iraqi soldiers, have been ordered to stamp out violence, first in Baghdad and then in other trouble spots. If the Americans cannot end the suicide bombings, roadside attacks, assassinations, random murders and kidnappings, they will not be able to stabilize the country and persuade Shiite and Sunni Muslims to work together for its greater good.

The "surge" has succeeded to some extent. Gen. David Petraeus, the top American commander in Iraq, said recently that violent attacks have fallen by 60 per cent, a development that can be attributed to tougher U.S. tactics in the form of stepped up patrols and raids against insurgent strongholds, the formation of pro-American militias known as Awakening Councils, and the decision by the Mahdi Army – led by the virulently anti-American Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr – to observe a ceasefire.

But as Petraeus added in a note of caution, the security gains of the past several months have been "tenuous" and "fragile," and "still much hard work" lies ahead. Suicide bombings still rip through Baghdad and other cities. Since the deployment of more U.S. troops to the Iraqi capital, the insurgents have shifted their focus from Anbar province to the provinces of Diyala and Salahuddin. Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia has established something of a beachhead in Iraq. Still, the downturn in violence has resulted in a reduction of U.S. casualties so far in 2008. Last year, 899 U.S. soldiers were killed, compared to 822 in 2006. Since the invasion, nearly 4,000 Americans have died in combat.

Petraeus' success in curbing violence, however, has not dramatically altered the dynamics of sectarianism. These rifts, which rarely surfaced during Saddam's era, have displaced millions of Iraqis in fierce outbursts of ethnic cleansing. In Samarra, one of Islam's holiest cities, terrorists firebombed a sacred shrine and pushed Iraq into civil war. In Baghdad, mixed neighbourhoods are almost a thing of the past. In Mosul, Sunnis have virtually erased the Kurdish presence in the western half of that northern city.

The National Intelligence Estimate, an assessment compiled by 16 American spy agencies, holds out little hope that Iraqi politicians – who define themselves by their ethnicity and religion – can bring the warring groups to heel. The current Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, has turned Iraq's security forces into an instrument of Shiite domination and intimidation and failed to enact some important parliamentary bills, such as legislation to share oil revenues fairly. Maliki wants to empower the majority Shiite community, which was marginalized by Saddam and his predecessors. Maliki's implicit sectarian agenda, which is clearly at odds with U.S. policy, has thwarted efforts to implant a model of democratic governance in Iraq.

True, Iraqis have voted in national elections, elected a national assembly and provincial parliaments and adopted a constitution. But these achievements may become irrelevant if sectarianism persists.

Iraq, which was suffocated by United Nations sanctions prior to 2003, is still experiencing problems in improving the delivery of basic services such as electricity and health. By one account, 70 per cent of Iraqis do not even have access to adequate water supplies, while 90 per cent of Iraqi hospitals lack proper medical and surgical supplies.

Despite the unpopularity of the war in the United States, the Bush administration has no intention of withdrawing from Iraq in the foreseeable future. Robert Gates, the U.S. secretary of defence, has said that the United States will remain in Iraq for years to come, while Bush has warned that a hasty pullout would unsettle the region, encourage Al Qaeda and hand a victory to Iran. Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has sounded a similar theme, saying that a "premature" U.S. withdrawal would be dangerous. But if the Democrats defeat the Republicans in November's presidential election, there will probably be a phased American pullout from Iraq.

Westmount Shul promotes Israel's 60th

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Thornhill's Westmount Shul and Learning Centre is commemorating Israel's 60th anniversary with a two-month long series of lectures and learning activities.

Titled "60 Days for 60 Years," the shul will host 13 speaking engagements by various local rabbis and experts on Israel. The campaign is part of a new global initiative spearheaded by Britain's TRIBE: Young United Synagogue, with cities in the United States, United Kingdom and Israel all taking part.

The series is patterned after TRIBE's 2006 worldwide education initiative, titled "60 Days for 6 Million," honouring the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz with a book containing 60 essays about the Shoah.

As part of the latest campaign, the Westmount Shul is distributing a new book, 60 Days for 60 Years: Israel, that contains essays from international scholars and rabbis honouring those who've died defending Israel since its birth.

So far, 5,000 copies have been distributed in the Toronto Jewish community, and another 150,000 have been distributed worldwide through TRIBE.

The book also comes with a learning card containing 60 chronological events, starting from Israel's Independence Day to a January 2007 suicide bombing in an Eilat bakery.

Marc Lavine, a Westmount Shul member and co-chair of the Canadian program, said the objective of the "60 Days" campaign is to get people thinking and learning more about Israel through Torah.

"Our shul took a lead in the '60 for 6 million project,' and that touched a lot of member families who went home and sat down to take a few minutes and learn a little something from Torah," he said.

This year's campaign lecture series kicked off March 10 with an event at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT) shul in Thornhill.

It featured Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas and co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress, who gave a talk addressing the question "Do Jews in the Diaspora Have the Right to Criticize Israel?"

Prior to ceding the podium to Rabbi Bulka, Rabbi Yossi Michalowicz, the Westmount Shul's spiritual leader, led off the evening by telling the nearly 100 people assembled that only a return to the Torah can save Israel.

Referring to the ongoing woes in Israel and how best to overcome them, Rabbi Michalowicz said, "The best way to reconquer the land is to... learn the forgotten Torah. Unfortunately, many Jews are no longer people of the Book. When we can reconquer the Book, then who knows what can happen in Israel."

Peppering his discourse with various biblical and talmudic references, Rabbi Bulka delivered a 45-minute speech castigating people who condemn Israel.

"Do Jews have a right to criticize Israel? The short answer? Absolutely, yes. But is it right to do so?" he asked rhetorically, adding that the Torah gives Jews the right to do what they want, but asks them to "do what's right."

Rabbi Bulka continued: "We assume that when someone criticizes Israel... they understand the full nuance of the situation. But it's arrogant to assume [Diaspora Jews] know more than what Israelis know. [Israel] is a country besieged by all sides... in all of history, there's no other country [that has been] so kind to the people who want to harm it."

He added that at least Canada's current government is not one of those condemning Israel for its actions.

"They get it," Rabbi Bulka said.

[Rick Naor photo]

Hammering home another point, Rabbi Bulka said Jews who criticize Israel pose an even greater danger for the country, because it gives non-Jews a way to mask the real reason they critique Israel: anti-Semitism.

"Deep down, the people who criticize Israel won't shed a tear if Israel disappears," he said. "This is the danger of a world mindset in which people [who hate Israel] can say, 'I'm not so bad, because there are Jews who agree with me.'"

Rabbi Bulka said Jews now have an obligation to never speak ill of Israel.

"Anytime anyone opens their mouth to criticize Israel outside of context, is irresponsible," he said. "They have a right to do it, but it's morally corrupt to do it in these times. We need to rejoice at [Israel turning] 60. The enemy would deny us to rejoice. We need to deny them this."

In the upcoming weeks, the Westmount Shul will present weekly lectures on topics ranging from historical perspectives on Israel to current Zionist philosophy on the Holy Land.

The closing program for the "60 Days for 60 Years" campaign is on May 6 which is also Yom Hazikaron, and will feature a discussion on the topic "Insanity or Inspiration: Why Risk Living in Israel?"

Leo Baeck director resigns over explicit poetry

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The school director at the centre of a controversy over sexually explicit and violent poetry posted on the Internet has resigned.

David Prashker, director of the Leo Baeck Day School, tendered his resignation late last week. The resignation will take effect Aug. 31 and he remains on a paid leave of absence until then, said Brian Simon, president of the school's board of directors.

Simon declined any further comment.

The school, which teaches 800 students from kindergarten through Grade 8, has been shaken over the poetry, which appeared on Prashker's personal website. Parents were alerted to it through an anonymous e-mail that was sent in early March. Many reacted with concern over the explicit nature of the poems and their references to rape and murder.

In one poem, Voluntary Admission, Prashker wrote, "I raped her lust I condess," while in A Song of Self-Overcoming, he writes, "The first act of killing is the hardest yet the bullet like a body pierces the pool of flesh and blood is much thicker than water and the second time is remarkably straightforward."

Leo Baeck's board of directors responded to parents' concerns by establishing a sub-committee to review the website, make recommendations and report to the board.

In a letter to parents prior to Prashker's resignation, Simon also stated that "the board intends to retain an information technology specialist to review the security of the school's electronic mailing lists. The fact that this e-mail was sent to so many parents suggests the possibility that someone accessed proprietary electronic information of the school without authorization."

As of The CJN's press time, there was no indication who was responsible for the e-mail.

Anti-Israel resolution bumped at teachers' meet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A resolution that called on Ontario Catholic teachers to discuss a boycott of Israel and suggested that Israel practises apartheid failed to make it to the floor at the group's annual general meeting last week.

The resolution, presented by the Toronto secondary unit of the Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association (OECTA), was not discussed because of a backed-up agenda, a source who requested anonymity told The CJN.

More than 200 resolutions were presented to the meeting, but only about half were addressed. "I can tell you it was not a burning issue that anyone was discussing," the source said.

B'nai Brith Canada described the resolution as one-sided, discriminatory and biased against Israel.

The document, obtained by The CJN, incorporated a 2005 statement by the Palestinian Campaign for the Academic & Cultural Boycott of Israel, which was endorsed by 170 Palestinian organizations.

That document claimed Israel's occupation had damaged Palestinian society and led to "the denial of educational rights for Palestinians by invasions, closures, checkpoints, curfews and shootings and arrests of teachers, lecturers and students."

It accuses Israel of ethnic cleansing, "persistent violations of international law" and constructing "the colonial wall" (the security barrier). It calls on supporters to boycott Israel and "to pressure your respective states to impose embargoes and sanctions against Israel."

In a news release that preceded the teachers' meeting, B'nai Brith stated: "We were first alerted to the problem by an OECTA union member concerned that the two resolutions whitewash Palestinian terrorism and call for a boycott against the Jewish State."

"The disturbing trend of what appears to be a growing anti-Israel mindset at the union level that is now beginning to permeate schools as well as universities," said Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president.

"We urge the OECTA to adopt a principled stance by rejecting categorically the anti-Israel mindset... OECTA teachers should raise their democratic voices to demand that the good name of their union is not hijacked by a politicized anti-Israel agenda," Dimant added.

Darchei Noam lecture memorializes young academic

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The C.J.N.

A life was celebrated March 9 at the first annual Elka Klein Memorial Lecture, held at Congregation Darchei Noam.

Klein, a professor of Judaic studies at the University of Cincinnati, died three years ago at the age of 39 after battling ovarian cancer. Most of her professional life was spent studying Jewish medieval history.

"She was a very serious intellectual," said her father, Martin Klein, a Darchei Noam member and a professor emeritus of African history at the University of Toronto. "Death interrupted an ongoing seminar in Jewish history."

This lecture, which featured University of Toronto history professor Natalie Davis, was the first in a series that aims to spread Klein's infatuation with history and Judaism.

Davis, a former professor of Klein's, looked out over a packed room as she spoke about the relationship between 18th-century Jews and their slaves in the Dutch colony of Suriname, a subject, she assured the audience, that would have fascinated her former student.

"I think Elka would have liked the topic I'm talking about tonight," she said with a smile, allowing her glasses to slide to the tip of her nose.

Using information gleaned from archives, Davis examined how Jewish citizens would convert their slaves to Judaism.

This, she surmised, would have impressed Klein.

"She loved archives, and I share that with her. There's lots of [information] in the archives in the Netherlands and it's just exciting to work with them, and Elka [would agree.] I evoke her spirit as I talk about it," Davis said.

Davis' lecture, which was taken from her upcoming fourth book, shared some similarities with Klein's work: both historians shared the idea that in order to understand Jewish history, one must examine not just a Jewish community but its surroundings and the communities around it.

While speaking about Klein's work, her mother, Suzanne Klein, agreed with this sentiment.

"[Elka's] conception of Jewish history was that the Jews lived in two worlds and those worlds were intimately connected. [She believed] that you cannot understand Jewish history and the lives of Jews without placing them in the context of the world. [Jews] affected the world they lived in and that world affected them," her mother said.

While Klein lived in the United States, her parents chose to memorialize her in Toronto at her first congregation, Darchei Noam.

"Elka grew up in Toronto and Toronto is very much a part of her," her father said.

Klein's interest in her religion started from a young age.

"We were a secular family, but [Elka] wanted to be bat mitzvahed. She really went on from there," her father said. "At a certain point, she wanted to study medieval Jewish history."

Her pride in Judaism was contagious and spread throughout her circle of friends.

"She had no self-consciousness about being Jewish in genteel company. Many of her gentle friends said she got them to understand the significance of Judaism," her father said.

Through what will become a yearly event, Klein's parents hope to get others interested in her area of study.

Ricki Grushcow, one of many to attend the lecture, said Davis' presentation did just that.

"It was very interesting. It was something I had known nothing about, and I'm intrigued by the slavery-conversion connection," Grushcow said. "It's important to know as much as you can about your heritage and culture. I grew up with a narrow framework. [The lecture] spurred me on to do more."

Klein's father, who describes himself as secular, said he was able to learn from his daughter.

"She got me interested in Jewish history. There's no better way to remember her by," he said of the lecture series.

UJA, CIJA honour Italian publisher

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Two leading organizations of the Jewish community have awarded its 2008 Words and Deeds Leadership Award to Toronto businessman Tony Gagliano, executive chair and CEO of St. Joseph Communications.

Gagliano, who is Italian, received the award March 6 from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Council for Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) — co-hosts of the gala dinner event at Toronto's Sheraton Centre hotel — in recognition of his commitment to and achievements in the Canadian community.

The national award, established in 2006, recognizes "Canadian leaders whose contribution to humanitarian causes, tolerance and inclusion in Canadian society has been outstanding."

Prior recipients include Gordon M. Nixon, president and CEO of RBC Financial Group and Ted Rogers, president and CEO of Rogers Communications.

"Tony's record of community support is superb and he has really just begun," said CIJA co-chair Brent Belzberg in a release. "[Gagliano] is full of ideas on how to improve quality of life in our cities, including hugely creative and successful initiative such as the Luminato cultural festival in Toronto."

David Koschitzky, chair of UJA Federation, echoed Belzberg's remarks, saying the Jewish community was happy to "celebrate Tony Gagliano and his remarkable work to benefit all citizens."

Aside from his business accomplishments,

Gagliano, 49, is also an honorary board member of Scouts Canada; a member of the Young Presidents' Organization; on the boards of Toronto's St. Michael's Hospital, the Toronto Community Foundation, the Canadian Club, and the Ryerson Foundation; and he's vice-president of the Art Gallery of Ontario.

He was also named to Canada's Top 40 under 40 list in 1995.

In 1996, Gagliano founded the St. Joseph Foundation, through which his company donates 10 per cent of its yearly profits to causes such as children's charities, health care, education and the arts.

In accepting the award, Gagliano emphasized how he was raised with strong family values, and he paid respect to his parents, Gaetano and Giuseppina, who founded St. Joseph's as a family business in 1956 in their home's garage, just two years after they immigrated to Canada from Italy.

Gagliano also thanked and paid homage to both the Jewish and Italian communities.

"There can be no denying the contribution, in words and deeds, made by the Jewish community to culture and life here in Canada," he said. "Many of our greatest public, artistic and business leaders have hailed from the Jewish community and have worked tirelessly for the betterment of our society. I am honoured to be able to say that many of these people are also my friends."

He continued: "The fact is that the Jewish and Italian communities share many values in common: values of hard work, integrity, family, giving back to society, love of the arts... not to mention a love of great food. As a group we are allies, friends and collaborators and will always be."

Gagliano also extolled the virtue of hard work to bridge cultural gaps and unite Canadians via projects such as Luminato, a multicultural arts festival that he co-founded last year.

"The core values of Luminato are accessibility, collaboration and diversity, the very same values that are reflected today in the UJA and CIJA. Quite frankly, they are Canada's values," he said.

"It is in the spirit of those values that I am proud to report that, this June, at Luminato 2008, as part of more than 100 events that are taking place, the works of the renowned Nobel Prize-winning author, Isaac Bashevis Singer, will be celebrated by two modern novelists, Dara Horn and David Bezmozgis... [Singer] believed in the power of creativity and the arts. He spoke of the arts as having the power to change the world."

Gagliano said he hopes that the "cultural renaissance" being experienced by Toronto will influence people to become more tolerant of each other and lead Canadians to embrace their cultural differences and lead the world as a compassionate society.

"To build a great life, it is essential to help build great communities first. My father, who is now 90 years old, has shown me through his words and deeds that we all have a responsibility to serve a cause that is greater than our self-interest," Gagliano said.

Luminato 2008 will begin June 6 with an opening night performance by Jewish Montreal jazz starlet, Nikki Yanofsky at Yonge-Dundas Square.

Remembering the Past, Shaping the Future

Financial problems force She'arim to close

In December, he said, the committee was "still working toward finding a solution."

Although month-to-month costs remain the same, the funds advanced by the federation at the beginning of the year have already been used up, Harlang said.

By the end of the school year, he said, the deficit will probably be "in the $600,000 to $700,000 range."

One of the reasons for the timing of the board's decision was to allow sufficient time before the start of the 2008-2009 school year to put a plan in place, Harlang said.

Many parents expressed concern about their kids returning to the type of school where they had negative experiences before starting She'arim.

"What makes you think it's going to work now?" asked one angry parent.

Others cited social issues, including bullying and teasing. "I would ask you, please, do not compare what the plan is for next year with anything you have experienced before your children went to She'arim," said Epstein.

To help ease the transition, each parent and child will be interviewed, and each child's individual education program carefully analyzed, Epstein said.

"The reason it may work," Harlang said, "is because they're going to take a different approach."

He added that parents must bear in mind that the "status quo can't continue."

Several parents expressed the Jewish community of not caring about the school.

"The [proposed new building that is to replace the BJCC] had no allowance for this school. To me the writing was on the wall years ago," said one. "There are hundreds of millions of dollars being spent on buildings... Why aren't we getting the money?"

"The fact is, you do get money from the federation," Harlang replied.

"Obviously not enough," muttered one audience member. "Every single organization asks for more money," Harlang said. "[The federation has] formulas, and there's not enough for every good project to be funded."

Some parents suggested moving the teachers as well as the students to the new location. "You have all these people with years of experience. They know what they're doing," said one.

Audience members also asked about the availability in the new school of the kind of non-teaching staff found at She'arim, such as social workers, psychologists and art and music therapists.

"My hope is that we can provide everything these children need," Epstein said.

"In my heart, I can't believe that you have really put the children first," one father said.

Harlang and Braun stressed the importance of doing what is best for the children.

"And not just these kids," Harlang said. "There'll be more in future years."

A transition team will include parents of She'arim students, said Harlang.

Shaviv, whose school takes in about nine incoming She'arim alumni a year in Grade 9, told The C/JN that they have "been very well trained in techniques to compensate for their learning disabilities."

Several parents wondered what would happen if the other school did not agree to house current She'arim students.

A few parents proposed taking the effort and money being put into closing the school and putting them into keeping it open instead, at least for one more year.

But Harlang said that, as time progressed, "we had to make a decision."

The committee "didn't want to come to this conclusion in May or June," he said. "We didn't want to come to this conclusion at all."

One father asked, "When ever have the Jewish people decided that a budget would stop a good thing going? When [Jewish] doctors could not find a place to work, mothers did not say being a doctor is not a viable option."

"We built our own hospital," he said.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, a founder of She'arim, told parents that he wanted them to help him raise money so that the school could remain open.

"I realize that we may have to close, but my feeling was: What's the rush? Let's give the community a chance. I'm hoping the Toronto Jewish community will help out and prevent the closing," he told The C/JN the day after the meeting.

Epstein told parents that there are "models" other than the She'arim approach that have worked successfully in other cities.

At the meeting, Manoim lauded the teachers, who she said put their concern for the students "at the top of their agenda," over and above their own now-uncertain future.

Her voice breaking, Manoim said she and her staff "are totally committed to working with the Mercatz and the federation to make this transition the most comfortable and efficient one possible."

David Peterson, Justice Frank Iacobucci, Lawrence Tanenbaum, Steven Cummings, Tony Gagliano, Morris Perlis, Dominic D'Alessandro during the award presentation.

UJA and CIJA Sponsor Community Celebration

The shared values and strong friendship between Toronto's Jewish and Italian communities were recently highlighted in a glittering evening attended by close to 1000 of Canada's top business, political and cultural leaders. This year's annual Words & Deeds Leadership Award Dinner, hosted by UJA Federation and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), was held on March 6th. Award recipient Tony Gagliano was celebrated throughout the evening by guests as a shining example of how great communities are built and sustained by great leadership from within our diverse Canadian cultural mosaic. The Executive Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of St. Joseph Communications was recognized for his contributions to the economic, cultural and social wellbeing of Toronto.

"In Tony Gagliano, CIJA and UJA are proud to be able to honour the strong historical and cultural ties between the Jewish and Italian-Canadian communities as well as the tolerant Canada we have all contributed to building and strengthening for the future," said Steven Cummings, founding Co-Chair of CIJA, and honorary Co-Chair of the evening.

The evening also shone a spotlight on both UJA Federation and CIJA and their roles in creating caring communities, practicing social justice and fighting against extremism and antisemitism. "We are delighted to be here representing the vital work that these two organizations do – not only for the Jewish community but also for the country as a whole, working together for the preservation of Canadian values of peace, respectful discourse and diversity," noted UJA Federation Chair David Koschitzky.

The Dinner Co-Chairs were Dominic D'Alessandro, President and Chief Executive Officer of Manulife Financial, and former Ontario Premier David Peterson, Senior Partner and Chairman, Cassels Brock & Blackwell LLP. They were joined by Honorary Co-Chairs Steven Cummings, John Cassaday, Frank Iacobucci, Morris Perlis, and Lawrence Tanenbaum. The event was emceed by David Peterson, and attended not only by Ontario Lieutenant Governor David Onley but also by many elected representatives.

Tony Gagliano, his wife Gina and their three children: Michael, Guy, Anthony and Krista.

Gagliano Praised by Diverse Communities

Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel once said that "Words can sometimes, in moments of grace, attain the quality of deeds." In honouring Tony Gagliano, recipient of this year's Words & Deeds Leadership Award, UJA Federation and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) recognized one of Canada's most committed community leaders whose actions reflect the values that drive both organizations. As the Executive Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of St. Joseph Communications, Gagliano oversees a publishing empire that includes Toronto Life Magazine, Fashion Magazine, Canadian Family, Wedding Bells, and countless cultural and philanthropic enterprises including St. Joseph Foundation, which allocates funds to the relief of poverty, the advancement of education, and the environment.

"It is particularly fitting that the Jewish community, through UJA Federation and CIJA, be our hosts in honouring Tony Gagliano tonight. Fitting because the Jewish community – perhaps more than any other – has, for such a long time, understood the moral obligation of helping one's neighbours and fellow citizens. Indeed, 'giving back' is a distinction of Jewish people everywhere. And giving back is what Tony Gagliano is all about," said Dominic D'Alessandro, Co-Chair of the dinner.

Gagliano has been involved with the Young Presidents' Association, St. Michael's Hospital and St. Michael's Hospital Foundation, Ryerson University in Toronto, the Art Gallery of Ontario, and Scouts Canada. St. Joseph was the first corporation in Canada to receive the prestigious Financial Post award for environmental excellence and has become a member of the Forest Stewardship Council – an international non-profit organization founded in 1993 to support environmentally appropriate management of the world's forests.

As a passionate supporter of the arts, Gagliano is a founding partner and Co-Chair of Luminato, Toronto's Festival of Arts & Creativity, which last year attracted a million people.

"The fact is that the Jewish and Italian communities share many values in common. As a group we are allies, friends and collaborators and will always be. I am honoured to be here tonight to receive the Words & Deeds Leadership Award," said Gagliano.

Israel Museum gets youthful support

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Through a new organization called the Young Associates of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum, two twentysomethings hope to expose Toronto's young professionals to one of Israel's world-renowned institutions.

Jessica Waks and Rina Zigler, the CFIM Young Associates co-chairs, are working to raise the public profile of Jerusalem's Israel Museum, which is home to about half a million works of art, Judaica and archaeological finds.

On March 13, Waks and Zigler attracted about 130 young professionals to the group's official launch with an event called Red, White and Moose, held at contemporary Canadian artist Charles Pachter's private gallery, called the Moose Factory.

"I think a lot of people my age are starting to get interested in culture, wanting to start their own art collections, and this is a great way for them to learn about a great museum, a great institution, to give back to Israel in some way, but also to enrich themselves culturally," said Waks, 23, who works as a communications co-ordinator for the Discovery Channel at CTV.

"Obviously, we're not saving lives here. We're not curing cancer, but culture is so important. Culture and art is people's way of channelling creativity."

CFIM is one of 14 organizations that financially support the Israel Museum. Funds raised by CFIM go to providing free admission to Israeli children of all faiths and ethnicities.

Zigler, a 22-year-old McGill University art history graduate, said she always wanted to find a way to get involved with CFIM.

In June 2005, Zigler moved to Jerusalem for seven months to go to Hebrew University and to intern in the Israel Museum's contemporary art department.

She said that when she returned, she was disappointed to learn that so few young adults and art enthusiasts knew anything about the museum.

"You don't know that it has an amazing contemporary section, that it has a beautiful sculpture garden... You don't know about the youth wing," Waks said.

This past summer, Zigler volunteered to help organize the Royal Ontario Museum's Canada Collects event, which was held in October.

During the planning process, she decided to contact Waks, whom she had known since high school, to see if they could inject more of a youthful presence into the event.

After attracting a few young professionals to Canada Collects, they organized an informal wine-and-cheese CFIM event at Toronto's Lonsdale Gallery in November, and from there, they formed the CFIM Young Associates committee, which consists of about 12 young adults in their 20s and 30s.

"Jessica and I got in touch, and the two of us, before we knew it, were the co-chairs of the Young Associates, and we've been starting up this program ever since. This is our first major event, our first independent event, our debut on the Toronto scene," Zigler said.

Pachter, who is best known for his mural, Hockey Knights in Canada, in Toronto's College Street subway station, lent his private gallery to the sold-out event, which had a Canadian red-and-white theme.

"[The venue] is a modern masterpiece," Waks said. "It has won a bunch of architect-tural awards, and the thing about Charlie is that he has such a connection to the museum. He is an artist, he's Jewish and his mom was [the late] Sara Pachter," who was an avid supporter of Israel and led countless tours to the Holy Land.

Although there was a strong Jewish aspect to the launch, the invited crowd wasn't exclusively Jewish.

"Our belief is that the museum is one of Israel's best institutions, and to help project Israel for her democratic values and for her cultural identity, it detracts from another side of the country that the media often projects," Zigler said.

Waks said that at the event at the Lonsdale Gallery, they showed a video about the children involved with the museum's youth wing.

"After the Katyusha rockets in the north [of Israel] destroyed all the forests [during the 2006 Second Lebanon War], the kids from the youth wing in the museum came and painted these beautiful installations on wooden tree cut outs in the forest. It was such a powerful image to have kids from Christian, Muslim and Jewish backgrounds all coming together and expressing themselves through art and promoting the idea of peace."

Zigler said she hopes the Young Associates will help expose Torontonians to one of Israel's finest institutions.

"It's a really great way for the international arts community to get a better understanding of the country, and we think it's a really great institution to support. We want to target young people who, if they're not interested in Israel, they're interested in art, and by virtue of being interested in arts, they'll come to the events and learn about the museum."

Ten tips to help celebrate an environmentally friendly Purim

Purim celebrates unity and community. We give one another gifts of food and distribute money to the poor to remember how we were rescued from Haman's plot to destroy the Jewish people by pulling together for three days of communal fasting, prayer and self reflection.

Sadly, in today's consumer-oriented society, our community spirit is being smothered in layers of cellophane, excessive packaging, a surplus of junk food and expensive costumes. This needless glitter is damaging not only to our pocket and our health, but to our environment as well.

Sviva Israel offers the following suggestions for creating a more eco-friendly Purim:

1) Trash the baskets – What can you do with so many straw baskets and gift bags? Package your mishloach manot in useful, reusable containers such as storage containers, glasses, mugs and pasta drainers for year-round usability.

2) Wrap it up – For the more creative, wrap your food items up in a pretty hand towel, an apron, cloth table napkins, oven mitts or other useful fabric item.

3) Use sustainable stuffing – Instead of padding your package with shredded cellophane or coloured paper, use banana chips, sunflower seeds or popcorn (only for recipients over three years old).

4) Bag it – Follow the fashion trend and give your gifts in eco-friendly cloth bags that your friends can reuse for shopping.

5) Include naturally sweet foods – Replace the candy and chocolates with fresh and dried fruit or fruit leathers, unsweetened fruit juices and other healthy products.

6) Swap costumes – Your son doesn't want to wear last year's cowboy outfit? Many costumes are perennial favourites. Create a neighbourhood swap shop with everyone's unwanted, worn-out Purim costumes.

7) Raid mom's or dad's closet – Introduce your kids to the old Purim tradition of creating their own costumes from your (old) clothing, hats, shoes and jewelry. Encourage their imagination to run wild!

8) Recycling can be cool – Making a costume from cardboard boxes, kitchen roll tubes, etc., needn't be old-fashioned. Your child could become an iPod, a cellphone or a digital camera!

9) Join a Purim co-op – Give mishloach manot as a community. Compile a list of all the members in the community (neighbourhood, synagogue, seniors group). People can check off the names of those they would like to send a gift to, contributing a set amount for each name. Volunteers prepare and deliver one nice-sized food gift to each person, with a note listing all of their friends who thought of them. The beauty of this idea is that it saves the time and excess food and packaging of multiple gift-giving, creates a strong sense of community fellowship, and any profits can be given to charity.

10) Share the Spoils – Purim is over and you find yourself overloaded with unwanted food gifts. Bring unopened food items to a local charitable organization to distribute to needy families.

RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ

Purim and Pesach! Pretty exciting times! They're well worth waiting that extra month for this year. With Purim this week and Pesach coming within a month, there is much to celebrate.

Each has its distinct traditions and storyline.

Purim is about our rescue from the jaws of physical destruction by Haman and his cohorts, while Pesach is about our transformation into a nation with that great gift of freedom. Reflecting upon these great events, we have every reason to celebrate.

But what about those who, in those days and throughout the ages, were not saved by the great miracles of Purim or Pesach or have suffered unduly because of enslavement and persecution? Yes, we remember them with special prayers, the spilling of drops of wine during the seder, eating some maror or having the Fast of Esther before Purim to remember how close we came.

But is it not a contradiction to celebrate in the face of someone else's suffering?

For that reason, we offer a disclaimer. What happens is beshert, part of destiny. It's really out of our control. Some laugh, some cry, and some rejoice while others grieve. Don't even try to figure it out. It's complicated, and just when you think you've got it, God tosses you another curve ball and you're back to square one.

While we might not be able to understand the intricacies of beshert, we can definitely pick up some pointers about modifying the equation. Even if the outcome might be the same, beshert is not without the human touch.

Purim, Pesach teach us the value of agency

Reb Zussya and his brother Rebbe Elimelech, two renowned chassidic leaders, used to travel among the people in disguises so as to get the pulse of the people and, when necessary, share in the pain and suffering that was so bountiful.

On one particularly cold night, they stopped at an inn and warmed themselves together by the fire. At the same time, at the same inn, some local peasants were having a party. A bit drunk, the peasants danced in a circle, and one decided to kick Reb Zussya in the head each time he passed.

After a while, Reb Elimelech could no longer bear seeing the pain of his brother, but the two of them were no match for this group of drunks. Reb Elimelech suggested that he switch places with Reb Zussya. After some insistence on the part of Reb Elimelech, they changed places.

But the next time the peasant passed, he said: "It's not right to keep hitting this one Jew. Next time around, I'm going to hit the one alongside." Said Reb Zussya: "One cannot outsmart God. What is beshert to Zussya will come to Zussya!"

Exactly! Often unknowingly, we are fulfilling God's mandate through our very actions. But beshert is not about lying back and letting destiny take over. We are neither robots nor puppets without independent power or ability to chart our own course.

Bashert really means that we're psyched to accept the final outcome, whatever it may be. But until that point, it's incumbent upon us to play our hand – and head and heart – to the fullest. It might just be that I hold the key to a decision that's yet to be set into motion.

I take the maror of life, which comes in its many different forms, and I sweeten it with my ability to celebrate life. I might reduce the extent of my recitation of Hallel, as I do on Pesach, but I don't diminish my ability to offer thanksgiving and praise for those things that fill my life with joy today.

I lament the fact that there are poor and hungry in this world, so I share what I can, but I enjoy and celebrate the blessings that are mine, as we do on Purim.

In the face of past and present adversity, I celebrate my ability to move forward and through my positive actions, make the world a bit better for all.

Purim and Pesach! Yes, much sacrifice has been made throughout the ages. How best to honour it? By not getting stuck in beshert mode and looking at life as futile, but rather by creating new and successful realities with our celebration of life and all that it affords us.

The reality of having a yom tov reminds us that we are beshert to have joy and gladness, light and enlightenment – and that with our personal touch, we can create happier endings.

Chag Purim samayach!

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in its advertisements.

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Dear Mr. Obama,

I read with interest your remarks that you would meet with Iran's leaders and offer economic inducements if they promised to "change their behaviour," stay out of Iraq and co-operate on terrorism and nuclear issues.

As a parent, I was struck by the paternal tone of your comment that "there are both carrots and there are sticks available to them for those changes in behaviour." Will this language of reward and punishment be enough to sway the mullahs? I don't know. But permit me to share with you some of my people's experience with a similar situation in our version of an Iranian bedtime story.

You see, a long time ago we were also confronted by a genocidal Persian. This fellow, Haman, did not obfuscate about his plans to rid the kingdom of all Jews. The ostensible catalyst for this ethnic cleansing was the annoying habit of one Jew named Mordechai who refused to bow down to Haman. A careful reading of the Book of Esther tells us that Haman did not seem to notice this contrary behaviour until he was prodded by the rest of the king's servants, who basically snitched on Mordechai until Haman was made aware of the problem.

Even then, had Mordechai been unable to overcome his aversion to bowing, he could have perhaps avoided the dilemma by simply walking away whenever Haman passed by, a thought posed by the famous medieval commentator Abraham Ibn Ezra.

But Mordechai seemed hellbent on picking a fight. He wasn't going to bow, come what may. Ostensibly, this defiance of evil may seem rash, irresponsible, even hawkish. But perhaps Mordechai wasn't so foolish after all. Perhaps it seemed to him that the bowing issue was just a pretext, and that had he succumbed to that demand, many more would follow in its wake, and that those demands would be false pretexts as well. Perhaps he reasoned that true evil regards genocide not as the tragic endgame when negotiations fail, but the very goal in the first place, and that perhaps such goals are less amenable to rational discourse than one might surmise.

We Jews have not inconsiderable experience with men who mean what they say when it comes to our liquidation. So when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad states, as he did in August 2006 in Malaysia, that "the solution to the Middle East crisis is the destruction of Israel," I'll take him at his word. According to historian Daniel Goldhagen, who is currently studying the history of genocide in the 20th century, I have every reason to do so.

Goldhagen has noticed that those who planned genocides and carried out rarely concealed their intentions in advance. Whether the victims were Armenians, Jews, Bosnians or others, the perpetrators felt there was no reason to hide their plans.

Thanks for listening to my ancient Jewish bedtime tale.

Good night, Mr. Obama, and sleep well. Hopefully, my brethren in the Land of Israel will be able to as well, without having to rush into shelters or fear that when they sit down to study Torah, someone who seems immune to carrots and sticks will end their lives.

Foreskin's Lament: A Memoir by Shalom Auslander, Riverhead Press.

I don't know what to make of this coming-of-age memoir. On the one hand, it is funny, filled with risible episodes from a disordered youth. On the other hand, it is a highly emotional, almost hysterical, rant against traditional Judaism.

Shalom had to endure long, boring hours at a haredi Yeshiva in Monsey, N. Y., and reside in a strict, socially restricted community. Also, he had to counter the drunken violence of his foul-mouthed carpenter father.

Somewhere in his youth, Shalom began to view God as a personal antagonist, an enemy ready to punish him and thwart both his desires and practices. "There was no need to provoke Him. I've been on God's chessboard long enough to know that every move forward, every bit of good news – Success! Marriage! Child! – is just another Godly gambit, a feign, a fake, a setup; it seems as if I'm making my way across the board, but soon enough God calls check, and the company that hired me goes under, the wife dies, the baby chokes to death. God's pick-and-roll. The Rope-

Books
Bernard Baskin

An angry rant relieved by humour

a-Lordy-Dope. God was here, God was there, God was everywhere."

In neurotic rebellion, young Shalom turns his back on tradition and family and immerses himself in things forbidden: masturbation, dope smoking, shoplifting and eating treif (non-kosher food). Filled with guilt and anxiety, he is certain of discovery. "I lived in constant fear of being caught. My friends at yeshiva would never understand. I'd be lucky if they ever spoke to me again. If their parents found out I was treif, they would forbid their children from being my friend. My rabbi would pray for my forgiveness. My father would throw me out of the house. And my mother? My mother would bury me in the dirt until I was kosher again."

Arrested for shoplifting, Shalom is shipped off to a less rigorous Orthodox-style yeshiva in Israel. He remains bewildered and insistent. "The people who raised me say that I am not religious. They are mistaken. What I am is not observant. But I am painfully, crippling, incurably, miserably religious." Again,

"I believe in a personal God, everything I do he takes personally."

An adult Shalom moves to Manhattan, visits an expensive shrink twice a week and worries about his pregnant wife. Is God going to allow a normal birth and a healthy child? Is this God's opportunity to punish him for his blasphemous tongue and numerous iniquities? An e-mail to the almighty would read: "Dear God, please don't kill my son during birth. And don't kill my wife during birth. I know You're probably pissed at me, but I'm pissed at You, too, so let's just keep this between. Thanks. S."

Perhaps the book's best written chapter is a description of the 14-mile hike on the Sabbath that Shalom and his wife took in sweltering heat to Madison Square Garden to watch a hockey game on a JumboTron TV feed. Maybe God will reward them for not riding on the Sabbath and give the New York Rangers a long-overdue Stanley Cup victory.

This book is an angry, irreverent rant against what the author believes is the unwholesome misuse of authority. It is relieved by humour, conviction and a measure of contrition.

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Other Purims? Most of us are familiar with the Purim that begins Thursday night. Well, it turns out that aside from that Purim tale, there are dozens of other Purims out there.

These Purims can be divided into two types: communal Purims that mark the salvation of a community from impending disaster and personal Purims "established by individual families marking their own personal redemptions." [tinyurl.com/3x68ou]

Why are these holidays named after Purim "and not Pesach or Chanukah, each of which likewise celebrates Jewish redemption from the designs of our enemies?" Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits points out that Jews are not supposed to rejoice in the downfall of an enemy. We don't celebrate the death of the Egyptians, and there is no mitzvah of feasting and revelry on Chanukah. Purim is different.

The Megillah tells us that Purim's villain, Haman, is a descendant of Amalek, the tribe said to confront Jews from generation to generation. Just as Jews are commanded to celebrate the defeat of Haman on Purim, communities or families who have defeated their own "Haman" have proclaimed their own "Purims." [tinyurl.com/3x7e3c]

They include:

- Purim Vincent – In 1614, a baker named Vincent Fettmilch organized attacks on the Jews of Frankfurt-am-Main and forced them to leave their city. "After several months, the king of Germany learned that a flagrant injustice had been done to the Jews. He commanded that the baker be killed, his house destroyed, his body beheaded, quartered and hung on the gates of the city." The king called on the Jews to return to their homes with full honours.

The Jews proclaimed a "Purim Vincent" to be celebrated on the 20th of Adar. [tinyurl.com/2j9sol]

- Purim Verona – The Jews had moved into their ghetto, and in 1600 they completed building their synagogue. They celebrated a Purim since many felt that the ghetto provided protection, and in an unusual move, the keys of the ghetto were given to the Jewish leaders. [tinyurl.com/2vifqw]

- Purim Hitler – Observed on the 20th of Kislev, 1942, the day the Jews of Casablanca were liberated from the Nazi invaders. The "Hitler megillah" proclaimed: "And the month which was turned for us from sorrow to rejoicing and the making of holiday and the giving of gifts to the poor. Cursed be Hitler, cursed be Mussolini." [tinyurl.com/33hrto]

The Jewish Encyclopedia lists more than two dozen other special Purims [tinyurl.com/2wb87b] with more info at MyJewishLearning.com [tinyurl.com/386yxl] and stories for kids at Chabad. [tinyurl.com/2kdbbe]

As for family Purims, one of the most famous is Purim Povidl (Plum Jam Purim) in 1731. David Brandeis, a Jewish grocer from Bohemia, was imprisoned along with his family for selling some plum jam (povidl) blamed for causing the death of a gentile, An investigation revealed tuberculosis was actually to blame and the Jews were released. Descendants of Brandeis celebrated the 10th of Adar as a family festival. [tinyurl.com/2g7czg]

Rabbi Barry Leff's personal Purim occurred not too far from Haman and Mordechai territory. On Feb. 16, 1979, Rabbi Leff found himself trying to get out of Iran just after the fall of the Shah. "We drove through the deserted streets of Tehran; it was almost eerily quiet... One of the Revolutionary Guards in the lead car was riding on the trunk, on the outside of the car. The car hit a little dip, and his gun went off, shooting out the back window of the car." You can read about the rest of the journey to freedom on the Rabbi Leff Digest. [tinyurl.com/33a34g]

How do you actually commemorate a personal Purim? Rabbi Daniel Yaakov Travis explains that a thanksgiving feast is appropriate and that the day acquires the status of Purim for the survivor and his descendants. This tradition hits home for Rabbi Travis. Years ago, while on the way to buy food in honour of his newborn daughter, he was involved in what appeared to be a fatal car accident. "HaShem had other plans for me and, in an act of infinite kindness, He graciously spared my life. Chai Sivan (the 18th day of Sivan), the day that I was saved, became a personal yom tov for me and my family." [tinyurl.com/2w24al]

YouTube contest has students express their love for Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) is banking on the popularity of YouTube to encourage students to express their emotional connection to Israel.

As part of the Israel@60 campaign to celebrate 60 years since Israel's independence, the CFJS is holding a YouTube contest to have post-secondary students across the country produce videos about their love of and appreciation for the Holy Land.

"Basically, we're looking for anything that expresses a sense of students' attachment to Israel. We're looking for things that are uniquely creative. It could be anything. Some ideas that were floating around were skits or artwork. They can present their artwork on video. They can do a song. Any number of things. It is limited only by imagination," said Dario David Hunter, CFJS' Israel affairs chair and a law student at the University of Windsor.

"A lot of us got together and realized what a great idea this was and decided to put in our two cents on how to shape this idea," Hunter said, adding that he was approached by Yacov Fruchter from National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) with the idea.

He said this contest is exclusive to Canadians and is run by the CFJS, but other Jewish organizations are helping them get the word out and provide incentives.

"There is the American Jewish Committee that is helping us in terms of putting together a part of our prize. There is a prize that involves a trip to Washington, D.C. for their annual meeting, so they've helped us with some of the work and publicity," Hunter said. The grand prize is $1,000 towards a trip to Israel.

To participate, join YouTube or log in to an existing account. After you upload the video, it will be reviewed by Hunter who will then post it on the CFJS channel. To view the videos that have been posted to date, visit www.youtube.com/CFJSIsrael60.

"Our committee is going to select finalists from among the various videos and we're going to put the finalists on the CFJS channel and we're going to have the students vote," he said.

Hunter said the contest will give students the opportunity to express how they feel about Israel and connect with other like-minded students in the process.

"Students can... experience other students' expression of their feelings and spark discussion across the country about our connection to Israel. That is something that is going to be very important and very vital to what we do as an organization."

Michael Khardas, a Jewish student at York University, submitted a video in which he spoke about what the existence of the State of Israel means to him.

"It means that I'll be able to live safely in my homeland. It means peace with my Palestinian brothers. It means security to learn and study and grow. It means pride that we've gone this long, that we've fought for our home and that we've kept it secure and safe. It means peace and hope for our children's future and peace between the religions in the region."

Although the contest is run by a Jewish group, Hunter said it is not limited to Jewish students.

"We felt it was important that people be able to express their attachment to Israel whatever their background is, because we're interested in hearing those viewpoints," he said.

"Someone contacted me about putting together a video to discuss how he feels about Israel as a Vietnamese student because he had heard about the foreign aid that Israel is doing in Vietnam."

University of Windsor student Nguyen Le Quang submitted a video after having read about an Israeli humanitarian organization launched last May to send 54 Israeli doctors and nurses to provide medical treatment, food and clothing to 2,500 people in Vietnam.

"My dreams, my target in the future is to help my own people, as Israeli people have done for my country. The existence of Israel means a lot to me because they help my country and they make the world a better place."

Hunter hopes that the videos will give people a better understanding of the Jewish state.

"Hopefully, things like this will allow people to understand and know what is going on with Israel."

Videos must be submitted by March 28, and Hunter expects to have the students vote in April. For more information about the contest, visit www.cfjs.ca.

Quebec labour federations join in condemning Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) expressed shock that a dozen Quebec labour, non-governmental and community groups have joined with a local pro-Hezbollah organization in condemning Israel.

The coalition was announced March 7, a day after the shooting deaths of eight students at a Jerusalem yeshiva. Some sources have implicated Hezbollah in the terrorist act.

It includes Tadamon (Arabic for solidarity), which is actively campaigning to have Canada remove the Lebanese-based Hezbollah from its list of terror groups, as well as for an economic and academic boycott of Israel. The campus group Solidarity With Palestinian Human Rights is also in the coalition.

"How can representatives of civil society accept to associate with an organization that boasts of putting into question the definition of Hezbollah as a terrorist organization and at the same time claims to work for peace in Palestine?" asked QIC executive director

Luciano Del Negro.

"Hezbollah, like its ally Hamas and their Iranian sponsor, are opposed to any peaceful resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and call for the destruction by force of a United Nations member state, Israel."

Quebec's major labour federations have signed on, including the Confédération des syndicats nationaux (CSN), the Centrale des syndicats du Québec (CSQ), and the Fédération des enseignants et enseignantes du Québec, as well as the Fédération des Travailleurs et Travailleuses du Québec (FTQ), which has not been historically as pro-Arab as the other three.

Others groups involved include the Association québécoise des organismes de coopération internationale, the Confédération des organismes de personnes handicapées du Québec, and the Fédération des femmes du Québec.

The coalition called on the Canadian government to press Israel to stop its military actions in Gaza immediately.

It also launched a public campaign to raise $100,000 to rebuild a clinic in Gaza that's said to have been destroyed in an aerial bombardment.

The coalition said at a press conference that Israel's alleged strike on a major health care centre was the final straw that drew the disparate groups together.

Louis Roy of the CSN said the air strike not only destroyed the building but also an ambulance, medical supplies and equipment for handicapped people.

"For months, more than one million people have been taken hostage by the Israeli government and the uninterrupted operations of its army," said Réjean Parent of the CSQ in a press release.

"The sealing off of the territories is accompanied by daily bombardments and regular military incursions. Each day, civilians, very often children, are killed. This must stop immediately."

René Roy of the FTQ added: "It is imperative that the violence on both sides stops immediately and that human rights are respected."

Kuwaiti column is the exception to Arab media's anti-Israel bile

PA—incites the general public with strident anti-Israel propaganda.

This duplicity, not often exposed in the Canadian media, was the topic of "Parsing words in Israel-Palestinian conflict" by Paul Schneidererit in the Halifax Chronicle Herald on March 11.

Schneidererit wrote that following the March 6 massacre of students at the Mercat Harav Yeshiva in Jerusalem, "Abbas issued a statement condemning the attack.

"On [March 8], however, one of the Palestinian Authority's daily newspapers, Al Hayat Al Jadida, published on its front page a story, with prominent photo, praising the killer, Ala Abu Dhaim. According to Palestinian Media Watch, the article—still available on the paper's website—called the man who shot eight unarmed religious students 'the Shahid,' or holy Islamic martyr."

Schneidererit explained that "[w]hat westerners must understand...[is] that Palestinian newspapers do not publish anything contrary to the wishes of the ruling faction, which in the West Bank is Fatah, headed by Abbas. So it's rather inconceivable that the glowing article on the attacker was not a reflection of the true feelings about the incident by most in the organization."

To be fair, unlike his predecessor Yasser Arafat, Abbas has spoken to his people, in Arabic, about the need for peace with Israel.

Yet the broader issue remains: the Palestinian media maintain a steady stream of anti-Israel invective. It's the same or even worse in the media throughout much of the Arab world. Egypt, which has signed a peace treaty with Israel, perhaps leads the field in anti-Israel and even anti-Semitic rhetoric.

There are exceptions. In "Right to self-defence," in Kuwait's Al-Watan newspaper (March 6), senior columnist Abdullah al-Hadlaq wrote that Israel has a right to defend itself against Hamas' "terrorism."

Al-Hadlaq focused on Iran's extremist agenda in the Middle East, in particular its financial and military support for Islamic extremist groups such as Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in Gaza, as well as its effort to develop nuclear weapons.

Perhaps most surprising, al-Hadlaq concluded that, in the end, despite its small population, "Israel will triumph as usual."

In "Palestinian Twins Under Rocket Fire from Gaza" (Der Spiegel, March 11), Christoph Schult reported on Iman Shafii, a Palestinian woman who gave birth to twins in an Ashkelon hospital, where "she experienced what it is like to be the target of rocket fire from the Gaza Strip."

Schult wrote: "In the past, Shafii saw the Israelis exclusively as perpetrators, but in Ashkelon she is encountering, for the first time, victims of the acts of terror committed by her own people. One of them is nine-year-old Yossi, who is sitting in a wheelchair. A steel frame holds his left shoulder together. It was fractured by shrapnel from a rocket that landed in the city of Sderot. 'The people in Sderot are suffering just as we are in Gaza,' she says."

Schult included quotes from Shafii's husband, who "describes how young, masked men repeatedly set up their rocket launchers under the cover of houses... 'They shoot at Israeli civilians, which is completely unacceptable,' says [Ashraf] Shafii. 'And they put us Palestinian civilians in grave danger, because the Israelis shoot back.'"

"Why doesn't he object? 'They are armed,' says Shafii, 'and they shoot at anyone who gets in their way.'"

Winnipeg rallies to support Sderot

By RHONDA SPIVAK

Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — A community rally in support of the residents of Sderot, who have been bombarded with unceasing Qassam rockets by Hamas terrorists, was held here on March 11 at the Berney Theatre.

Tzafi Weinberg, an Israeli living in Winnipeg who is an art therapist for kids, inier as Jewish and non-Jewish people and that we say that this [the firing of Qassams on Sderot] has to stop and that Israel does have the right to defend itself," she said.

Melnick also noted that "Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East where I as a woman could be a member of a government."

Conservative MP Joy Smith (Kildonan-St. Paul) sent a letter in which she echoed the words of Foreign Minister Maxime Bernier, who recently said: "It is clear that Hamas and other groups responsible for the growing number of rockets fired on Israel are determined to target civilians and create even more instability and misery. These actions are deplorable. Canada calls on those groups to stop immediately for the sake of those suffering both in the Gaza Strip and in Israel."

Liberal MP Anita Neville (Winnipeg South Centre) sent a letter with greetings from Liberal leader Stéphane Dion and the Liberal Party of Canada.

NDP MP Pat Martin (Winnipeg Centre) wrote a letter expressing his solidarity with the residents of Sderot and people of Israel.

"I can't think of any other country in the world that has shown such restraint and discipline in the face of regular acts of military aggression against it, and yet it is often Israel who gets blamed when the conflict escalates and they react in defence of their citizens. Friends of Israel cannot remain silent in the face of such unfairness," he wrote.

NDP MP Judy Wasylycia-Leis (Winnipeg North) sent a message "of courage to the people of Sderot as well as a show of support for the State of Israel and its right to self defence."

The president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, Jonathon Kroft, also addressed the gathering.

"We are here to encourage peace loving people in Gaza to persuade their Hamas government to stop attacking innocent civilians of Sderot," he said, adding that "we will have progress" when the murder of Jews in a yeshiva "isn't celebrated in the streets of Gaza."

A video titled "Children of Sderot Just Want Peace" was shown. Guitarist Cindy Bass sang a number of Hebrew songs throughout the event, ending with Yehiyeh Tov, a song of hope written by Israeli pop star David Broza.

Retired IDF Colonel Yoram East also spoke, saying: "When a rocket flies over the people of Sderot, it's a rocket that flies over us too."

East said a video of the event is being made, and "we are going to send the Mayor of Sderot a report of everything that has happened here."

Participants were also asked to sign a large card of support for Sderot residents that will be sent with the money raised.

Rally organizer Tzafi Weinberg stands in front of a card for Sderot residents.

tiated the idea as a way of helping Sderot's children. "I have been thinking of what the children of Sderot are undergoing, and wanted to find a way of supporting them," Weinberg said.

Weinberg contacted Ron East of Canada Sheli — a Winnipeg group for expatriate Israelis — who, along with other Israelis living here, began to organize the event in conjunction with the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and others.

"This was a real grassroots initiative," East said.

Money raised from the rally will go to the Helping Hands Initiative, which will buy TVs, DVDs, activity kits, video game consoles and cellphones for children in Sderot bomb shelters.

"The equipment will be purchased from Sderot businesses so as to help the local economy," Weinberg said.

Rally participants were asked to wear red. "The siren that goes off in Sderot when there is an incoming rocket attack is called 'tzevah adom' [colour red] and that is why we asked people to wear red," Weinberg said. "The siren initially was called 'shachar adom' [red dawn], but it was changed so children with the name Shachar wouldn't have a negative connotation associated with their name."

Sderot Mayor Eli Moyal spoke to the rally via a recorded video message, and he thanked the community "for everything you are doing for the people of Sderot."

Manitoba's minister of water stewardship, Christine Melnick — who has been to Israel numerous times to develop a Jewish National Fund scholarship program for graduate students from Manitoba pursuing water-related studies in Israel — addressed the gathering on behalf of the provincial NDP government.

Mother fears for kids' safety if deported to Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An Israeli woman with two children is fighting deportation from Canada, claiming that she fears returning to Israel because a rabbinical court there has granted custody of the children to their abusive father.

Last week, one day before she was to be removed from the country, Renata Makias won a temporary stay from a Federal Court judge pending a judicial review of her case.

Judge Sean Harrington wrote that Mrs. Makias and the children "face imminent peril on their return" to Israel because the rabbinical order makes clear the children must be handed over to their father, Yossef Makias, immediately.

While Harrington said it may be correct, as the immigration department argued, that Mrs. Makias could apply to a civil court in Israel for review of the rabbinical decision, "it is strongly arguable that [this] did not take into account the best interests of the children..."

"While no one denies state protection is available in Israel, the status quo there is not the status quo here... It is far better to preserve the Canadian status quo until the matter is fully heard."

He ordered that her case be heard as soon as possible.

Mrs. Makias' lawyer, Mitchell Goldberg, said the stay gives his client about a six-month reprieve. She was being held in a detention centre near Montreal, after being arrested recently, although that was to be reviewed last Friday.

The children, daughter Shany, 13, and son Or, 12, are in hiding, and she is refusing to divulge their whereabouts. The immigration department has warned that she will be deported without them if she loses her appeal for permanent resident status, Goldberg said.

Mrs. Makias pleaded to be allowed to remain in Canada on humanitarian grounds. That was refused by the Federal Court on March 5. Mr. Makias has been living in Israel since 2005, when the family was ordered deported.

The rabbinical court decision is at odds with a Quebec Superior Court judgment granting Mrs. Makias custody of the children and apparently does not take into account the fact that Mr. Makias was charged in British Columbia with uttering threats of death and violence against his family and with breaching a restraining order.

The family came to Montreal five years ago and, for undisclosed reasons, claimed refugee status, which was eventually refused. They moved to Richmond, B.C., where Mrs. Makias' parents and siblings, who are Canadian citizens, live.

Renata Makias wins temporary stay from Federal Court

Mr. Makias was charged with uttering threats to cause death or bodily harm to his wife, but he was released on conditions that included a restraining order that forbade him from having any contact with his wife or their children. He did not respect those conditions and was convicted of breach of the order.

The marriage fell apart and Mrs. Makias and the children moved to Montreal. After her legal resources ran out, she and the children went into hiding.

Harrington seemed to show compassion for her.

"The [Citizenship and Immigration] Minister complains that she is a scofflaw because she will not reveal the whereabouts of her children. If she does, they shall be put into the custody of a man who has threatened to kill them. She has even gone to jail. What mother would not do the same?" he wrote.

She was granted a divorce by Quebec Superior Court in March 2006 and in November of that year, she was given custody of the children. Yossef Makias is appealing the divorce.

Harrington wrote that he finds it "disturbing" that, despite Yossef's record and the decisions of Canadian courts, the Regional Rabbinical Court of Tel Aviv has ordered that the children be handed over to him "immediately and with no further delay," quoting the rabbinical court.

Or, the couple's son, testified that he was afraid to go back to Israel because his father beat him and his sister frequently and "always used to threaten to kill" them. "He would run after me with a hammer in his hands to hit me with it."

The boy also stated that his father "almost killed my mom once by throwing a very heavy cup of glass and he would throw stuff at her like cellphones and plates."

Goldberg said he did not argue that the State of Israel does not take seriously the issue of domestic violence, or that its civil laws do not offer recourse, but he said the fact remains that the kids would have to stay with their father until any civil judicial process was completed.

He did have harsh words for the zeal with which the Canadian government is going after Mrs. Makias.

"I can't believe the resources that are being put in to try to remove a terrified woman who has never been charged with a crime, and, in fact, is a victim. It seems that only those being held under national security certificates are allowed to stay here for years," he said.

Supreme Court won't rehear get case

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Supreme Court of Canada has turned down a request to rehear a case in which it upheld that damages be paid to a woman whose ex-husband denied her a get for 15 years.

Anne-France Goldwater, the lawyer for Jason (Jessel) Marcovitz of Montreal, filed a motion with the high court in January arguing that she should have an opportunity to argue against the constitutionality of a 1990 amendment to the Divorce Act, intended to alleviate the problem of former spouses refusing to grant or receive the traditional Jewish divorce.

Goldwater felt she had the right to reopen the case, although such a request is rarely granted, because the Supreme Court's 7-2 decision, handed down in December in favour of appellant Stephanie Bruker, cited that amendment as part of its reasoning. Goldwater noted that the parties had agreed a few years ago not to introduce the constitutionality of the amendment, section 21.1 of the Divorce Act, into the case.

"No reasons were given [by the Supreme Court not to rehear the case]," said Bruker's lawyer Alan Stein. "It was just dismissed with costs."

The decision means Bruker will finally be paid the $47,500 in damages that the Quebec Superior Court awarded her in 2003, which with interests and costs amounts to about $103,000 today, she said.

However, she expects it will all go to pay legal fees. Bruker, reached in New York where she now lives, said the lesson of her long ordeal in court, which began when she sued Marcovitz in 1989 for damages, is that every Jewish couple should have a prenuptial agreement that makes clear what they will do in the event the marriage fails.

"And it should be written by a lawyer, not a rabbi," she added. "The language has to be correct."

She and Marcovitz did not have a prenuptial agreement, but did draw up a consent to corollary relief in 1980 as part of their divorce proceedings, in which they agreed to appear before a rabbinical court for the purpose of carrying out the get transaction immediately upon completion of the civil breakup.

Leo Baeck director resigns

Prashker, a native of London, England, was recruited in 2004 to run Leo Baeck, Canada's only Reform day school. The school operates two branches, one at Bathurst and Eglinton, the other in Thornhill.

In a biography that he provided to The CJA when he first came to Toronto, Prashker stated, "away from work, I play guitar reasonably, piano very badly and spend a lot of my free time writing and researching for my books, of which there are now about a dozen, mostly novels, but also two scholarly books."

His website, which was taken down last week, contained some of his poetry spanning the period from 1973 to 2003, which pre-dated his arrival at Leo Baeck.

Lawyer Allen Kaufman, whose son attends Leo Baeck, said Prashker's poetry was "sexist and degrading."

He said it's irrelevant that it was penned on Prashker's personal time outside the school. "It shows an appalling lack of good judgement for the head of a school to put these kinds of sexual fantasies on paper and think it's alright to disseminate them on his personal website."

Kaufman added that Prashker held a "very sensitive position."

"If you want to be head of a school, your behaviour has to be above reproach... We hold them to a higher standard because we entrust them with the care of our children," he said.

Prashker did not return a call for comment last week.

Former PQ leader to visit Israel

BY DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former Parti-Québécois leader André Boisclair was among a group of Canadian academic figures who were to leave for Poland and Israel on March 20 to attend conferences in each country on how immigrants can achieve a sense of belonging in their new communities.

Boisclair said in an interview that he welcomed the opportunity to describe for Poles and Israelis how the Quebec model for integrating immigrants has worked so well, despite obvious challenges.

"I think Quebec has shown the way it can be done," he said.

Israel has also shown a keen interest in how immigrants and other minorities adapt, and it seemed a logical place to describe the Quebec model, he added.

Boisclair, who is also a former immigration and cultural communities minister, now teaches strategic communication at Concordia University's school of public affairs. This is his first trip to both countries.

Other participants from Canada include former Quebec Superior Court justice Herbert Marx, president of the Association for Canadian Studies (ACS); York University history professor, Irving Abella; Victor Rabinovitch, head of the Canadian Museum of Civilization; historian Jocelyn Letourneau of Université Laval; Environics Research head and best-selling author Michael A. Ams; and Gerald Gall, an expert on constitutional law and civil liberties who teaches at the University of Alberta and is a regular CJA columnist.

ALS forces Bulletin editor to step down

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The editor of the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin has been forced to step down as he battles Lou Gehrig's Disease.

After being diagnosed in 2006 with the disorder, whose official name is amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or ALS, Barry Fishman continued to work, adapting his hours and working from home as his condition progressed.

Barry Fishman

But his illness — a progressive, usually fatal, neurodegenerative disease caused by the deterioration of nerve cells that control voluntary muscle movement — has reached the point where he is unable to fulfil all of his duties and he has gone on disability. He will become editor emeritus and remain involved with the paper on a volunteer basis, writing articles and columns when he is able to do so.

Mitchell Bellman, CEO of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, which publishes the Bulletin, called Fishman "an incredible editor... He really brought a very human and personal face to the paper... everyone respects him as just one of the nicest people they have ever met and someone who cares deeply about serving the Jewish community and the newspaper."

Fishman, 57, a graduate of Ryerson University's radio and television arts program, had a background in radio, television, public relations and sales prior to joining the Bulletin seven years ago.

The Sault Ste. Marie native said his goal when he became editor was to make the paper a true community institution, open to all its members.

"What I am most proud of is opening the paper to diverse voices in the Jewish community," Fishman said. "I wanted to do stories about Jewish people doing interesting things, both within the Jewish community and outside the Jewish community, and to give a voice to those who may not have been well represented in the paper before."

There have been challenges, he said.

"One of the biggest has been circulation," Fishman said. "It's a constant battle to keep the circulation up. The other big challenge is space. There is a lot going on and we have a limited amount of space for editorial, for financial reasons, so we are not always able to include everything we would like to."

Fishman said a highlight for him has been meeting and writing about many interesting people, including Holocaust survivor and author Elie Wiesel when he spoke at the opening of the annual UJA campaign in 2005.

"I interviewed him, and afterwards he sent me a nice note," Fishman said.

"I also enjoyed participating in two missions to Israel; interviewing many of the wonderful local people who have interesting stories to share; and was always interested in covering our local politicians when they were running for election."

Louise Rachlis, a member of the Bulletin's advisory committee, has known Fishman for a number of years.

"I have long been an admirer of Barry's wonderful attitude," she said. "I've watched him modestly and quietly do what he believes in, whether following a longtime vegetarian diet [which he has been forced to abandon, on doctor's orders] or biking the MS Cycle Tour from Ottawa to Kemptville [Ont.] and back, or working with him as a member of the Bulletin advisory committee where, as editor, he was always open to suggestions, and handled political minefields, with diplomacy."

"While we are all concerned about his illness, he continues to make us comfortable with his usual grace and good spirits."

Fishman remains optimistic as he continues to battle the disease.

"I am not giving up hope and am doing my best by trying to have a positive attitude as I face the challenge of living with ALS. I plan to stay involved as much as I can as a volunteer and will, as editor emeritus, write the occasional column," he said.

"I have been humbled by the outpouring of concern and willingness of the readers of the Bulletin to help in any way they can. People who know me only through my work have phoned to offer their assistance. I feel privileged to be part of such a wonderful caring community."

Uniform standards good for converts, community

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

The new agreement between the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) and the Chief Rabbinate of Israel concerning conversion is a welcome and important development. It is unfortunate that this agreement was overshadowed by a small but vocal group of dissenters.

Guest Voice

I am a member of the committee of the RCA that drafted this agreement. The committee consists of 10 members, including the directors of the conversion programs of the batei din, the Jewish courts, of Chicago, Los Angeles, Washington and the New York area, as well as present and past leadership of the RCA and myself as director at the time of the Toronto Beis Din (a position now occupied by Rabbi Asher Vale).

I would like to outline why I feel the agreement is an important step.

Telling a person who views themselves as Jewish that we have doubts about their Jewish status is tragic and painful. During my 10 years as director of the Toronto beit din, which handled all Orthodox conversions in Toronto, I went through many boxes of tissues in my office. "How many people cried in my office today," I would think to myself. I would dread the meetings when I knew what was going to transpire, and I would often choke back tears myself.

Conversion is a spiritual, emotional, beautiful, personal – and legal – process. The convert goes through a process of spiritual growth, growing into Jewish behaviours and Jewish belief to the point where they are prepared to accept all the mitzvahs of the Torah. This is a deep life transformation. Upon conversion, the new Jew accepts to be a part of the Jewish people and of Jewish history, as well as to accept Jewish belief and to live a life of complete observance of Jewish law.

The reality of the modern world created chaos in the area of conversion. Although the RCA is a national organization, there is no Sanhedrin, no organizing central body of conversions. Over the past 75 years, each rabbi undertook conversions for their congregants. And often, due to the great erosion of observance in North America, it became very difficult for an Orthodox rabbi to require a convert to keep Shabbat when no one in the congregation except the rabbi kept Shabbat.

And so many rabbis felt that they had to stretch the limits of the Halachah in order to preserve some semblance of attachment to Jewish life, hoping that maybe in the future the children of this family will become fine, connected Jews. So in order to save David Goldberg when he came to see the rabbi with his fiancé, Christine, the conversion was done without requiring the full acceptance of the mitzvot. And that is not even mentioning the pressure a rabbi would feel from the president or the big giver when their children were dating non-Jews.

This is the reality of North American Jewry. But it created chaos. Rabbi Cohen doesn't require a convert to keep Shabbat, but Rabbi Levine does. And Rabbi Levine rejects Christine's conversion if it was done by Rabbi Cohen.

The range of standards in any area brings chaos – or at least bruised feelings and feelings of rejection. Doctors who move here to Canada from foreign countries face the same thing – differing standards inevitably bring rejection.

So that is the choice: do you want to perpetuate the freedom of the individual rabbi to set the standards himself, with the inevitable rejection by others, or do you want to ensure that after all that a convert goes through that they will be accepted by all others as Jewish?

The second path was chosen, and as a result, approximately 25 years ago an effort was begun at the RCA to set standards for conversions done by its member rabbis. From the beginning, the standards required that the convert live a fully observant life, including keeping kosher, keeping Shabbat and making blessings over food. In Toronto, the Orthodox rabbis at that time decided to centralize all conversions into one beit din, one body, in order to have one standard for all Orthodox conversions – and save the tissues and the pain of rejection that inevitably comes with differing standards.

However, even with the drive by the RCA to have uniform conversion standards, individual rabbis continued to do conversions according to their own standards. I must add as an aside that even though I have always personally demanded full observance of converts, I do not impugn the sincerity or competence of other rabbis. There is a rationale in trying to reach out and keep as many Jews connected as we can – and some great halachic authorities have taken this view.

However, that is not the view of the greatest authorities of our day, nor has it ever been the view of the majority of authorities. So the rabbis who were more lenient may very well have been sincere, but I feel, as has the RCA for 25 years, that this leniency does not serve the Jewish people well – and it certainly does not serve the new Jews, the converts, well.

And that brings us to today. A few years ago, the RCA reorganized its central beit din, the Beth Din of America. Rabbi Michael Brody, a professor of law at Emory University, created a professional court of the highest order to deal with divorces, monetary disputes and conversions.

Many requests for definitive rulings on conversions done by RCA members came to the Beth Din of America – both from north American rabbis and from the Chief Rabbinate in Israel. The director, Rabbi Yona Reiss, a Yale University law graduate, and others in the beit din began to speak of helping to create a system that would allow conversions to be done and not have to be scrutinized afterward for their acceptability. The guidelines for conversions that had been previously distributed were not being universally followed.

I personally told Rabbi Reiss a number of years ago that I felt the Toronto model of a central beit din that is accepted by all was a model to copy throughout North America. So, when the committee on conversion standards announced its interest in creating such a system, I became a member of the committee.

The new process is now in effect. There are regional batei din in all the major metropolitan areas in North America. People outside those cities who want to convert will work with their local rabbi in consultation with the regional beit din, and when the conversion is done, it will be done at the regional beit din. The standards will be completely transparent, the judges will be well-known rabbis and the documentation will be easily recognizable as part of this system.

I think this is good for the Jews, and especially for the new Jews. This move has been incorrectly identified as a demand by the Chief Rabbinate of Israel. That is simply not true. It has also been called a shift to the right. But these standards have been the standards of record for 25 years – there is no shifting.

It does remove the holy work of performing conversions from local rabbis themselves, but I think co-operation in the system for the greater good is more important than maintaining individual autonomy. And it is not intended to cast aspersions on any previous conversions – these conversions can continue to be accepted based on their merits.

The motivation of this entire process is to help people in the process of conversion. We want to help. We want to be available to people in this journey. Our Orthodox community – the one I am most familiar with – has gained immensely from the wonderful converts in our midst. We are a better community because of their presence. There is no desire to build barriers to welcoming new Jews. This entire process is to help people who want to convert, and for that conversion to bring them peace of mind and acceptance.

Practice and patience pay off

We all have gurus or mentors who dazzle us with their words, thoughts, actions and achievements. For me, one such guru is Robin Sharma, whose books, motivational talks and personal blogs are always inspiring.

A motto that Sharma borrowed from comedian Steve Martin, "Be so good [that] they can't ignore you," is absolutely true. I think it is great advice for kids and adults alike. In his latest book, The Greatness Guide, Book 2: 100 More Insights To Get You To World Class, Sharma writes: "Sometimes discouragement sets in. Happens to all of us. We try hard, stay true to our dreams and pursue our ideals. Yet nothing happens. Or so it seems. But every choice matters. And every step counts."

"Life runs according to its own agenda, not ours. Be patient. Trust. Be like the stonemason, steadily chipping away, day after day. Eventually, a single blow will crack the stone and reveal the diamond. An enthusiastic, dedicated person who is ridiculously good at what they do just cannot be denied."

So when you apply this attitude, whether it's on the hockey rink or football field, in a ballet, yoga or spinning class, at home with your loved ones, at work, at play, in your community and even in the world at large, you can't lose. "Having the courage to present your gifts and your highest capacities will yield magnificent rewards. Life is always fair in the end. Trust it," Sharma says.

So where do we trip up? Well, often we lack patience, and we don't practise hard enough. Piano lessons are a perfect example of this. How many children have stopped playing piano altogether because practising was way too hard, and when children don't practise, it means they don't enjoy it very much. Ironically, what is needed is to practise even more.

We have a wonderful piano teacher, Melanie, who obviously figured this out, and asked our children to practise twice a day. Our son, who is brilliant when he tries but wasn't practising as much as he could, now springs out of bed in the morning to practise the piano and then does it again at night. Our daughter, who was already practising every day, will now sometimes practise four times a day. So what's happening is they are enjoying it even more, because every time they practise, they get better at it, and they know it, and as a result, they love playing the piano.

"The best practice is practice," says Sharma. He talks about how cyclist Lance Armstrong could never have won the Tour de France without his daily disciplined regimen and how basketball player Steve Nash would never give up on his "crushing daily workouts and post-game analyses. How can you get better if you don't practise? Success just doesn't occur. The finest things in life take patience, focus and sacrifice. To get to world class, you need to work at it. Daily. Relentlessly. Passionately."

We do improve dramatically when we work at it. Daily hard work does amount to staggering results over time. So if patience and practice help us achieve brilliant results, how do we stay patient when things are not happening as quickly as we'd hoped?

Well, it helps to look at the big picture and put yourself on the back for the good work you have done and are doing. And be patient not only with yourself, but with others as well.

Also, take heed of what Martin believes, "Be so good [that] they can't ignore you." He achieved success by figuring out what the masters in the field were doing and then doing it even better. He also never let himself lose focus and would work on one project or goal at a time and master it, before moving on to the next challenge. His excellence, determination and single-minded focus separate him from all the rest, making him arguably one of the funniest and most talented performers in the entertainment industry.

What will you do to be so good in your life, work or community, that they can't ignore you?

Food, Scrumptious Food

Hamantaschen – the signature food of Purim

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Arthur Schwartz is passionate about the food he cooks and the food he eats. I met him several years ago at a culinary conference – I overheard him discussing the merits of schmaltz with cookbook author Phyllis Glazer and knew instantly that this man and I were kindred spirits!

I've been waiting for months for a copy of his new book, Arthur Schwartz's Jewish Home Cooking: Yiddish Recipes Revisited (Ten Speed Press) and was thrilled when it arrived just in time for this article.

"Food can connect us to our past. In fact, food is often our very last and only connection to our pasts, enduring long after the old language has been forgotten and other traditions have died," Schwartz writes in the introduction.

Jewish Home Cooking is packed with nearly 100 recipes for appetizers, soups, sides, meat and dairy mains, Passover dishes, breads and desserts, along with the stories behind these dishes and the people who have cooked and eaten them. There are mouth-watering photos of Jewish delicacies to please your palate and your craving for real Jewish home cooking. You'll find soul-stirring, authentic (yet updated) recipes for dishes that connect us to our pasts, including Potato Knishes, Kasha Varnishkes, Carrot Tzimmes, Cholent, Gedempeh Fleish, Karnatzlach, Vegetable Cutlets with Ratner's Vegetarian Brown Gravy, Challah French Toast, Potatonic (Polish Potato Bread), Tzibeleh Kuchen, New York Cheesecake, Passover Pareve Apple Cake and Ingberlach.

You'll also find a wonderful recipe for the signature food of Purim, hamantaschen, with a luscious chocolate filling and with step-by-step colour photos on how to make them. Arthur even suggests that any leftover filling can be baked into brownies – in my book, he deserves brownie points for that terrific tip.

Arthur Schwartz writes: "It is said that Haman, the villain in the biblical story of Esther that is retold every spring and is the basis for the joyous festival of Purim, wore a three-cornered hat, or wore a robe with three-cornered pockets. That's why these Purim treats are made in a triangular shape, either for the hat or the pockets, but more likely the pockets because taschen means pockets in German, the basic language of Yiddish.

"That is mythic folklore, of course. It makes more sense to say that they are called hamantaschen because they were originally filled only with mohn, poppy seeds – hence poppy seed pockets. Coincidentally, mohn-taschen sounds like hamantaschen, so they became hamantaschen. Then again, in the Jewish faith, there is no such thing as coincidence. Everything is by divine providence. It's all beside the point, actually. These are such beloved pastries that they are now made all year long."

The dough for these hamantaschen comes from Carole Walter's award-winning book Great Cookies. Schwartz writes that he couldn't improve on it. Traditional fillings are lekvar (prune paste), mohn (poppy seed), and apricot paste, or you can also use apricot preserves, marmalade, or other jam or preserves. Schwartz offers a delicious chocolate filling. This cookbook is guaranteed to win your heart along with your appetite!

ARTHUR SCHWARTZ'S HAMANTASCHEN

Dough:

- 3 cups bleached all-purpose flour
- 1 cup sugar
- 2 tsp. baking powder
- 1/4 tsp. salt
- 10 tbsp. (1 stick plus 2 tbsp.) cold, unsalted butter or pareve margarine, cut into 1/2-inch cubes
- 2 eggs
- 2 egg yolks
- 1 tsp. vanilla extract

Chocolate Filling:

- 6 oz. semisweet chocolate
- 1/2 cup (1 stick) butter
- 1/4 tsp. salt
- 1 tsp. vanilla extract
- 1 cup sugar
- 2 eggs, lightly beaten
- 1/4 cup bleached all-purpose flour
- 1/4 to 1/2 cup finely chopped walnuts (optional)

- 2 large egg whites, lightly beaten with 2 tsp. sugar for the egg wash

In the bowl of a food processor fitted with the metal blade, place the flour, sugar, baking powder and salt. Pulse several times to combine. Add the butter and pulse several more times, then process for a few seconds to form mealy crumbs.

In a small bowl, beat together the eggs, egg yolks and vanilla. Pour this egg mixture into the food processor and pulse several times to mix it in, then process for about 10 seconds. With a rubber spatula, stir the mixture up from the bottom, then process again until the dough begins to clump together, about another 10 seconds.

Turn onto a lightly floured surface and, with floured hands, press the dough together, divide in half and form into 2 disks. Wrap each disk with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 1 hour, or up to 3 days. (The dough may be frozen for up to 4 months.)

To prepare the filling, melt the chocolate and butter together in a small saucepan over low heat, stirring until perfectly smooth. Add the salt, vanilla, sugar, eggs, flour and walnuts, and stir until well blended.

Any unused portion of the filling can be frozen for up to 4 months, or it can be baked into brownies in a 325-degree oven for about 35 minutes.

If baking all the hamantaschen at once, on two baking sheets, position the racks in the lower and upper thirds of the oven. If making only one sheet at a time, the rack should be in the centre of the oven. Preheat the oven to 350.

Dab the corners of the baking sheets with butter and line them with parchment paper.

If the dough is coming straight from the refrigerator, let it warm slightly at room temperature (for about 20 minutes) so it can be rolled out. On a lightly floured board, roll the dough to a thickness of about 1/8 in. Using a 3-inch-round cookie cutter, cut circles of dough and place them on the prepared sheets.

When all the dough has been cut, place about 2 teaspoons of filling in the centre of each circle. Brush the perimeter of the circle with the egg wash. Using a dough scraper, lift the dough to partially cover the filling, spacing it at one-third intervals like a tri-cornered hat. Brush the tops of the formed cookies with the egg wash.

Bake for 15 to 18 minutes, or until the cookies are golden brown. If baking more than one sheet at a time, to ensure even browning, rotate the sheets top to bottom and front to back toward the end of the baking time.

Remove from the oven and let rest on the baking sheets for two or three minutes. Loosen the cookies with a thin metal spatula and transfer to wire cooling racks.

Store the cookies in an airtight container, layered between strips of wax paper, for up to 5 days. These cookies may be frozen. Makes about 36.

Note: When re-rolling the scraps, do not gather them in your hand. Stack the scraps on a 12-inch-long piece of plastic wrap, bring the four sides to the middle, and using the plastic wrap as an aid, press the pieces of dough together forming a small rectangle. Refrigerate before re-rolling.

Historic joint session of Israeli, German cabinet ministers

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel and Germany upgraded their ties Monday, approving a host of joint projects and agreeing to hold annual government consultations.

During German Chancellor Angela Merkel's three-day visit to mark the 60th anniversary of Israel's creation, she and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert chaired a historic joint session of members of the German and Israeli cabinets, at which both governments signed off on a range of projects, including in education, the environment and defence. The two sides agreed to hold such meetings once a year, alternating as hosts.

The two governments seek to strengthen and intensify their political, cultural, economic and social relations as a partnership of democratic and pluralistic nations, a joint statement said.

Merkel was accompanied by eight German cabinet members. Germany already has similar arrangements with France, Italy, Spain, Poland and Russia. This is the first time Israel has entered into such an agreement.

Germany and Israel formed diplomatic ties in 1965, and Germany is Israel's second biggest trading partner, after the United States.

The session marked the first time cabinets from both countries have met for joint consultations, and the first time the German government held a joint cabinet session with a country outside Europe.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was also due to hold a separate meeting with her German counterpart Frank-Walter Steinmeier. They were expected to focus mainly on the Iranian nuclear threat. Defence Minister Ehud Barak was also scheduled to meet with his German counterpart, Franz Josef Jung.

Olmert, addressing the joint cabinet session, said Israel is interested in talking with Syria, talks he said will lead Damascus to break with the "Axis of Evil."

He also said Israel has no interest in confrontation on its northern border with Lebanon.

As for the south of the country, Olmert said that "the government must do everything in order to defend its citizens, and it will do so."

"At the same time," he added, "it will act to advance the peace process. Negotiations are not a default option for us. We are conducting them because we believe that there is a chance to reach an agreement."

Earlier on Monday, Merkel visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem.

Accompanied by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and eight ministers from each government, she attended a memorial service for the six million Jews killed by the Nazis during World War II.

Signing Yad Vashem's guest book, Merkel pointed to the historic joint Israeli-German cabinet session scheduled for that day, when she wrote: "In recognition of Germany's responsibility for the Shoah, the German government underlines with the first German-Israeli consultations its determination for a joint shaping of the future."

Upon arriving in Tel Aviv Sunday, and Merkel had expressed a similar sentiment, saying Berlin had a "special responsibility" toward Israel.

Olmert, for his part, described Germany, 63 years after the Holocaust, as one of Israel's "strongest allies."

On Tuesday, Merkel was to become the first foreign head of government to speak before the Knesset. In the past, the honour has been reserved only for heads of state and monarchs.

Last week, the Knesset house committee approved Merkel's request to address the Knesset in German, sparking a heated vote that passed seven to two.

The two rightist members of Knesset who voted against the approval, were critical of the decision.

"I cannot stand to hear German in the Knesset," MK Aryeh Eldad said. "My mother and father were murdered in that language."

Merkel said Sunday that this upgrade of ties between Israel and Germany will open a new chapter in the relations between the two countries.

She began her visit Sunday with a trip to the home of Israel's founding father, David Ben-Gurion, in Sde Boker, an Israeli kibbutz in the southern Negev.

Later, Merkel, a former physicist, was to visit the Weizmann Institute, one of Israel's top scientific research facilities.

Shimon Stein, a former Israeli ambassador to Germany, said the upgrade in ties is unique for Israel. For the first time, Israel will sign an agreement that will institutionalize annual meetings at the prime minister-chancellor level, he said.

Germany has emerged as one of Israel's staunchest political allies, and Israel has made use of German mediation in winning freedom for captured soldiers.

However, six decades after the end of World War II, a state visit by a German leader is still an emotional event for the Jewish state. Six million Jews perished in the Nazi Holocaust, and about 250,000 elderly survivors live in Israel.

This is Merkel's second visit to Israel since becoming chancellor in 2005. She is not visiting the Palestinian territories, but her government announced last week that it would sponsor a conference in Berlin in the coming months to help upgrade the Palestinian security forces and justice system.

Palestinian Foreign Minister Riad Malki said Merkel would soon pay a special visit to the West Bank to discuss German support for the Palestinians. Germany is a major donor to the Palestinian Authority, headed by President Mahmoud Abbas.

Meanwhile, U.S. Republican presidential candidate John McCain was also expected to visit Yad Vashem on Tuesday.

French court unfreezes Iranian funds

JTA

PARIS — In a setback for terror victims, a French court lifted a freeze on Iranian state funds.

Victims of Iranian-sponsored attacks in Israel in 1995 and 1997 are suing Iran for compensation.

While the Paris Court of Appeal this week released the $117 million held in the Natexis Banques Populaire, it did not seek interest and court fees from the plaintiffs, their Paris-based attorney Christoph Martin Radtke told the JTA in a telephone interview.

The court told the attorneys to reapply for the Iranian funds once a decision is made on whether funds in the Iranian Central Bank may be confiscated to pay the damages in a U.S. court decision.

Federal judges in Washington ordered Iran to pay damages and interest of $87.5 million to 12 U.S. citizens injured in the two terrorist attacks in Israel. The U.S. courts determined that Iran was liable for the damages due to its sponsorship of Hamas, which orchestrated the attacks.

Radtke said the French court decided to release the Iranian funds because "the law that protects state accounts does not allow an exception for provisional seizure measures."

In January, Radtke in another Paris court sought the enforcement of the U.S. court judgments. He told JTA he hoped for a decision within a few months.

In an e-mail to the JTA, the plaintiffs' U.S.-based attorney, David Strachman of Rhode Island, said they "are really disappointed with the outcome" in the French court.

Bomb scare forces Paris fair's evacuation

JTA

PARIS — A bomb scare forced the evacuation of the Paris Book Fair, which was being held amid boycott calls for honouring Israeli writers.

Attendees on Sunday were asked to leave the Porte de Versailles exhibition complex in southern Paris at 5 p.m. local time, Paris police officials said. They said the situation appeared calm.

French radio reported that other fairs taking place at the complex also had been evacuated.

Israeli President Shimon Peres, under tightened security, had inaugurated the event last Thursday night.

"Those who want to burn books, boycott wisdom, prevent reflection, block liberty [and] condemn themselves to blindness," he said.

Arab nations called for a boycott of the fair, which invited 39 Israeli authors.

In late February, the Islamic Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization asked its 50 member nations not to attend the event. Countries such as Iran, Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia and Saudi Arabia backed the boycott.

Approximately 20 pro-Palestinian protesters stood near one entrance on opening night, but the dispute appeared to push many to express their support for Israel by showing up.

"Even if it doesn't change much, for me it was important to be here tonight and show my real support for Israeli authors," said Jean Rouaud, a French writer and the 1990 winner of the Goncourt literary prize.

The fair, which typically attracts 200,000 visitors, was scheduled to be open to the public through Wednesday.

U.S. Senate denies funds to Durban II

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Senate last week unanimously passed an amendment to the Fiscal Year 2009 Budget Resolution denying financial support for the UN's Durban II anti-racism conference.

The amendment introduced by Senator Norm Coleman prohibits funding for the conference, which is the follow-up to the UN World Conference on Racism held in Durban, South Africa, in 2001, and instead allocates the funds for domestic veterans' services.

The United States and Israel walked out of the first Durban conference over anti-Semitic and anti-Israel activities. Observers fear Israel-bashing will take centre stage at Durban II as well.

"American tax dollars should not be used to support an international platform for hateful, anti-Semitic propaganda under the guise of combating racism," Coleman said.

"Passage of this amendment sends a clear message from the Senate," he added. "We will not dignify this hypocrisy with funding, and we call on the State Department to formally reject U.S. participation in it. The first Durban conference was bad enough — the late Rep. Tom Lantos, a Holocaust survivor and U.S. delegate, was part of the walk-out, calling it the most sickening display of anti-Semitism since the Nazi period. With Libya in the chair and Iran as a vice-chair, Durban II will likely be even worse."

Recently, Coleman and 26 of his Senate colleagues sent a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urging the State Department to shun Durban II. Coleman also passed an amendment to the Fiscal Year 2008 Omnibus Appropriations Bill preventing U.S. funds from being used to support the UN Human Rights Council, which serves as the planning authority for the Durban conference. The amendment was in response to the council's sole focus on demonizing Israel at the expense of reviewing urgent human rights situations throughout the world.

Forty countries joined the United States in voting against funding for Durban II in the UN biannual budget for 2008-09.

SDEROT COMES TO TEL AVIV

Last week, a two-day Sderot fair was held in Tel Aviv, in which Sderot businesses sold their wares. The city of Tel Aviv made a hangar building available to Sderot shopkeepers. The constant bombardment of missiles from Gaza into Sderot has significantly harmed commercial life there. The sign being held up in the middle of the photo expresses thanks to the people of Tel Aviv for their support.

Israeli police arrest rabbi

Israeli police arrested a U.S. born rabbi for inciting Palestinians. Police say Rabbi Arik Ascherman, executive director of Rabbis for Human Rights, has encouraged Palestinians to confront police securing archaeological digs in Silwan, an Arab neighbourhood next to Jerusalem's Old City. They also say the rabbi kept a wounded Jewish setter in the neighbourhood from being evacuated. He denies the charges. He was arrested after refusing a police demand to keep away from the area for 15 days.

Israel Briefs

Israel to boycott Al-Jazeera

Israel plans to boycott the Arab news channel Al-Jazeera. The Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem said it would send notice to the Arab world's most popular satellite news channel that Israeli officials would no longer offer co-operation. Qatar-based Al-Jazeera has Arabic- and English-language broadcasts and a Jerusalem bureau. The Foreign Ministry said its coverage of recent fighting in Gaza has been skewed toward Palestinian propaganda to the point that Israel fears it could perpetuate bloodshed by stirring up Arab ire. Al-Jazeera's Jerusalem bureau chief denied the network is biased.

Rockets resume in Sderot

Terrorists in Gaza fired three Qassam rockets at Israel last Friday as Deputy Defence Minister Matan Vilnai was visiting Sderot in the western Negev. A week-long lull in fighting between Israel and Palestinians in Gaza ended last Thursday as rockets and mortars rained on Sderot and other communities bordering Gaza. Palestinians said the rockets were in response to the March 12 killing of four Islamic Jihad leaders in Bethlehem.

Purim rallies for Israel

A global series of simultaneous pro-Israel rallies are planned for Purim night. The March 20 rallies will be presented live on the Internet by the sponsoring organization, One Family Fund, which supports victims of terror. A site created for the event, www.together4israel.org, will allow the public to participate. Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz and Canadian MP and human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler will begin the event from Sderot with residents of the rocket-plagued town. "The world needs to know that Jews everywhere support Israel's right to defend itself," Dershowitz said. The rally will then move to Jerusalem, where psalms will be read at the Western Wall. At the same time there will be a gathering in London, followed by rallies in New York City at the Kehilat Jeshurun synagogue, in Los Angeles at the Simon Wiesenthal Center and finally in Australia.

Jews flee Paris suburbs for 'ghettos'

By DEVORAH LAUTER

JTA

VILLEPINTE, France — Rabbi David Altabe looks older than his 27 years when he talks about the future of the Jewish community in this working-class suburb of Paris.

Rabbi Altabe leans his elbows on a table set for the Sabbath and sinks his furrowed brow in his palms.

"We do what we can, but it's hard," he says. "I don't know why I stay. I ask myself that question all the time."

Over a period of just three years, roughly half the Jewish families in Villepinte have left. Some have gone to other suburbs or Paris neighbourhoods considered safer for Jews; a few have left the country.

Of 300 families three years ago, only 150 remain today, community president Charly Hannoun estimates.

The reason, he says, is anti-Semitism.

Now Villepinte's 40-year-old synagogue, which was torched in 1991 and 2001, is at risk of closing because there are barely enough regulars for a minyan. Jewish community leaders are wondering if Jews have a future here.

"It's a whole history that's being erased," says Hannoun, who worked with contractors and friends to build the town's synagogue. "It's the end of the synagogue, and I say that with rage in my heart."

Villepinte is one stark example of what is happening to many Jewish communities in the immigrant-heavy suburbs of the Seine-Saint-Denis region, north of Paris.

Scarred by the surge in anti-Semitism that swept through France between 2000 and 2005, roughly two-thirds of the mostly Sephardi Jews who once lived in these close-knit communities have left town.

Sammy Ghazlan, the president of the Seine-Saint-Denis Council of Jewish Communities, says more than 16,000 Jews have moved out of the suburbs since 2001. Left behind are synagogues weighing whether to close and mostly poor, elderly and religious Jewish families.

Experts say the Jewish flight from the suburbs is changing the demographics of France's Jewish community and increasing the ghettoization of Jews in the country.

All of France is experiencing the problem, says University of Paris sociologist Shmuel Trigano, the author of The Future of the Jews in France.

"It is a general shift, not a passing crisis," Trigano says. "The Jewish community is becoming a ghetto. It is no longer a community of choice but a community of necessity. In a democracy that shouldn't happen."

Though increased security has helped reduce anti-Semitic crime in France, bringing the level of anti-Jewish incidents in poorer suburbs down to the levels in Paris, the change has come too late for many suburban Jews fed up with worrying about what might happen.

Rabbi Altabe says he recently had a glass bottle thrown at him from a passing car while walking with his three-year-old child.

"If you hit us over the head enough times, we'll protect ourselves," says Marc Djebali, the president of the Sarcelles Jewish community, north of Paris.

Djebali says the Sarcelles community of 10,000 Jews lost about one-fifth of its population over the last decade.

"We don't attack," he says. "The Jews just take their bags and they go."

Jews from the northern suburbs who are wealthy enough to live in Paris are moving to eastern Paris and its suburbs, where anti-Semitism is minimal and Jewish schools are available.

"By the next generation, there will be practically no more Jews in the northern Paris periphery," says Maurice Robert Fellous, the president of the Jewish community in Noisy-le-Sec, a northern Paris suburb. "In 25 years, we'll have to sell our synagogue."

Since 2000, nearly 40 per cent of Noisy-le-Sec's school-aged Jewish families have pulled their children from area public schools and enrolled them in Jewish institutions, Fellous says.

He attributes the shift to the area's general anti-Jewish environment and specific incidents students have encountered, such as being beaten up and subjected to insults and taunts. Many regularly hear the cry "dirty Jew!"

This shift to Jewish schools is apparent in many places in France, albeit to a lesser degree than in Noisy-le-Sec.

Exact numbers are hard to access because by law, public schools cannot identify or count their Jewish students. Patric Petit-Ohayon, the director of the education department at the Jewish community social welfare umbrella group, the Jewish Unified Social Funds, says Jewish school enrolment in the northern Paris suburbs increased rapidly during the 2000 to 2005 period.

In moving their children to Jewish schools or their families out of the suburbs, many Sephardi families make a direct comparison between this migration and their families' flights from North Africa some 40 years ago.

"They chased us from Algeria and they followed us here," Robert Sebbane, 81, says of the North African Muslims responsible for much of France's anti-Jewish crime.

In 2000, "we were shocked because we didn't think this would happen here," says Sebbane, who lives in the town of Creteil.

Even in Seine-Saint-Denis, which community leaders say is a comparatively safe area, Jewish residents are subject to anti-Semitic taunts and youths regularly spit at synagogues as they walk past.

Some religious Jews in France have warned community members not to display their yarmulkes in public.

In Villepinte, Hannoun says families started departing "very rapidly" in 2004, when "the reality of the situation set in."

"It was horrible," he says. "You couldn't walk out of synagogue. Families couldn't take it."

Despite the drop in anti-Semitic crime, which Hannoun attributes to the declining number of Jews in town, Jews have continued to leave Villepinte.

Hannoun says he is torn between the desire to recruit new Jewish families to the neighbourhood to replace those who have left and discouraging potential community members from coming to a place he fears is not good for Jews.

"Honestly, I don't know if I want them to come," he says, adding, however, that he encourages couples who cannot afford housing elsewhere to settle here.

Though he has the financial means to relocate, Hannoun says he will not move so long as he is needed by Jews in Villepinte.

"After us, there'll be nothing left," Hannoun says. "We can't lower our hands while we still have a role to play. It's like being the captain on a sinking ship."

In 2002, Hannoun's son, Olivier, 40, moved with his family to Miami from France because of anti-Semitism.

Olivier Hannoun says he misses a lot about home, but his three children have become accustomed to life in the United States.

"They can't understand that it can be difficult to be a Jew elsewhere," Hannoun says. "They don't know what that is, which is exactly what I wanted."

JEWISH FEDERATION OF WINNIPEG

If you are skilled in working with teens, well-organized and a builder by nature, this opportunity will appeal to you. We are seeking a director who can develop, implement, and supervise this innovative program within a flexible schedule.

The ideal candidate will enthusiastically embrace this initiative as a landmark development in out community programming and will:

- Have a proven track record as a team builder, able to nurture collaboration and work with a diverse group of sponsors;
- Be at ease equally with teen participants, educators, board members, and host organizations;
- Have experience with camp or recreation programs in a senior position;
- Be familiar with Jewish culture, traditions, and have a strong affinity for the State of Israel;

The challenge: Create a fresh program, with a relaxed atmosphere, providing an educational environment to train Jewish youth in leadership and strengthen Jewish identity.

Theatre artist experiences a spiritual awakening

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

The struggle to find a balance between secular life and religion is one that most Jews are familiar with, and one that Roger Mehl is all too familiar with.

A full-time performer since the age of 16, Mehl, a dancer, singer and actor, is now going to synagogue.

"All my life I have been going through a transformation, an artist trying to re-invent the wheel," says Mehl. "I've always been trying to combine Judaism and art."

While growing up in Toronto, nobody, least of all Mehl himself, would have guessed that Judaism would become such a significant part of his life.

After studying ballet in Belleville Ont., during his high school years, Mehl moved to London, England, where he studied singing, dancing and acting at the internationally renowned London Studio Centre.

One of the centre's rising stars, he moved on to become a cast member in a German production of Andrew Lloyd Weber's Starlight Express, in which he performed on roller skates.

It was during his stint in Germany that Mehl, while practising a new trick, fell and injured his ankle, breaking it in three places.

"There were pins in my legs. I was told [by a doctor] I was never going to walk again," says 31-year-old Mehl.

Mehl, however, decided to prove the doctor wrong and was determined not only to walk again but to continue his dance career, as well.

"I attended dance classes with five-year-olds, just so I could remember how to bend my leg," Mehl says.

His injuries miraculously healed within a mere six months, and Mehl was back at work in London, at the prestigious Theatre Royal York.

Soon, opportunities in theatre, including with productions of Les Misérables and Fame, were within reach. But although Mehl's fire still burned for the stage, his heart yearned for something that had so far been untapped: his relationship with Judaism.

"I had been trying so hard to prove who I was on the stage, but I started to realize that there was more to me than just performing," Mehl says.

Slowly exploring his roots, he began to attend synagogue regularly and had weekly lessons with his rabbi. Eventually, he discovered that there was a whole world outside the bubble of stage life.

Within a year, he was completely enveloped in a new role - that of an observant Jew. He became a regular attendee of various Jewish events, and at one of them, at the Jewish Learning Exchange in London, he met his future wife, Casielle.

They had more in common than a chance meeting. Not only was Casielle from a similar secular background as Mehl, but she was also a dancer from the Greater Toronto Area.

"The connection was instant," he says, smiling. Soon after, Mehl approached his rabbi for advice.

The rabbi counselled him to put the relationship "on the back burner for a year."

Both Mehl and Casielle were new to the process of dating as observant Jews, so hilarity ensued whenever they were together.

Once, attempting a gentlemanly gesture, he asked her to join him under his umbrella during a rainstorm. Casielle took him up on his offer, but nervous that it could be considered yichud - the seclusion of a man and woman, which is prohibited until the couple is married - she took off with his umbrella.

After keeping a distant relationship for a year - on the advice of his rabbi - the two dated for a few months before Mehl proposed. The couple were wed in Israel, where they decided to stay. Soon after, Casielle gave birth to their first child, Chana Ariella.

While living in Jerusalem, Mehl opened R.M. Studios, the first English-language acting school in the country.

When he was teaching, he began to realize that the struggle to balance religious life with the need to perform was also experienced by his students.

"It was such an awakening and empowering experience to be able to help other religious people who struggled with expressing themselves," Mehl says.

One of the students he helped was battling severe depression and having suicidal thoughts. When the class venue and its schedule changed, the student's father said he would pay whatever amount it took to ensure his daughter would remain in the class.

Mehl said that the student is now in a much healthier frame of mind, happily married and going to regular therapy sessions.

In 2006, he returned to the stage, performing a one-person show, The Roll of a Lifetime, on roller skates. The play tells Mehl's story of becoming more religious and his struggle to reconcile a life in theatre with Judaism. It was a success, with Mehl performing to packed houses in Jerusalem.

"They were literally turning people away at the door," he says.

After four years of living in Israel, the couple moved back to Toronto, where their family grew with the recent addition of their one-month-old daughter, Zahava, who was named for Jerusalem.

"Aside from life being extremely expensive in Israel, we felt that it was important for our children to be near their grandparents [in Toronto]," Mehl says.

The Mehls live in the Toronto Beach neighbourhood and are part of the developing Chabad community there.

Now, taking on yet another role, Mehl runs the Canadian office of the publishing house Toby Press. The position was specially created for him.

"The fact that I can leave my work life at the office has completely opened me up as a person and a father," Mehl says. "But I would never have been able to do it without the constant support of my wife."

Mehl, with his oldest daughter, Chana Ariella, enjoys the spring blossoms near their former home in the Catamon borough of Jerusalem.

Mehl's attitude to performing has undergone a radical shift.

"Performing used to be about competition for me. Now it's more out of a desire to give to the world and the audience," he says. "At the moment I feel satisfied performing for my kids, which is something I never, never thought I would say."

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel's new intelligence estimate paints gloomy picture

By LESLIE SUSSER

JTA

Last week's terrorist attack at a Jerusalem yeshiva and the new Israeli national intelligence assessment presented to the cabinet on March 9 underscore the acute security problems Israel faces this year and beyond.

The terrorist shooting spree in the Mercatz Harav yeshiva, which left eight students dead, raised questions about the vulnerability of Jews in western Jerusalem to terrorists emanating from the mostly Arab eastern part of the city. The gunman was from Jabel Mukhaber, a Palestinian village on the southeastern outskirts of the capital.

While the new intelligence assessment downplayed the risk of war in 2008, it painted a gloomy picture of an Iranian-sponsored missile buildup by Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas. It also said Iran is expected to pass the point of no return in creating a nuclear bomb.

As if all this were not enough, Israelis had another, more immediate concern: did the terrorist attack in Jerusalem herald the start of a third Palestinian intifadah?

Internal Security Minister Avi Dichter and the intelligence assessment say no. Dichter says there is no evidence of it, and the assessment says the probability of a widespread, sustained Palestinian uprising in the West Bank is low.

But the report added an important caveat: a new intifadah could erupt if Jewish extremists attack Muslim holy sites on Temple Mount or if new Israel Defence Forces actions in the Gaza Strip cause a high Palestinian death toll.

The fact that the gunman at Mercatz Harav was from eastern Jerusalem has been especially concerning here. There are no barriers or checkpoints to stop Jerusalem's Arabs from crossing into western Jerusalem.

Since Israel officially annexed the eastern portion of Jerusalem in 1968, Arabs from eastern Jerusalem carry Israeli identification cards, making it easier for them than for West Bankers to slip through police or army cordons. That is why Jerusalem often is seen as a soft target for Palestinian terrorism.

On the flip side, the Palestinian standard of living in Jerusalem is higher than in the West Bank. Moreover, as Israeli residents, the Palestinian Arabs in eastern Jerusalem receive Israeli health care and unemployment services. Many are loath to put their relatively comfortable lifestyle at risk with a campaign of terrorism.

Nevertheless, 20 per cent of Jerusalem's 220,000 Palestinians have been involved directly or indirectly in terrorism, according to Israeli police sources.

The special status of Palestinian Arabs from eastern Jerusalem makes measures against would-be terrorists difficult. Dichter says he would deport to the West Bank all Jerusalemites involved in terrorism and their accomplices. But legal experts say that because the Arabs in eastern Jerusalem qualify as Israeli residents, Israeli law does not allow such deportations.

Danny Yatom, a member of the Labor party and former Mossad chief, advocates building a fence between Jerusalem's Jewish and Arab neighbourhoods. But right-wing critics say that would be tantamount to acquiescing to divide Israel's capital.

In the wake of last week's deadly attack, the situation in Jerusalem is even more volatile due to the nature of the target.

Mercatz Harav yeshiva, founded in 1924 by then-Chief Rabbi Avraham Isaac HaCohen

Kook, is religious Zionism's most influential theological seminary. It is one of the prime sources of messianic Jewish settler ideology, which sees Jewish settlement of the West Bank and Gaza as a holy mission.

Its rabbis and students are highly critical of the Olmert government's attempts to negotiate a territorial settlement with the Palestinians, which they believe flies in the face of the divine order.

The alienation of religious Zionists from the government — both because of Olmert's willingness to negotiate with the Palestinians and perceived past government betrayals, including prime minister Ariel Sharon's withdrawal of troops from Gaza in August 2005 — has Israeli police worried about Jewish right-wing violence.

Jewish threats aside, Israeli security's main focus is on the external threats to Israel. They were summed up harshly in the intelligence assessment on Iran.

The Israeli estimate is that without any preventive measures, Iran will be capable of producing a nuclear weapon in late 2009 or early 2010. This, the intelligence agencies agree, constitutes the gravest existential threat Israel faces.

In addressing the threat, the agencies suggest Israel is more or less on its own. They do not expect any U.S. military action against Iran, and they argue that international sanctions are having no effect on the pace of Iran's nuclear program.

The assessment has a wide regional sweep, providing a country-by-country and issue-by-issue accounting of the updated "threat map" as seen by Israel's intelligence agencies.

The main points include:

- Lebanon: the Lebanese government is too tering and a real danger exists that Hezbollah will take over the country. If that were to happen, Israel would find itself facing a significantly enhanced Iranian forward base on its northern border. In any event, Hezbollah is preparing for another missile war against Israel, possibly on two fronts: Lebanon in the north and Gaza in the south.

- Gaza: Hamas is building up its rocket capacity, training personnel in Iran and preparing for a showdown with Israel.

- West Bank: Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas needs to be able to show his constituency achievements on the ground, such as the removal of Israeli checkpoints, if he is to make progress in peace talks with Israel.

- Israeli Arabs: there is a worrying radicalization among Israeli Arabs, evident in demonstrations and stone throwing in response to Israeli military operations against Hamas rocket crews in Gaza.

- Syria: the regime is stable, with President Bashar Assad firmly in control. Assad is focusing on a long-range rocket buildup in an attempt to reach a measure of strategic parity with Israel in the event of peace negotiations between the two countries. He may be ready to break with Iran and the axis of evil in return for a peace deal with Israel that entails the return of the Golan Heights to Syria and massive U.S. economic aid.

The probability of war this year with Syria is low, even though Damascus may still seek revenge for the reported Israeli raid last September on an alleged Syrian nuclear facility.

- Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia: despite ongoing radicalization in the Middle East, there is no threat to the stability of these so-called moderate regimes.

Winnipegger has front row seat to east Jerusalem riots

By RHONDA SPIVAK

Special to the CJN

Haskel Greenfield, a University of Manitoba anthropology professor who is living in east Jerusalem for the year, has found himself in the eye of a storm as violent Arab protests have erupted on his street.

Greenfield is living in residence for the 2007-8 academic year with his wife and young children at the W.F. Albright Institute of Archaeological Research.

The rioting began on March 3 when hundreds of Palestinian teens pelted Israeli cars, police and passersby with stones and rocks on Salah-ed-Din Street in east Jerusalem in the wake of Israeli reprisals in Gaza against Hamas terrorists. Hamas terrorists have been firing Qassam rockets into Sderot and the western Negev, and Grad missiles into Ashkelon.

"The institute is on Salah-ed-Din Street [the main artery in east Jerusalem], which is where the rioting has been occurring. Damascus Gate is right down the street from us," said Greenfield, an anthropologist and archaeologist who is this year's annual professor at the Albright Institute.

"The riots appear to be co-ordinated and are not spontaneous. They are timed to start around 2 o'clock, just when the Arab teens get out of school. That way they can finish school and run to the riots. The shopkeepers down the street seem to know in advance when the riots will take place," said Greenfield, who will be returning to Winnipeg in the summer.

The Greenfield family, as well as another family and two other fellows, are the only Jews living in the residences at the institute.

"We never wear a kippah in the area. It is considered dangerous," he said.

Tina Greenfield, also an archaeologist, says that on March were arrested by an elite unit of undercover Jerusalem police.

Haskel Greenfield

"We got a letter in our mailbox [on March 5] telling us that the American Consulate was warning us that we should be avoiding the area and we should not go near Damascus Gate as there may be more riots," Tina said.

"The day the riots first broke out [on March 3], we didn't know about them. None of the residents here knew anything, although the Arab shopkeepers in the area knew. My girlfriend walked into a shop and the Arab shopkeeper told her to turn around and go right back to the institute, as riots were about to break out," she added.

"We heard some shouting, but that was it," Haskel said.

Although there has never been a terrorist incident at the Albright Institute, the Israeli Ministry of Justice and the Jerusalem district court right across the street from it have

3, "there were two Jerusalem municipal workers who were attacked by east Jerusalem Arabs in rioting right across the street from us. If the municipal workers hadn't been inside their car when they were attacked, they would have been dead."

The car with the two city workers was blocked by burning garbage bins after it was pelted with dozens of stones and rocks by half a dozen teens, one of whom jumped on the vehicle and beat the window with a metal bar. The leaders of the attack were frequently targeted by Arab rioters, especially during the second intifadah.

"The electric gate to the Albright Institute was open the first few hours of the day that the riot broke out. As soon as the director was informed about the riot, the gates were closed. The institute is generally open to the public. The electric gates to the Israeli Ministry of Justice and district court are always closed and monitored," says Tina Greenfield.

Founded in 1900, the Albright Institute in Jerusalem is the oldest American research centre for ancient Near Eastern studies in the Middle East. The entrance to the complex faces Salah-ed-Din Street, and the Greenfields drive their car down the street to get in and out daily.

In the aftermath of the riots and the terror attack at the Mercatz Harav Yeshiva on March 6, Haskel Greenfield said his family will still continue to walk around Salah-ed-Din and the area, although they are cautious not to reveal their Jewish identity.

"[Palestinian terrorists] lash out at whoever happens to be available at the moment, and that is unpredictable and therefore dangerous. People on the street [in east Jerusalem] and shop owners are generally friendly, as long as you don't display a Jewish identity. As Canadians, we are more welcome than as Americans. Our German colleagues are even more welcome."

As for the environment on the Albright campus, Haskel added, "We have made several [Palestinian] acquaintances while here... But, we have only been invited to one home, and this belonged to an Israeli Arab."

He said that when he first arrived, he tried to engage people on the campus in political conversation, but now he doesn't bother, because it's difficult to find "common ground."

David Copperfield uses magic to help the disabled

By BYRON PASCOE and PAUL TELNER
Special to The CJN

In New Jersey, in 1956, Hyman and Rebecca Kotkin welcomed into their world a son they named David.

David became a magician, an illusionist, a performer and a storyteller, and at 18, he started using the stage name "David Copperfield," which he took from the Charles Dickens book.

Copperfield began learning magic at a young age. His grandfather taught him a card trick when he was seven, and at 12, he was the youngest person ever admitted to the Society of American Magicians. He performed magic at his bar mitzvah when he was 13, and at 16, he taught magic at New York University. Soon afterward, he started performing professionally.

"Early on, my folks were hoping for 'my son the doctor,' but realized magic could provide a steady income after my first network TV special on ABC," he said.

Since those early days, Copperfield has performed in so many television specials and live events that The Magic of David Copperfield TV specials have been nominated for more than 30 Emmy Awards. According to Guinness World Records, he's sold more seats than any other solo entertainer.

His most famous illusions include making the Statue of Liberty disappear, levitating over the Grand Canyon, flying, and walking through the Great Wall of China.

David Copperfield

Along with performing on stages worldwide, in 1982, Copperfield created Project Magic, a rehabilitation program that helps disabled people regain lost or damaged dexterity skills by using sleight-of-hand magic as a method of physical therapy.

"Many years ago, I had correspondence with an individual that showed a great amount of self-esteem in his letters," Copperfield recalled.

"Finally, after many months, I met him at a show, and to my surprise, he was handicapped and in a wheelchair. I was a bit taken aback only because he had never mentioned it.

"Then I realized he didn't think of himself as being physically challenged. And that his use of magic at home gave him a great amount of self-esteem. From there, I started Project Magic that is now in thousands of hospitals in over 30 countries around the world," he said.

The program involves magicians who teach magic tricks to therapists. Then, together, they show the participants how to perform the illusions. Copperfield, as often as he can, works with Project Magic participants.

"Magic seems to give patients, from stroke victims to those with physical impairments, a great amount of self-esteem, and it improves manual dexterity. It is a program I am most proud of," he said.

The illusion of which Copperfield is most proud is Flying. "It's a very special illusion of mine. It took me seven years to create, and although not in the current tour, some talk about how it would take them back to their youth, when dreams of flight are most prevalent."

Copperfield said magic is always reaching new people around the world. "It is, after all, the oldest of all the performing arts. It's [been] practised in an unbroken succession from ancient time through the present. Science and technology have often been used by the magician before they came into the marketplace on a mass basis."

He added that before the era of motion pictures, magicians were using images in motion as illusions in their shows. At that time, moving images were so new that audiences perceived them as "magic." Also, before holo-grams became commonplace, magicians would use them to baffle and intrigue audiences.

Copperfield's latest tour includes the illusions Reunion, Squeezebox, The Lottery and Thirteen.

"In Reunion, a member of the audience takes the trip of his or her life for reconciliation with a loved one," Copperfield said.

"While standing on a crane arm with me, suspended over the heads of the audience, the person vanishes, only to reappear moments later in the freely selected location of their dreams."

With Squeezebox, the audience gets to see Copperfield squeezed into a size that could fit into a shoebox.

"In a mesmerizing illusion I call The Lottery, inspired by my grandfather's unfilled dream, I share a secret technique for predicting the winning numbers of The Lottery," he said.

"Also, in an 'unplugged' moment of pure sleight-of-hand, I do some close-up magic with a lethal black African scorpion.

"One of the most interactive moments of the show is Thirteen, where 13 audience members chosen entirely at random vanish, leaving friends and family wondering whether to applaud or put their loved ones' faces on milk cartons," he added.

Judaism has played and continues to play a special part in his life. "I spent my entire childhood going to Hebrew school after regular school every day. I was force-fed by faith," he recalled.

"In retrospect, I'm very glad that my parents had me do it. I'm profoundly appreciative to know where I came from and what my ancestors went through. I learned life lessons that have served me well."

Copperfield's current tour includes Canadian performances of David Copperfield: An Intimate Evening of Grand Illusion, in Toronto from March 28 to 30 at the Sony Centre for the Performing Arts (www.sonycentre.ca).

Beth Tzedec is alive with the Sound of Purim!

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

As in past years, roughly 100 people between the ages of five and 80 are involved, either in front of the footlights or behind the scenes, in an upcoming Purim musical extravaganza at Beth Tzedec Congregation whipped together by the cantor, Simon Spiro and his wife Aliza, both former music professionals with experience in the top echelons of the pop music business.

This year's show, The Sound of Purim!, is described as "an utterly ridiculous musical romp through the Megillah, with Haman, Mordechai and some Austrian nuns." It is based on the famous musical The Sound of Music, with all-new orchestrations written by Simon and fresh comic lyrics by Aliza. The story mingles the familiar story from the Megillah of Esther with Rodgers & Hammerstein's exhilarating tale of the Austrian Alps popularized on movie and stage.

The Beth Tzedec production features a top-notch Broadway-quality orchestra as well as elaborate costumes and sets that would look handsome on any professional stage in the city. "Everything about this show is state-of-the-art professional all the way - except the actors on stage," Aliza said.

However, through rigorous rehearsals and some wonderful sort of osmosis by which they soak in the professionalism and enthusiasm around them, the 60 cast members will likely turn in the performances of their lives, she said.

The Sound of Purim, "an utterly ridiculous musical romp with Haman, Mordechai and some Austrian nuns."

"How do we get them to do it? I don't know. Even at rehearsals, it's a little bit shaky. But they click into gear when it really happens. They hear the orchestra and they see that it's not just an amateur production, that it's a real extravaganza, the real thing, and they just rise to the occasion. The energy level is very high."

The Spiros began planning this year's production soon after the curtain came down on last year's show, Once Upon A Purim: A Megillah Fairy Tale, which sold out both of its performances. They started writing the new show in the summer, advertised for a cast and crew at Rosh Hashanah, and held auditions in December.

One former congregational president who was in last year's show, told Aliza that he began counting the days to this year's show as soon as he stepped off the stage. "All summer long, people have been telling me 'I just can't wait' and asking what the theme was going to be." One costumer, who was hit by a car, is now sewing costumes in a hospital room and "just keeps talking about the Purim show," Aliza said.

Doctors, lawyers and other important professionals, even the shul's rabbis and rebbetzins, are among the eager throng rehearsing their parts. "You have these guys who are great strong litigators in the courtroom, and they get up there on stage and they're like deer in the headlights," Aliza said, laughing. "It's so funny because they're out of their comfort zones. But they rise to the occasion."

It's been as busy as a beehive around the synagogue in recent weeks as the sizeable army of volunteers pitch in on an assortment of jobs. "The painter lets the little kids paint the sets. There's a lot of overlap. Nobody is just doing one thing. Everybody sort of volunteers and does many different things."

The cast contains seven married couples and three entire families, as well as the so-called "Shut Your Von-Trapp" singers, a troupe of professional voices brought in "to help round out the sound." The Spiros' professionalism would demand no less. Simon Spiro is a former backup singer and composer who worked with Elton John, Phil Collins and other pop celebrities in England, and Aliza had her own brush with celebrity when one of her songs climbed high onto the pop charts in the United States.

The Sound of Purim! is slated to run for three performances - on Thursday March 20 after the Megillah reading, Saturday March 22 at 9 p.m., and Sunday March 23 at 3 p.m. Tickets at the door are $10 for adults, $5 for children 13 and under. Beth Tzedec is at 1700 Bathurst Street at Avenal, several blocks below Eglinton. The ticket phone line is 416-781-3514. As a press release advises, "If you think this is just another synagogue event, you're reading the wrong Megillah!"

Eye on Arts

LEONARD COHEN TO OPEN WORLD TOUR HERE IN JUNE

Shortly after his induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame last week, Montreal-based troubador-poet Leonard Cohen announced he will soon embark on a world tour and his first live performances in 15 years, beginning with concerts in Toronto's Sony Centre on June 6 and 7. He is then scheduled to play Europe for the remainder of June, July, August and early September.

Cohen is "one of the most important and influential songwriters of our time, a figure whose body of work achieves greater mystery and depth as time goes on," said pop star Lou Reed at the induction ceremony in New York, where Cohen was honoured along with Madonna, John Mellencamp, The Dave Clark Five and The Ventures.

The extraordinarily talented singer-songwriter has released many bestselling albums, beginning with Songs Of Leonard Cohen in 1967, and his songs have been recorded by many artists, from Judy Collins to k.d. lang.

Several years ago, he emerged from a Buddhist retreat to discover that an entrusted financial manager had allegedly defrauded him of his retirement nest-egg of $5 million. Consequently, he has been forced back to work: hence this world tour, which, to judge by his immense popularity, will no doubt be sold out. Tickets went on sale March 15.

Benefit for Women in Domestic Crisis: Koleinu ("our voice" in Hebrew) is a show put together by women for women, in order to raise funds and bring awareness of the problem of domestic abuse in the Jewish community. It features a variety of dance, song and script by professional Jewish women performers, as well as a raffle with prizes, vendor booths with women artisans, and kosher specialty foods for sale at intermission.

"The whole idea behind this show is to be a voice for those who are in need, to reach out to the women in our community and let them know there are people who care and want to make a difference in their lives, even if they don't know them personally," said Rivka Lomiansky, one of the organizers.

All money raised goes towards Jewish Family and Child programs for abused women.

Tickets start at $25; platinum seating and tax-deductible prices available. Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. Monday, March 31, 7:30 p.m. 416-636-5984, ext. 231. <http://koleinu.eventbrite.com>

Life in a Jar: From humble and unlikely beginnings, a play chronicling the deeds of Polish Holocaust heroine Irena Sendler has become a sensation, taking her from obscurity to international renown. Sendler rescued 2,500 Polish Jewish children during the Holocaust, writing their identities on scraps of paper buried in glass jars, with the hope of reuniting them with their parents after the war, or at least preserving their true identities.

She risked her life and underwent torture by the Gestapo for her brave work. Her story was unknown until 1999, when four teenaged girls in Kansas stumbled across it in their search for a high school history project. The play Life in a Jar is scheduled for performance at the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal JCC, Thursday, March 27, 7:30 p.m. It is a joint presentation of the Miles Nadal JCC and the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada. Tickets are $15 for adults, $10 for students. 416-924-6211, ext. 606.

Names in the News: Toronto-based pianist Anton Kuerti was a last-minute substitute for an ailing pianist last week in Boston, where his son, Julian Kuerti, is assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Julian called his father about 6 p.m. to ask him to replace the scheduled pianist, who had taken ill. Anton, who was already in Boston to attend the concerts, stepped in at the last minute to play Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 and Beethoven's Emperor Concerto, which he had last played in Toronto several months ago.

The duo had time only to talk through how they would perform the piece, and the father spent about an hour practising backstage at Symphony Hall. He received a prolonged standing ovation for his performance. The next day, he learned he had won the Governor General's Lifetime Artistic Achievement Award. He is to receive the prize, worth $25,000, in a Rideau Hall ceremony on May 2.

Kuerti performs an all-Beethoven program in the last of this season's Mooredale Concerts at Willowdale United Church, 349 Kenneth Ave., April 12, 8 p.m., and again at Walter Hall, Edward Johnson Bldg., 80 Queen's Park Cres., April 13, 3 p.m. $25-$20. 416-587-9411. www.mooredaleconcerts.com

More Names in the News

• Hamilton-born actor Eugene Levy, famed for his involvement with the comedy show SCTV, has also won a $25,000 Governor General's Lifetime Achievement Award. "I firmly believe my best work is still ahead of me so I'm not sure what this means," the 62-year-old comedian told the Canadian Press upon hearing the news, but quickly added that it was "quite an honour."

• Toronto author-illustrator Richard Ungar recently won the 2007 National Jewish Book Award for Illustrated Children's Books for his book Even Higher. A lawyer who paints and writes in his leisure time, Ungar attended the ceremony two weeks ago at the Center for Jewish History in New York City. Even Higher, his beautifully illustrated fourth picture book, retells a classic Jewish folktale by I.L. Peretz.

• Canadian artists Evan Tapper, Melissa Shiff and DJ Socalled have been invited to participate in a two-week art residency and show at the Jewish Museum in New York City. The open studio project features 11 artists in fashion, music, performance art and video, and runs March 16 to 27.

At the Galleries

• The latest Museum Adventure offered by 55+ Forward For Seniors is a guided tour of a new exhibit at the Gardiner Museum of Ceramic Art, Wednesday, April 2, 1:45 p.m. Cost $9. RSVP by March 31 to Phyllis Fien, phyllisf@mnjcc.org or 416-924 6211, ext. 155.

• More than a dozen leading Israeli visual artists were in Toronto earlier this month to exhibit their latest paintings, prints, sculptures and mixed-media works. The gala opening of the show last week was attended by Amir Gissin, the consul general of Israel, and raised funds for Hebrew University. The art remains on view at Gallery 133, 1260 Castlefield Ave., until March 26. 416-504-6099.

Leonard Cohen

Boy comes of age amidst upheaval and soccer glory

Germano Haiut as Shlomo, left, and Michel Joelsas as Mauro in The Year My Parents Went on Vacation.

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Brazil in 1970 was a tense place. The population was on edge as the country's soccer team prepared to capture the World Cup for an unprecedented third time. And politically, the military junta was striking hard against left-wing dissidents.

Against this backdrop, 12-year-old Mauro, the son of atheist parents – a Jewish father and Christian mother – is taken by them to stay with his grandfather in a Jewish suburb of Sao Paulo, while they go off on "vacation."

We are never told exactly where they are going, but by their anxious looks, we get the impression they are going into hiding somewhere. Mauro's father promises him they'll be back in time for the World Cup.

And so begins The Year My Parents Went on Vacation, a coming-of-age film by Brazilian director Cao Hamburger.

Mauro is dropped off outside his grandfather's apartment building, unaware that his grandfather has just unexpectedly died. The boy is instead taken in by the Yiddish-speaking neighbour, Shlomo, who is told by his rabbi that if "God left the boy at your door, He knows what He is doing."

The relationship between the two gets off to a poor start, especially when Shlomo catches Mauro playing soccer wearing Shlomo's prayer shawl. Mauro is out of his element in this strange Jewish environment.

Throughout the movie, there's mystery surrounding the whereabouts of Mauro's parents. People around him talk in whispers in the background and we never get the full picture. It's only the appearance of a radical campus friend of Mauro's father that gives us an inkling of his parents' situation.

We are never told where his parents are, what they are doing or what's become of them.

But this, you realize, is intentional. We are seeing this movie through the eyes of Mauro, and as far as he is concerned, his parents are just on vacation. All he's interested in is following Brazil's progress in the World Cup.

There's a sense of anxiety when the World Cup begins. As Brazil wins its opening game, Mauro anxiously stares out the window searching for his parents' blue Volkswagen.

The anxiety intensifies as Brazil's classic lineup, featuring Pele's last international appearances, progresses through to the final against Italy, and still Mauro's parents haven't returned.

There are some sentimental moments in this film like when Mauro spots a blue Volkswagen and chases it up the street in the hope that it's his parents. Michel Joelsas' performance as the 12-year-old is good, and the movie is worth watching, if only to see a group of bearded, religious men cheer loudly when Pele scores a goal.

The Year My Parents Went on Vacation opened the 2007 Toronto Jewish Film Festival. It is opening in Toronto at select theatres on March 28.

In Portuguese and Yiddish with subtitles.

Asper empire raises questions about concentration of media ownership

By SHELTON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel Harold (Izzy) Asper, the founder of the CanWest Global Communications Corporation, was a Canadian media titan until his untimely death in 2003.

From his headquarters in Winnipeg, Asper – a former tax lawyer and leader of Manitoba's Liberal party – presided over an empire of television stations and daily newspapers, including the National Post.

When he acquired the Southam chain from Conrad Black, the now disgraced and imprisoned newspaper magnate, Asper transformed himself into the owner of Canada's largest news media company.

A person of such calibre is worthy of a top-notch biography, and one will doubtless be written sooner than later. But for now, readers will have to be content with Marc Edge's Asper Nation: Canada's Most Dangerous Media Company (New Star Books).

Edge, a reporter and editor who has worked for the Vancouver Province and the Calgary Herald and currently teaches communications at Sam Houston University in Texas, has produced "a critical corporate media history" rather than a conventional biography.

Based almost entirely on secondary sources, with little original research, as he himself points out in a disclaimer in the preface, Asper Nation is a polemic, and should be read in that spirit.

Writing as a "disillusioned former journalist" fed up with the concentration of media ownership in this country, Edge observes, "This book is less an indictment of Izzy Asper and his heirs than of a system that allowed them to gain control over so much of Canada's news media and use it to promote an ideological agenda."

And what might this agenda be?

Asper, who promoted a laissez-faire economy and advocated the elimination of the welfare state, believed that market forces rather than government intervention should determine economic policy. And as a dyed-in-the-wool Zionist, he was ardently pro-Israel.

It's unclear where Edge stands on these issues, but what is crystal clear is that he objects to a situation whereby an individual, be it an Asper or a Black, can "dominate the debate on these or any other issues of importance."

It is not a trivial observation. When the publisher of the Asper-owned Montreal Gazette, Michael Goldbloom, resigned in the summer of 2001, he told the New York Times: "There is no question in my mind that the Aspers feel they own the newspapers and the newspapers should reflect their views."

Asper, a secular Jew, went to great lengths to assure that his newspapers would be fair to Israel. But sometimes, he went too far, Edge claims.

Quoting a story in the Globe and Mail, he says that senior editors at the Gazette were told to run a strongly worded pro-Israel editorial in the wake of a suicide bombing in Jerusalem that killed 15 civilians. The editorial urged the Canadian government to support Israel "without the usual hand-wringing criticism about 'excessive force' if Israel chose to respond to the terrorist attack."

Citing another example of the Aspers' tendency to impose their opinions on their domain, Edge mentions the Doug Cuthand affair.

In a controversial piece, Cuthand, a native columnist for the Regina Leader-Post and the Saskatoon StarPhoenix, compared the plight of Canada's first nations with that of the Palestinians. "I see them as the Indians of the Middle East," Cuthand wrote. Dissatisfied with the analogy, the Aspers spiked his column.

According to Edge, the Aspers' intolerance of dissenting views cuts across the board.

Peter Worthington, the former editor of the Toronto Sun and a CanWest columnist, also ran afoul of the Aspers when he wrote, "The Aspers just don't seem to get it. Rather than having all Southam papers straitjacketed into one unanimous, identical view on national affairs, wouldn't it be more effective if the papers could espouse a similar view differently?"

Edge, in this vein, cites further examples of how the Aspers have attempted to shape coverage.

This critique notwithstanding, he is not personally antagonistic to Asper, describing him as "a fountain of energy" who could be "ruthless in business and relentless in court, yet charming socially and generous to a fault in his devotion to philanthropy."

Without delving into Asper's life too deeply, Edge offers tantalizing biographical tidbits that a future biographer will certainly flesh out.

Born in 1932 in Minnedosa, Man., a town of 2,000 200 kilometres west of Winnipeg, he was the son of a Ukrainian Jewish violinist, Leon Ausereper, who fled Odessa in the early 1920s. To earn a livelihood, he turned to business, becoming the proprietor of a movie house chain.

At the University of Manitoba, Asper was a star debater and a columnist on the student newspaper. In 1957, having graduated with a master's degree in law, he began writing a column on taxes for the Winnipeg Free Press.

Delving into his short-lived stint as a Liberal politician on the provincial scene, Edge says he staked out fiscal positions well to the right of most Liberals and even many Conservatives.

In the only election he ever contested, in 1973, Asper fared poorly. Though he won a seat in the legislature, he resigned two years later and declared himself a "free agent."

Edge claims that the connections he made while leader helped him wield influence in the national Liberal party and to forge close relations with such figures as Jean Chretien and Paul Martin.

Edge spends far more time on his career as a successful businessman. As he observes, business enabled Asper to combine his legal and tax expertise with his knowledge of government.

He and a partner, Paul Morton, established an independent TV station in Winnipeg in the mid-1970s and then acquired a Toronto property, Global Television Network.

They expanded westward before moving eastward to Ontario and the Maritimes and abroad to New Zealand, Australia and Chile.

A Revisionist Zionist who admired Vladimir Jabotinsky and whose views coincided with the Likud party, Asper claimed that Israel was treated unfairly by the media, particularly by the Canadian Broadcast Corporation.

He called for the formation of "honest reporting response groups," and made sure that his newspapers did not reflect an anti-Israel bias.

Edge notes that his children, David, Leonard and Gail, all trained lawyers, support his causes and are pro-Israel. When it comes to Israel, Leonard Asper, his successor as CanWest's chief executive officer, is a chip off the old block.

In only one respect have the Aspers veered away from the old man's mantra.

Instead of backing the Liberals, they openly supported the rejuvenated Conservatives under the leadership of Stephen Harper.

Young athlete believes she was born to be a gymnast

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Sabrina Barsky is totally devoted to her sport, gymnastics, and as she tells her story, it's almost as if the feeling is mutual, if not zen-like.

"I just love gymnastics," she said prior to one of her workouts at Vaughan Gymnastics. "I was probably born to do it."

"Every time I do some gymnastics, I feel I connect with the equipment and I feel I accomplish a lot."

Accomplish a lot she has, as the 12-year-old recently returned from Le Gymnix Classique, an invitational competition in Montreal, where she won four gold medals and one silver. Crowned the overall champion in the provincial 3 division in her age group, Barsky was first in vault, balance beam and floor exercise, and the silver medalist on the uneven bars. The three golds and one silver earned her yet another gold as overall champion.

Just a couple of weeks earlier, she emerged as top athlete in her category at the Women's Artistic Provincial Qualifier in Guelph. She finished first on the vault, balance beam, and floor exercise, giving her the overall gold.

In Ontario, she competes in the Level 7 category for 12 and 13-year-olds; in Quebec it's Level 3.

Ontario and Quebec use different numeric systems for the same level of competition. In Ontario, the provincial competition structure consists of levels 5 through 9, with level 9 reserved for the best athletes. Beyond level 9 are the elite, nationally ranked gymnasts.

Her burning desire to succeed already has her eyeing a move up to level 8 later this year, something her coach, Karren Lee, believes is likely to occur.

"She has the skills," Lee said last week. "She's flexible. She has fantastic poise and grace. Her overall body strength is fantastic, and [she possesses] the psychological component. She's driven and dedicated."

Put it all together and you have a very good gymnast. Had Barsky started her sport a little earlier, she'd be even more advanced, Lee believes.

Barsky came to the sport late, at age 10. Most girls begin competing at around age seven and the good ones are participating in provincial events by age nine, Lee explained.

Still, Barsky has made tremendous progress in a short time, and Lee sees Barsky beginning to master the skills necessary to move up to the next level.

That would require her to add multiple twists in her floor routine and a more complex dismount from the vault. In addition, Barsky must add more complicated swings on the uneven parallel bars.

Lee has seen a lot of young athletes come and go, but in Barsky she sees something only a few possess.

"You need the physical attributes," Lee explained.

But what's even more important is the athlete's desire to excel. "I see a lot of girls who have the physical attributes, but are not driven. Sabrina never balks at challenges. She loves them."

Getting to her level of achievement has required some sacrifice. Four times a week, she heads to the gym after school for a four-hour workout. Then it's home to work on school assignments, which given the course load at Leo Baeck Day School, usually takes her 2½ to three hours a night to complete. That keeps her up to about 10:30, when it's off to bed.

Barsky acknowledges she has given up a lot to focus on gymnastics. "Sometimes I have to sacrifice parties, bar and bat mitzvahs," she said. "It comes down to what matters the most."

Right now, the Elite Ontario provincials in late April are on the immediate radar, and longer term, Barsky is expecting to make the Canadian team for the 2009 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

After that, her ultimate goal is the Olympics.

Heady stuff for any young athlete, but as Barsky said, "I believe in myself. I have confidence."

Silent but for the memories

The boxes are unpacked and the mirror is finally hanging on the wall. The closet is organized according to season, and the library is alphabetized according to genre.

Two months after moving into my new place, everything is once again just so.

So why has the relative calm been driving me so crazy?

When there's nothing left to do, all that's left is this deafening silence.

I try to drown it out with loud music, with laughing friends or with mind-numbing episodes of Gilgricious (who am I kidding – I love that show!), but even above all the noise, the silence is still there, a constant ringing in my ears.

For the first time, I am truly alone. There's no girlfriend living in the upstairs apartment to giggle with, and no boyfriend waiting to cuddle with me on the couch.

It's me, myself and I, and I've never been more aware of it.

Sometimes, I turn off and tune out all the distractions and sit and listen to the silence, and I am amazed by it. It brings me such peace and such angst – at the same time, in the same moment.

I find peace in knowing that each moment is my own. I find peace in being far away from everyone I know. This isn't Thornhill, where I'm sure to run into someone familiar wherever I go. There's a certain peace about being anonymous and blending into a downtown crowd, where everyone else is anonymous, too.

In those moments, I am in love with the silence.

But silence can also be a nagging bitch sometimes.

It's a constant reminder of everything that has changed in the past year. At this time last year, I was a typical twentysomething – madly in love, working like mad, and mad at life for not having more hours in the day.

My boyfriend and I were living downtown together, going to work together, enjoying silent moments together. Now, these experiences are only my own, and the silence makes me sad about it.

I'm sure that for a lot of people who have gone through a major change, whether it be the death of a loved one, a breakup, a different job or a new city – anything that has forced a new life out of an old one – it's not the loneliness that makes them dread the silence. It's the memories.

Memories allow you to keep living out the past, but silence forces you to deal with the future.

Listening to the silence and not filling it up with distractions has been the first step for me in dealing with this new future of mine. It's been hard and sad, but there are moments, like I said earlier, when I have found the peace that I've been looking for.

I often wonder whether it wouldn't be easier just to keep filling that silence with distractions until the silence became meaningless once again. I'm sure it would be, but I'm much more interested in making peace with it, rather than spending the next few years of my life fighting it.

I have found nothing more peaceful this winter than walking around in snowstorms. It's Mother Nature's way of telling me that life can kick our butt, but somehow we always manage to get through it.

I have also found peace by just sitting outside on a sunny day and watching people walk by.

Being anonymous in a bustling city reminds me that life keeps moving and we are part of that, whether we feel like we are or not.

Because no matter how loud the silence is at home, the quiet noise of life is always louder once you step outside, into it.

Sandie Benitah

About Life

we have the added bonus of the first seder being after Shabbat. It doesn't get any harder than this.

I'm panicked and wondering how I'm going to get through it. Any suggestions that will help me keep my sanity would be appreciated.

Creative Cooking

Dear Creative Cooking

I too have heard lots of stirring about the first seder coming after Shabbat this year. It will be a challenge for many, but you have started thinking about it well in advance, and with good organization and a lot of advanced preparation, you will get through this one, too.

Now, as for the interesting menu you have to plan, the first thing you need to do is get in touch with these people and find out if they have any suggestions. They are used to cooking for themselves, and they may have some helpful hints to get you through this. I don't know if you are comfortable with anyone bringing food into your home on Passover, but if you are, you can ask for them to contribute a dish or two.

Use a cookbook that gives nutritional information with each recipe. There is one called Enlightened Kosher Cooking, by Nechama Cohen, that includes 140 Passover recipes. The author is an observant diabetic. As for the nut allergy, this is the most serious restriction. We have all read how dangerous a nut allergy can be, so I really think you need to get the mother of the allergic child involved in the child's menu. The vegetarian problem requires only a bit of creativity. Even meat eaters enjoy vegetarian dishes.

There's no question that you have a lot on your plate this year, but don't be shy about getting others involved. With planning and organization, you will have a wonderful seder that you will be proud of and all will enjoy.

Dear Ella,

Passover is just around the corner, and it's my turn to make the seder. The problem is that this year, I have some new challenges to deal with.

It's hard enough to come up with Passover recipes that everyone likes, but this year I'm cooking with limitations: my mother has developed diabetes, my brother is dating a woman who has a child with a nut allergy, and my niece has become a vegetarian. Passover has always been a challenge for me, and this year

Yeshiva bochrim – those who attended a Jewish institute for Torah and Talmud study – have a certain affinity for one another.

Regardless of whether we continue to subscribe to the ways, laws and culture of the yeshiva world, a brotherhood exists among those who, with great verve, spent countless hours together studying Torah within the walls of a yeshiva.

It's for this reason that yeshiva bochrim around the world are no doubt deeply and uniquely affected by the recent terrorist attack on Mercat HaRav and the murder of Doron Mehereta, Ro'i Rote, Yonadav Haim Hirschfeld, Yochai Lipshitz, Yonatan Yitzchak Eldar, Neriah Cohen, Pnuel Avichayil and Avraham David Moses – may they rest in peace.

It has been in vogue for many years for yeshiva bochrim from all over the world to attend a yeshiva in Israel for a one-year period or longer. In 1978, I studied at Yeshivat Beth

The brotherhood of yeshiva bochrim

HaTalmud in Jerusalem with a number of friends from my high school days at Ner Israel Yeshiva in Toronto. I recall that there were some bochrim from Toronto who chose to learn at Mercat HaRav.

Studying in a yeshiva is unique. One wakes up early in the morning, often at 6 a.m., to learn alone or with a chevratutah (a friend in learning) prior to Shacharit services. Throughout the day, and well into the wee hours of the night, the beit hamidrash (main area for learning) is busy with students learning, debating or celebrating (a holiday or Shabbat), as the bochrim in Mercat HaRav were doing when the terrorist chose to attack them.

One learns at a very young age – as Pnuel Avichayil, 15, must have – to mix it up with the authors of the Mishnah and Talmud on such issues as damages and the laws of Shabbat.

The day is long and intense.

If I were to ask any guy who attended yeshiva about his most vivid memories of their time there, he might say he remembers the beit hamidrash and the male camaraderie that's unique to the yeshiva world, in which males of all ages study, socialize and share celebrations and grief.

The person might then lower his eyes and with sadness in his voice say, "We who were once, or still are, yeshiva bochrim, ache inside at the thought of a chevratutah falling to the floor, spattered with blood, while clinging to a sefer [a holy book of learning]. We find it difficult, if not impossible, to imagine the funeral where our young friends in Torah study were laid to rest, sleeping forever, next to a Torah scroll."

For those of us who lived and breathed Torah study within the walls of a yeshiva, the deaths of eight bochrim, and the injuries to countless others, affect us a little bit differently than it does others.

It does because we know what it's like to stay up all night shmoozing with a friend in the dormitory, or getting drunk for the first time on Purim in the yeshiva dining room, or leaning over our shender (the wooden book stand used for resting our holy books on) and busting our intellectual chops while grappling with our rebbe on a difficult talmudic point – just like the bochrim who were murdered at Mercat HaRav.

On behalf of yeshiva bochrim everywhere, I extend my sympathy to the families of Doron, Ro'i, Yonadav, Yochai, Yonatan, Neriah, Pnuel, and Avraham. We know, our fellow yeshiva bochrim, who you were and where you fell while you sang and danced in celebration of one of the Hebrew calendar's happiest months, Adar II.

We thought the yeshiva world was a safe place, one where we were protected by the mishnaic verses and by our brotherhood. This has changed, as our images of that world are now dotted with the red stains of eight yeshiva bochrim's blood on the floor of our memories.

Dealing with diversity — and technology

How much appeal does an article about Jewish day schools have for readers with no personal connection with the day school system?

"What makes a Jewish school a community school?" is the longest article in this supplement, although that wasn't necessarily the intention. While the subject is specific to Jewish day schools, the broader issues facing individual schools have universal applications.

In a city like Toronto — which has separate Jewish day schools with Reform, Conservative and several Orthodox approaches, not to mention a Sephardi school and an array of others — how does a "community" school balance the needs of an increasingly diverse student population?

The questions, and some of the answers, may well resonate with anyone who wonders about the ins and outs of life in any diverse community, be it a school, a city, a workplace or a family.

Another theme that comes up in this supplement is the influence of technology: from the cellphone, and its place in the classroom, to the SMART Board, a high-tech "whiteboard" that has started to make its way into schools, opening doors to new ways of learning.

We also look at the pros and cons of homework, education for seniors, and a new book about the yeshiva year in Israel, which addresses fears among some parents that their children will become religiously radicalized.

Our centre spread features winning submissions from our annual Purim art contest, and interspersed among the photos are a few that were taken as a lead-up to this week's holiday. Chag Samayach!

• How should I choose a university or college? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • How can I study better, not harder? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic problems? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open - so, now what?

Reading, writing and text-messaging

Whatever happened to children passing covert, handwritten notes to each other in class? You know, the ones the teacher would always manage to intercept, causing embarrassment for the offending kid?

It would appear those days are gone, lost to the thrust of technologies such as the cellphone and the Blackberry.

As a result, many schools claim that classroom disruptions are on the rise, as children and teens use the ubiquitous technology to communicate with each other and to from the classroom or exam hall, often driving teachers, invigilators and their classmates to distraction.

Reacting to the phenomenon last year, the Toronto District School Board, Canada's largest school board, ruled that students with personal communications devices must turn them off and place them out of sight while in the classroom or inside school grounds unless granted special dispensation by a principal.

The TDSB passed the rule citing, among others, privacy concerns after videos were posted to the Internet taken by schoolchildren and used for cyber-bullying purposes.

Other Greater Toronto Area school boards have since adopted similar policies in an attempt to deal with the issue.

In the city's Jewish school system, the matter is also being taken seriously.

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's student handbook outlines the need to keep cellphone usage to a minimum.

"Cellphones, pagers and beepers must be turned off during lessons and school events. Cellphones and beepers that go off during class will be confiscated," it reads.

But it's not just teens who have cellphones and Blackberries fused to their bodies these days.

Primary school children are becoming increasingly hooked on the technology as more and more parents feel the need to supply their kids with a means of staying in touch at all times in case of emergency.

According to a March 2007 New York Times article, "cellphones are quickly emerging as the must-have technology among elementary-school society."

The article reveals statistics for the U.S. cellphone market that indicate the tween demographic — eight to 12-year-olds — is one of the fastest-growing market segments for the cellphone industry.

According to Industry Canada's Office of Consumer Affairs website, a 2005 survey showed that Canadian children are also embracing cellphones, with six per cent of Grade 4 children indicating they owned a cellphone. That number jumps to 46 per cent by Grade 11.

At the Paul Penna Jewish Downtown Day School in Toronto, principal Janet Nish-Lapidus insists there's no real problem with cellphones among her students. Regardless, the school has seen fit to create a policy on the subject.

A recent school newsletter went out with a reminder to parents stating that if students bring cellphones to school "for emergency purposes" they're obliged to keep them in their backpacks during school hours.

"Younger children [senior kindergarten to Grade 6] don't have them, and our middle school students... understand that they do not come into the classroom and are used only for out-of-school emergencies," Nish-Lapidus told The CJN.

Out west, the Alberta Teachers' Association attempts to give parents some direction about when to allow their children to have cellphones.

"Because children mature at different rates, there isn't one 'right' age at which a child can be said to be ready to use a cellphone safely," it states on the association's website. "A possible guideline might be that children who are old enough to stay home alone or to baby-sit are likely mature enough to accept the responsibilities associated with owning a cellphone. Such milestones imply that the child has assumed an increased level of responsibility and, as a result, has a greater need to stay in touch."

What makes a Jewish school a community school?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The word "community" has no special prominence in the name of Toronto's Jewish community high school – the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto – but it is highly significant in the school's philosophy of "welcoming, recognizing and validating every stream within the mainstream Jewish community. "We are not affiliated to any stream," said the school's director of education, Paul Shaviv, in a recent interview. The school – which has more than 1,400 students on two campuses and is, constitutionally, a community school – "encourages kids to be more Jewish. Period."

But Shaviv has plenty to say about the intricacies of balancing the needs of different sectors of the community and about the perception, among some people, that the school leans toward an Orthodox outlook because of the preponderance of Orthodox teachers in its Jewish studies department.

"Generally, the school does not push any particular stream or view of Judaism," Shaviv said. "We encourage students to explore and deepen for themselves."

"However," he added, "our teachers are encouraged to give their own view on any topic, as long as they identify the view as their own, leave appropriate and respectful space for student views, and present as part of their teaching a range of views from within the Jewish spectrum."

How well does it work in practice?

"We do our best," said Shaviv. "I'm not claiming that every lesson reflects the school ideal. I would like to think so."

"I hope that no child is ever told that their Judaism is either unacceptable or not real. We try and build on the positive. Our job is to make kids more Jewish." Whether that means they become "more Reform Jewish," more Conservative or more Orthodox, Shaviv said that is fine with him.

"Although I'm the first to admit that it's a delicate balancing act, I think the school does pretty well in making this a comfortable environment for children from every Jewish background."

Lamenting the "increasingly polarized world" of the Jewish community in general, Shaviv said, "The reality is that the other denominations, whether to the right of you or the left, are your partners, not your enemies. They're partners in the common task of deepening Jewish knowledge and of helping students make sense of the co-ordinates of their Jewishness in a spiritual way, in a historical way and even in a political sense."

Different denominations 'can agree to disagree'

"We can agree to disagree in a civilized, respectful manner."

The Jewish studies staff at the school consists mostly of Orthodox teachers, although there are a few who are non-Orthodox and there have been some non-Orthodox shlichim from Israel. "It's very difficult to find non-Orthodox shlichim, although every year we try," said Shaviv.

From a "practical" standpoint, he added, there are "very few" qualified high school teachers who can teach the CHAT curriculum in Hebrew, especially Tanach and Rabbis, and who are not from the Orthodox world.

"We have interviewed non-Orthodox ordained rabbis for teaching posts, but it's been very difficult for us to compete with pulpit salaries," he said.

To address the needs of observant students and maintain a standard of school practice, all school activities are kashrut and Shabbat-observant.

But school Shabbatonim, which were instituted seven years ago, provide a non-traditional alternative in addition to Orthodox prayer services. In fact, said Shaviv, "the school would very much like to see a non-traditional daily minyan," but there hasn't been enough interest to get it off the ground.

Shaviv has observed that denominational differences seem to be "of less and less importance to many of our families," but they constitute enough of an issue in the community that he commented that the remark was going to get him "into great trouble."

"You can go through the school in a year and not hear the words Orthodox, Conservative or Reform except in an academic context. We are a united community in the school."

Grade 12 student Arielle Lewis – whose long skirt and sleeves covering her elbows indicate her level of Jewish observance – said in a phone interview that her friends run the gamut from Orthodox to Reform. She doesn't believe denominational affiliation is "a factor in terms of forming friendships."

Lewis' friend, Caroline Just, whom she met after transferring from the Orthodox girls' high school Upanat Orot after Grade 10, sees herself as a combination of Conservative and Reform. She said that while conformity is "a strong factor," for young people, "as people get older they kind of realize they can be friends with someone even if they're not the same... It's not really unusual that we're friends."

But there are differences other than denominational affiliation that Jewish schools are increasingly having to address, such as homosexuality and interfaith marriages.

The former issue came to the fore in New York's Jewish community in December when a former student at Yeshiva of Flatbush, a modern Orthodox day school in Brooklyn, was advised by the school that his same-sex partner would not be welcome at a school reunion.

And Jewish attitudes toward interfaith marriage became a cause célèbre last summer when Noah Feldman, a Harvard University law professor, wrote in a New York Times column that he and his Korean-American girlfriend, now his wife, were left out of a class reunion photo, ostensibly because she was not Jewish. He also noted that information he sent about his marriage and the birth of his son did not make it into the school's newsletter. The school Feldman attended, Maimonides School in Brookline, Mass., is also a modern Orthodox day school.

As a community school, CHAT is "in a completely different situation" from an Orthodox school with an Orthodox constituency, Shaviv noted.

TanenbaumCHAT's editorial board – which includes Shaviv and publishes the school's newsletter called the Chatter – has "quietly and without fuss recognized on two occasions gay marriages of alumni," said Shaviv, referring to announcements in the CHAT Alumni Association's "Naches Notes," in the Chatter. The first one was in 2004.

But that point was not reached without dissent.

"There was a range of views," Shaviv said, referring not just to the editorial board. "The school on a professional and lay level made a policy decision to include those announcements, not without strong discussion and opposition from different quarters."

The final decision was not unanimous, he said. However, because there are rabbis in the Reform movement who officiate at same-sex marriages, and because the movement is a mainstream movement served by the school, "we felt that [recognizing the marriages] was part of our community mandate."

Also, Shaviv added, consideration was given to the fact that "gay unions" are legal in Ontario.

"We have had several reunions, and we are delighted to welcome our graduates and the partners they bring."

To the best of his knowledge, there have been no requests to publish an announcement of an interfaith marriage.

"I just don't know," he said. "If asked, we would try and make sure the announcements we make celebrate the positive Jewish family values of the school."

Skills improve with right amount of homework

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Though he was only four and a half years old, Matthew's printing was poor and showed little control. He drew outside the lines in his colouring book, and most worrying for his parents – particularly his mother – he did not pay attention to what his teacher was saying in school.

With the teacher's advice, they implemented a daily homework routine that saw the junior kindergarten student printing in age-appropriate workbooks, practising his colouring and following up their son's efforts with compliments.

After a few months, Matthew showed tremendous improvement. When he wrote his name, the letters no longer wandered over two or three lines and each letter was more or less the same size as the one before. His teacher noticed the differences as well. Not only was he showing technical improvement, his behaviour in school had changed – he had become a better listener and followed instructions when given the first time.

Matthew's parents, this writer being one of them, were gratified at the progress their highly active junior kindergarten student made, especially due to his new-found willingness to do the work rather than play with his cars, guitars and drums.

Yet current research into the pros and cons of homework lend support to only one part of this parent's observations: for kindergarten children, it is effective at creating good study habits, discipline, independence and feelings of accomplishment; the actual learning of the material is not necessarily supported by the data.

Harris Cooper, a psychologist now at Duke University, found that most studies into the effectiveness of homework indicated the scholastic/learning benefits increased as the students advanced through the education system. The correlation between homework and academic results shows up most clearly in the later grades of high school, less so in junior high and hardly at all in elementary school. For kindergarten kids, there was practically no benefit from doing homework, he found.

Silly us. But as Harris stated in his study, Homework: Yet Another Lesson in the Importance of Moderation, "if homework for young children bears no relation to achievement, why assign it at all?"

Answering his own question, he stated: "Homework can have beneficial effects in primary grades on things beyond knowledge acquisition. It can help young students develop good study habits so they are ready to grow as their cognitive capacities mature. It can help children recognize that learning can occur at home as well as at school. Homework can foster independent learning and responsible character traits. Homework can give parents an opportunity to see what's going on in school and express positive attitudes toward achievement. Homework assignments in elementary grades should be short, should employ materials commonly found in the home environment and should lead to success experiences."

Harris came to his conclusions after reviewing nearly 120 studies of homework's effects. He acknowledged that not all studies painted a rosy picture of the benefits of home assignments. In fact, several negative effects had been noted by researchers, including "satiation effects" (diminishing returns when doing too much homework), denial of leisure time and community activities (which provide their own benefits), parental involvement that turns into parental interference and cheating to complete assignments.

It can also accentuate social inequities, he added. Poorer children might fall behind their middle-class cohorts, who have the benefits of a better home work environment: "Homework, it is argued, is not the great equalizer."

Which means, I guess, that as Matthew progresses we'll have to cut back his homework and make sure he doesn't outshine those with lesser resources.

Cooper notes that homework controversies recur regularly. They follow a 30-year cycle during which public demands for more homework are followed by periods when less is demanded.

Last month, two Canadian educators at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), Linda Cameron and Lee Bartel, released a report on homework in which they canvassed the opinions of parents on the subject. The researchers analyzed 1,094 responses to an Internet questionnaire. The researchers point out theirs was not a random sample but was skewed to parents with ties to OISE. They found "a significant number of children now receive homework in kindergarten, 28 per cent in Grade 1 and over 50 per cent in Grade 2 report more than 20 minutes of homework a day... About 75 per cent of parents believe that their children now have 'somewhat' to 'much more' homework than they did as a child."

Parents were asked to add their own comments and Cameron and Bartel found the major complaint was that the amount of work assigned children was too high. Parental assistance was required, reducing family time and adversely affecting family relationships. "The amount of homework puts stress on an already taxed system resulting in feelings of resentment, little life balance, and arguments and power struggles," they wrote.

The Toronto District School Board (TDSB), the province's largest, has initiated a review of its longstanding homework policy. A report is expected this spring.

The TDSB's current policy statement, adopted in 1999, states "students achieve academic success more consistently when parents are involved in their child's education. The influence of the home on a student's success at school is profound and exerts a very strong impact on his or her long-term academic success. Homework is one vehicle for involving parents directly and strengthening the partnership between home and school. Positive attitudes about school and about learning routines are enhanced through the application of effective homework practices."

The TDSB document goes on to say, "the single most important activity for building the knowledge required for eventual success is reading aloud to children."

A report referenced on the TDSB website, the 2007 Survey of Canadian Attitudes Toward Learning: Results for Elementary and Secondary School Learning, found that "most Canadians agree or strongly agree that homework enhances learning and helps students develop good work habits. However, more than 60 per cent of Canadians also agree or strongly agree that, in their experience, homework has often been a source of household stress.

"Nearly half of Canadians believe that both elementary and high school students are assigned just enough homework. One-quarter of Canadians believe elementary students are assigned too much homework and 19 per cent believe the same is true for high school students," said the report, conducted by the Canadian Council on Learning, a non-profit corporation funded by the federal government, in conjunction with Statistics Canada.

Sarah Burakowski, a special education resource teacher at Thornhill Public School, said "for some families it is a major stress factor. The curriculum is so jam packed that some teachers feel that in order to get through all the expectations in the Ontario curriculum they need to give homework. I think children need to read and be read to daily for 20 to 30 minutes and that parents should discuss the content with the child.

"I think a certain amount of homework is important, but teachers should only assign homework where the skills have been taught in class and the child can complete it independently. Parents should oversee what the child is doing and ensure that it is done properly, but basically the child should be able to complete the homework on their own."

Ashley Waltman, principal at United Synagogue Day School Bathurst, said he had not received complaints from parents about the level of homework assigned their children. Teachers regularly give homework based on a widely accepted ratio of 10 times the grade. Grade 3 students would be given homework for both general and Hebrew studies that should take 30 minutes to complete, Grade 4s, 40 minutes, and so on. If children are having trouble finishing the work, they could go beyond the times expected.

More important than the quantity of homework is its quality, he said. It "reinforces what they've done in class" but should not be "busy work" – tasks designed merely to keep students occupied. Home tasks should bring out a child's creativity and allow them to work independently, he said.

Website aimed at youth promotes sexual abstinence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), the youth arm of the Orthodox Union (OU), has set up a website promoting sexual abstinence.

The site, www.negiah.org, talks about the risks involved in premarital sex, categorizing them into physical dangers such as sexually transmitted diseases and pregnancy, and mental and emotional hazards such as stress, guilt, loss of self-respect, a sense of betrayal, anger, depression, and regret.

The site also discusses how teens can express commitment without sexual experimentation, the correlation between sexual activity and suicide rates, biblical role models and family purity.

Rabbi Glenn Black, NCSY regional director, said he applauds the organization for producing the website because teens need a place to turn to in order to learn about their choices.

"Young people are very influenced by society, and they hear a lot about sex and love in the media. That is totally inappropriate."

He said that both boys and girls feel an incredible pressure to keep up with the times. "Popular girls dress [immodestly] and popular boys are surrounded by the most girls. There are huge challenges growing up like that."

NCSY does not merely teach abstinence, Rabbi Black said, it also teaches self-respect. "We want teens to think of themselves, and be proud of their own accomplishments."

"They should not try to raise themselves socially by following societal pressures. Kids are getting the wrong perception of what life is all about."

Unfortunately, he said, many teens see Hollywood celebrities as role models, "and these celebrities are sometimes in rehab or prison. It is very scary the way some teens follow Britney Spears or Paris Hilton."

"We tell them that their role models should be people who are comfortable with themselves and who give back to society."

It is critical to look beyond the moment, he said.

"Every decision we make has short-term benefits and long-term costs. When we have to make a choice, we should look down the road and see the impact of that choice. A premarital relationship can be destructive later on. [Once they go down that road] they can't go back."

Young people need to appreciate the spiritual dimension of a relationship, Rabbi Black said. "The spiritual bonding is what 'bashert' is all about."

At NCSY, he said, an important topic is the Jewish approach to love and marriage. "We have about 1,500 members in Toronto alone, so we see a lot of kids. Many of these important conversations take place one-on-one over a cup of coffee."

Parents, he said, need to know that they can have control. "They should not be their kid's best friends. They have to be on top of them constantly because the world comes at [their children] too fast and hard [for the children] to decide what is right and wrong."

"Parents must know where their kids are after school and get to know their friends. They also have to teach their kids responsibility and how to show respect for the opposite sex."

"It is a mitzvah for them to talk to kids. They shouldn't leave it up to strangers," Rabbi Black said.

Hillel organizes forum to address recent campus assaults

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For university students, the stress of living up to high academic expectations, making new friends and adapting to a new environment is enough to deal with, but students also need to be wary of how to guard themselves against sexual and physical attacks on Canadian campuses.

Prompted by a string of sexual assaults at York University, Hillel @ York organized a public forum to provide students with an opportunity to air their concerns about campus safety.

In November 2006, on two separate occasions, two women were attacked and sexually assaulted near the Murray Ross Parkway and Sentinel Road area of York.

Last April, another woman was sexually assaulted at the northeast doors to Stong College on the York campus.

And just months ago, last September, two 25-year-old men, Justin Connort and Daniel Katsnelson, turned themselves in to police after two 19-year-old women were allegedly raped in their dorm rooms.

Connort and Katsnelson, who are both under house arrest after being released into the custody of their parents on $200,000 bail, face 11 charges, including break and enter, gang sex assault and forcible confinement.

Hillel @ York responded to these recent incidents by holding a student forum, moderated by Penny Krowitz, executive director of Jewish Women International of Canada (JWIC), to allow for students to address campus safety issues.

Devora Schwartz Waxman, Hillel of Greater Toronto's director of zedeck and engagement, recalled the mood on campus after the most recent attacks.

"When we came back to campus after it had happened, on the front page of the Excalibur, the campus paper, there was this huge headline that said, 'Are we safe?' I think people were definitely feeling intimidated and afraid, and there was just a lot of discussion about it," she said.

"We wanted to help our students feel that it was safe on campus and to give them a forum to express their concerns and to show the campus community that we were doing something about it."

Schwartz decided to contact Krowitz, with whom she had worked for the past two years, because her organization deals with the abuse against women.

"[JWIC] actually put together a conference that was held in Montreal in November addressing the issue of sexual assault on Canadian campuses. Penny seemed like the most natural fit to invite," Schwartz said.

During the forum, Krowitz showed a short video about sexual abuse among university students and facilitated a discussion.

"It was a really good jumping off point," Schwartz said.

The York Federation of Students (YFS) was also involved in the forum, and they discussed wanting to launch a new campaign to raise awareness about sexual assaults.

"They had their 'No means no' campaign and they were trying to think about new ways of reframing that and making it fresher, and there was discussion about why this is happening on campus," she said.

"What people came away with was that it's not just about how to stay safe on campus, but it's really a matter of thinking about the way people relate to each other and how men treat women and vice versa."

Schwartz added that after the forum, Hillel sent out an open e-mail to its entire student list.

"We told students that if they had any concerns and wanted any advice or just wanted someone to talk to, we pointed to a staff person they could call."

Although York has been in the media spotlight in the recent past when it comes to assaults on campus, schools across the country are coping with this.

"I don't think this campus is any different than any other Canadian campus and interestingly, the specifics that [Krowitz] was talking about demonstrates that this is an issue across the country and it is not specific to York," Schwartz said.

Last September, a woman was sexually assaulted during the daytime at Memorial University in St. John's, Nfld.

At the University of Toronto earlier this year, Toronto police were seeking a man near St. George and Bloor streets after there were several reports of a man peeping into windows.

Security at Ryerson University also have their hands full with sexual and physical attacks.

In January, a female waiter at the campus pub, Ram & The Rye, was cornered by a patron who demanded her phone number and "touched her in a sexual manner."

The following month, two people were verbally harassed and physically assaulted on the Ryerson campus. During the assault, and while the subjects were running away, they made homophobic statements.

There are a number of preventive safety measures offered by campus security across the country, including escort and foot patrol services, a network of emergency telephones that provide a direct line to campus security and closed-circuit television cameras located in parking lots and walkways that are monitored.

Tips on how to stay safe, provided by the Toronto Police Service website, include walking assertively and walking in well-lit areas.

When it comes to elevators, once inside, stand by the door near the controls and keep your back to the side wall.

If you're taking the bus at night, sit near the driver and be aware if people are watching or following you.

Research yeshivas before sending your kids, author says

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Shalom Berger, co-author of Flipping Out? Myth or Fact: The Impact of the "Year in Israel." was not partial to the proposed title of the book when his publisher, Rabbi Gil Student, first suggested it.

"I wasn't so excited about it," Rabbi Berger told The CJN in a phone interview from his home in Alon Shvut, near Jerusalem. "I thought it would imply something I didn't think was fully accurate." The question mark was inserted at his request, and the subtitle was one of several considered.

Indeed, the title and cover photo are somewhat provocative, alluding to fears among some parents of children becoming so religiously radicalized that they lose touch with the values they were raised with.

The 218-page volume, published in December by Yashar Books, has a handsomely photographed cover featuring a black fedora and suit jacket neatly placed on a suitcase in front of the Western Wall, considered Judaism's holiest site. The garments are symbolic of stricter Jewish ritual observance and are not typical attire for modern Orthodox students entering Israeli yeshivot.

The book's title, taken from Jewish rock band Blue Fringe's song "Flippin' Out," is a flip take (pun notwithstanding) on the yeshiva year in Israel.

Its lyrics address some of the same changes referred to in the book — restrictions on relationships with the opposite sex, more visibly Orthodox attire, stricter observance of religious ritual, and avoidance of secular culture including movies — and the tension such changes can cause between parents and children.

The book's approach, with three academics as respective writers of its three sections, is considerably more serious, but makes for an interesting read both for its lack of pedantry and its subject matter. There is little if any other current material exclusively devoted to the yeshiva year in Israel.

Rabbi Berger, an educator, and Rabbi Daniel Jacobson, a psychologist, base their sections on their respective doctoral studies, the former looking at changes in students' attitudes and practices, and the latter examining the underlying psychology. Sociologist Chaim Waxman, who studied at an Israeli yeshiva himself in the late 1950s, wraps things up by examining American Orthodox, Zionism and Israel. All three authors are Americans who have made aliyah.

For his doctorate in education, Rabbi Berger, who works for the Lookstein Center for Jewish Education in the Diaspora at Bar-Ilan University, interviewed some 400 students at the beginning and end of their year in Israel. He sought them out a year later as well and was able to locate most of them, he said.

His subjects, virtually all of whom are graduates of American Jewish day schools, were drawn from four yeshivot heder that combine study with army service for Israeli students and three American programs.

The term "flipping out" isn't used in the book, and the authors do not put an explicit value judgment on the phenomenon. "It's something that's out there that parents express," said Waxman. "Some modern Orthodox parents do see it as negative."

In a comment that could be construed as reassuring — or not, if one wonders why the issue is raised in the first place — Rabbi Berger writes in the book that yeshiva students "do not appear to be swept up by a cult-like phenomenon."

However, noted co-author Waxman in a phone interview, there is a process of "socialization" at yeshivot. Also, he noted, the yeshiva is a "total" environment.

"Its aim is to mould a certain type of person, and in some cases if the students internalize things to an extreme, it might have effects similar to those of people who join cults. I don't think it's the intention, or what the yeshiva does, but it's how the student absorbs it."

Rabbi Berger said that it's not just the yeshiva experience that causes changes, but the age and developmental stage of the students, most of whom are just out of high school. "They're beginning to distinguish themselves from their parents. They're developing their own identity and rebelling at some level."

'Overwhelming majority' do not flip out

"The question is: What setting are they going to be in when they have these experiences? We all think about the '60s when kids went off to college and came back different from their parents – an experience in which students are exposed to ideas that they find compelling and very often they [are inculcated]. This is what you expect from 18- and 19-year-olds.

"In most cases that I'm familiar with, assuming the kids grew up in settings that are healthy and supportive, and where there is open communication, at some point they... come to appreciate their parents' values and move back on some level in that direction."

Rabbi Berger expected to find changes not only in religious attitudes and practice but also in attitudes toward Israel, and "for the most part" he did.

One finding that surprised him, however, was that students did not change in the area of ethical behaviour over the course of the year.

Although his first reaction was to think that "this is something of an indictment of a program that put such an emphasis on ritual matters that interpersonal matters fell by the wayside," he soon changed his mind.

"It turned out there really wasn't a lot of room for change... The students scored themselves so high at the beginning of the year on interpersonal things that there was no room to change."

He believes the finding is explained by the consistent support in the general community for ethical behaviour and a concomitant minimum of support for religious practice.

The "overwhelming majority" of yeshiva students do not flip out, said Waxman. "Most come back and go to university, but they are affected – from my point of view very positively," he said.

Some do stay for a second year instead of returning home, he noted. Of those, he added, some have their parents' blessings, and others stay on against their parents' wishes.

The book cited a Jewish studies principal at one student's high school who disapproved of his former student's decision not to attend the Ivy League university at which he had deferred acceptance.

The principal was concerned that future students would not be allowed to defer acceptance if others did not "uphold their commitments."

But Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, which currently has about 20 alumni in Israeli yeshivot, disagrees with that premise. "A school's principal's duty is to do what is best for the student, not [worry] about their school image," he told The C.J.N.

Rabbi Berger noted that, among his research subjects who stayed for a second year, "not that many" originally planned to do so. "Clearly they were influenced, or they themselves said, 'This is what I want to be doing.'"

For parents considering Israeli yeshiva education for their children, Waxman recommends putting "at least as much time into researching the institution as you would into finding out about a new car."

He said parents need to know the perspective of the yeshiva – haredi, "transplanted American" or religious Zionist, for example.

Also, he added, they need to know their own child. "There are certain youngsters who should not be sent away from home, who need their parents there. Parents have children who are struggling and they think that sending them to Israel will resolve their struggles, but frequently it exacerbates them."

Reflecting on the findings in the book, Waxman said he thinks "it just scratches the surface."

"It's such a rich area that needs to be mined. There are so many things we don't know."

A Great School

Live & Learn

Lifelong learning at Baycrest, Bernard Betel, universities

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When people hear the word "education," they often think about things children do at school – math, physics or studying Shakespeare's sonnets.

But education can be a lifelong pastime. Older people may not want to (or have to) take exams and write essays, but they can still savour new information and learn new skills and new ways of doing things.

Current research suggests that keeping the brain active can help maintain physical, mental and emotional health, even to some extent warding off dementia and Alzheimer's disease.

As we age, we tend to get more concerned about how to maintain our health through the years. That subject may be just the starting point.

Lois Kamenitz, a librarian by training, is a volunteer at the Anne and Louis Pritzker Wellness Library at Baycrest. Since 2005, she has been running monthly programs about all aspects of health care. She taps into the expertise of Baycrest staff, as well as those in the community.

Subjects of her programs have included Alzheimer's disease, diabetes and heart disease – as one might expect – as well as Parkinson's disease, hearing loss, depression, chronic pain and arthritis.

Kamenitz has also asked participants what they would like to learn about and, based on their input, programs have evolved. They include "When someone you know has cancer," naturopathy, sleep, stress, movement and music therapy, and home safety.

A popular program involved making memory books, a kind of scrapbooking. "This is a way of preserving memories when only the memories are left," Kamenitz said, noting that this type of program is especially relevant for Holocaust survivors.

She also prepares handouts and a bibliography, and gives information on what materials are available from the Pritzker library.

Kamenitz noted that participants have told her that the educational aspect is not the only reason they enjoy the programs: to them it is a social outing as well. "Some see it as a chance to get out, meet other people, and feel less isolated," Kamenitz said.

The young often think that those over 50 are mired in the dark ages, especially with regard to modern technology. Surprise them by becoming computer literate at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, which offers a computer learning and resource centre. Its small classes, run by volunteers, can help make those who view computers with some suspicion comfortable with the technology and computer literate.

The Betel Centre's Lifelong Learning Institute offers various programs, including a book club; creative writing workshops; discussion groups on such subjects as the Bible; current events and Jewish culture; Russian for beginners; lecture series; and music appreciation.

Another avenue for learning opportunities are the universities, which have many opportunities for older adults. These programs don't focus on seniors, but they don't require previous university experience and there are no exams.

Ryerson University's G. Raymond Chang School of Continuing Education has many programs for those over 50. Seven times a year there are special seminars to help deal with issues of aging and retirement.

Its LIFE Institute (Learning Is For Ever) offers peer-led study groups and lectures in the arts, humanities, sciences and contemporary issues, as well as computer training, a "philosophy café" and social programs.

For something different, look into the Chang School's ACT II Studio, a theatre school and creative drama centre for older adults, where students can learn about acting, voice, improvisation, camera work, playwriting and direction.

The University of Toronto School of Continuing Studies doesn't have programs specifically for seniors, but its adult education programs are wide-ranging, from art appreciation to forensics, not to mention religion and business studies.

Public libraries offer lectures, book clubs and drop-in programs. The Toronto Reference Library Learning Centre has many computer classes.

Other options for seniors education include Jewish community centres, local school boards and synagogues.

To quote Dr. James Birren, a pioneer in the field of gerontology, a professor at several universities, including UCLA, and the author of numerous books and articles on aging, "Mental activity for older people is more important than even income or housing."

While he may be overstating matters, there is no question that it makes life more vital.

Cyber-bullying occurs among four-and five-year-olds

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After sponsoring what was supposed to be a one-time forum on cyber-bullying in 2004, Jewish Family & Child got such a positive response that organizers decided they needed an ongoing program.

Shawna Sidney, co-ordinator of the agency's family life education program, responded by developing a PowerPoint presentation aimed at parents, and said she will go out to schools – she has spoken at Temple Sinai and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) – to address the issues.

Cyber-bullying, the use of electronic communication tools such as the computer or cell-phone to antagonize and intimidate others, "is a worldwide problem, and takes place in every school by children as young as four or five," said Sidney.

The bully may send e-mails, post messages on a website or blog, or send hurtful text messages, photos or videos.

Sidney told the story of two girls who set up a "We Hate Sondra Jones" website after they were not invited to her slumber party. "They told everyone invited to the party not to go, and asked the girls to add reasons why they hate Sondra, and to spread ugly rumours about her."

"When Sondra heard about it, she got a sick feeling in her stomach, and checked the site often. She felt hurt and powerless to defend herself. She was too embarrassed to go to school, so she told her parents that she was sick."

Sidney said that 25 per cent of Canadian children claim they have been e-mailed with hateful content about someone, 44 per cent of children have e-mail accounts their parents do not know about, and although 70 per cent of parents say they know a great deal about the websites their children visit, 55 per cent of these children disagree.

Cyber-bullying perceives their actions to be anonymous, said Sidney, because they cannot see their victims. "It is a faceless form of bullying, and they cannot see the reaction of their targets."

There are, however, definite legal implications, she said. It is a crime to publish a defamatory libel, or cause someone fear for their own safety or the safety of others. Acts of cyber-bullying may violate the Canadian Human Rights Act if a person spreads hate or discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, sexual orientation, marital status, family status or disability.

"There are technological crime units within the various police forces in the GTA whose job it is to investigate any allegations of cyber-bullying," said Sidney.

Computers can be scary and dangerous, she said. "It is amazing what young kids can get into; they know more about computers than we ever will."

Sidney tells parents that using computers should be a privilege, not a right. "The computer should be in a common room in the house, and parents need to be aware of what their kids are doing on them. Children must know the potential dangers and understand why they need to be cautious. There needs to be rules set up for computer use and instant messaging, and these rules need to be explained and enforced."

Sidney said that parents should be aware if their children spend long hours on the computer, close programs on the computer when they come near, are secretive about Internet activity or are always doing homework on the computer but are getting behind with school-work.

"Talk to your children and know when they are talking to someone online, and [to whom] they are talking. Teach them to stop immediately if they see or read anything that upsets them, and not reply to the messages."

Let your children know, she said, that if something upsets them they should talk to an adult who can inform the service provider. "They should set up a new e-mail address and password, and if the bullying persists they can call the police with an adult."

If parents suspect that it is their child who is the bully, let them know that anonymity is only a perception, she said. "Discuss your concerns with our child's principal and/or school social worker, and consider the benefits of professional counselling."

Homework teaches time management

The wrong kind of homework can create resentment if the child has mastered the material and finds repetitive drills a waste of time. "We don't want them to have a negative experience," Waltman said, noting that parents, too, can get frustrated if their child is having difficulty completing assignments.

Still, educators have to tread a fine line when making sure children acquire the skills they need to progress, versus assigning too much work and creating resentment, he added.

Shana Harris, director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School, said "we believe it is important to give homework, but not homework for homework's sake."

In grades 1 and 2 "it's mostly reading related," and in Hebrew studies it focuses on "practising letters and reading skills."

Bialik's policy is to limit homework in grades 1, 2 and 3 to no more than half an hour a day in total. In grades 4 and 5, one hour is expected, split equally between general and Jewish studies. In grades 6, 7 and 8, up to one and a half hours a day is expected, with 15 minutes devoted to each subject.

Harris said "we're not giving excessive homework." The benefits of home assignments are many. "It consolidates their learning," it instills good work habits and teaches children to budget their time, she said.

Parents are encouraged to help children with homework, particularly in the younger grades, and to report back to the teachers if children are taking too long to complete assignments. "We have to find out what's behind that."

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), said "homework is an important part of academic review and training" and permits students to apply the skills and knowledge acquired in the classroom.

It teaches them to work and study independently and to budget time correctly. Youngsters enrolling in CHAT come from more than a dozen day schools and each comes with strengths and weaknesses. Most are able to work independently, but CHAT's Grade 9 students "quickly absorb high school study habits and routines," he said.

Those who require help are taught how to organize their work, take notes, do research and express themselves clearly and logically, Shaviv said.

Homework is assigned so that it "is evenly spread and does not cause the kids to go into a crisis."

Despite the double program of general and Jewish studies, homework is limited so that the kids "have time to be children, teenagers and enjoy themselves."

London Hebrew day school gets a new home

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hebrew day school students in London, Ont., have something to look forward to next school year.

In September, the London Community Hebrew Day School (LCHDS) will move from a 70-year-old building in Old North London on Epworth Avenue to a brand-new facility connected to the London Jewish Community Centre on Huron Street in northeast London.

"The current school is... not air-conditioned, it doesn't have a lot of new smart boards and computers and advanced ways of teaching. The hope is that this school, since it is brand new, will offer the latest in technology, and be able to educate students in the 21st century," said school board member William Frydman, a Toronto native who works as an oral surgeon in London.

Frydman, who is actively involved in fundraising initiatives for the school, added that the 65 students who are enrolled will have access to the JCC's gymnasium, library and Holocaust museum.

"The idea is... that the students at the school can benefit from the existing structures at the Jewish Community Centre."

The school, which was founded in 1966, serves the London Jewish community of about 3,000, one of the small Jewish communities in North America to support a fully operational Jewish day school, Frydman said.

"What we're hoping is that this will make Jews in Canada aware that the London Jewish community actually has a Hebrew day school and cares a lot about Yiddishkeit and we want our kids to grow up Jewish," he said.

He said the community is dedicated to the school because it provides a foundation for children to feel connected to their heritage, traditions and culture "that transcends geographic boundaries" because even if they move from London, "all the benefits of a Jewish education will go with them."

The cost of relocating to the building is about $2 million, and the community has raised about $1.8 million, Frydman said.

"The fact that we've raised $1.8 million is in part due to the sale of the old school, which was bought by the University of Western Ontario Kings College, because it is very close to their campus and they've always wanted that building. That worked out great for us. Plus, we've raised on top of that another million dollars or so, but we're still not there yet."

He said that they hope to raise enough money to be able to create an escrow account, to draw on the interest to help pay the overhead of the school.

Frydman hopes that the new facility will help attract parents who want to provide their kids with private education, but are indifferent about Jewish education.

"If someone decides they want to give their kids a private school education and they're not totally sold on Jewish education, they could send them to French immersion, they could send them to at least four other private schools in London alone," he said.

"People have options. When you have a school in a 70-year-old building that looks like it's 70 years old, and requires a ton of maintenance all the time, it's not exactly attractive."

But he hopes the new location will give LCHDS an edge because it will offer the same curriculum that will prepare students to be leaders in the Jewish community, in a more comfortable, modern facility.

Frydman, who moved to London after completing his post-doctoral studies in Chicago, also hopes that the growing Jewish day school will encourage young Jewish families to move to London.

"[When I moved to London] I wasn't married at the time, nor was I engaged or even dating at that time, but one of the things I looked into was whether it had a Hebrew day school, because when I did raise a family, I wanted my kids to go to Hebrew day school. If they didn't have one, I never would have moved here," he said, adding that his two children are enrolled in LCHDS and his wife, Rochelle Frydman, is a teacher there.

William Frydman suggested that it might even be easier financially to send your kids to Jewish day school in London because – although the tuition is nearly at the same level of Hebrew school tuition in Toronto, at $9,000 a year – the cost of living in London is much lower.

He said that if it wasn't for the children who attend LCHDS, Jewish community events in London would be nearly non-existent.

"Any event, any celebration, any yom tov we're celebrating here in the city, whether it is Purim or whether it is Chanukah... it's always totally supported by the children who attend the London Community Hebrew Day School. It is literally the vital Yiddish support to this city. If that didn't exist and we didn't have that school, there would be a small fraction of participation at any event," he said.

"The kids are everything. The kids are the life of the community."

Multilingualism may keep your child sharper longer

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Jewish day school students often feel like theirs is a heavy burden to bear.

That's because they tend to wade through weightier course loads than their public school peers.

On top of math, English, social science and athletics programs, among others, Jewish day schoolers study under curricula padded with Judaic studies and with extra language courses such as Hebrew, French and even Yiddish in some cases.

At Toronto's Leo Baeck Day School, for example, children are being taught French via a pilot program called the Accelerated Integration Method (AIM). It's a "gesture-based program, like sign language" says school director David Prashker.

"There's no English-speaking in the classrooms [learning with AIM]," Prashker said. "It's very high-energy teaching [and] the French in the classroom is palpable afterward."

Other Jewish day schools rely on more standard modes of delivering language skills.

For example, at Associated Hebrew School and Bialik Hebrew Day School, among others, students learn French from textbooks, some of which are designed by the school's former French department head, Ruby Kaplan.

Kaplan, who now runs her own company, RK Publishing – which provides French textbooks to numerous Jewish and public schools across Canada – is an obvious proponent of learning French as a second or third language.

She said she's currently developing new "high-interest" French workbooks, which aim to increase students' interest in the subject.

"We're trying to help students get strategies to better understand... to support independent learning through models and scaffolding, a step-by-step approach on language tasks," Kaplan said. "No longer should the teacher be re-inventing the wheel."

All the [tasks] in the workbooks have reinforcements and are broken down for easy learning."

All of which, in theory, will help make more students increasingly multilingual.

While that may be a source of pride for parents and students alike, what other advantages does a kid with knowledge French and Hebrew have other than the ability to get by in Québec or Israel when trying to order poutine or falafel?

Quite a lot, actually.

Ellen Bialystock, a York University professor and a world-renowned research psychologist, has focused much of her career on the effect of bilingualism on children's language and cognitive development.

According to her findings, the ability to speak a second language can literally help stave off the ravaging effects of aging on the mind, she says.

"Children who speak two languages develop a set of cognitive skills concerned with attention and control earlier and more efficiently than monolinguals," Bialystock wrote in to The CJN last week from Geneva. "These skills are part of what's called the executive function and are the most crucial component of higher thought," she says.

"The reason is that managing two language systems requires this executive system to control attention to the two systems so the right language comes out, and this constant use in ordinary language production provides a boost to the development (and later the maintenance) of those processes."

She adds that some of her research indicates that children as young as four years old have shown cognitive benefits from learning another language.

Bialystock cautions, however, that simply studying a language is not enough for the significant beneficial effects to kick in.

In order for that developmental "boost" to really be effective, she says a child has to actively speak the language and continue to use it with some fluency.

"In theory, there's no limit to how many languages children [or adults] can learn, but there is a practical limit. The benefits come from really using a second [or third] language," Bialystock explained.

"And a curriculum packed with languages is not going to give children the opportunity to use each of them to some [uncertain] level that would be sufficient incorporation or internalization that they really become bilingual. A threshold point is needed for it to become a functional language and for all this good stuff to happen."

Administrator opposes 'shutting people out'

"It's one part of the tensions of running a community school."

In the Reform movement, rabbis in the GTA have agreed not to officiate at interfaith marriages, although some of their colleagues in other communities do.

When it comes to current students, Shaviv says, "This school is about the students. It is not about judging their backgrounds, beliefs or family situations. It is about all of us working together to produce good, fine, educated human beings and Jews."

"This is maybe one of the very few schools that both teach Talmud and have fashion shows, and where the same kid can be a star of both without anyone objecting."

While no other day schools in Toronto are defined by the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercatz) as "community schools," some of them — such as the Montessori Jewish Day school, the Toronto Heschel School and the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School — consider themselves community schools.

"We're egalitarian, pluralistic and not affiliated with any particular line of Judaism," said Regina Lulka, principal of the Montessori Jewish Day School. We teach students to be comfortable in different means of prayer.

"Freedom of choice is inherent to our Montessori principles. We extend that to our Judaic studies."

Kashrut is observed at the eight-year-old school as "a matter of respect for our more observant families," and parents are "vehemently" requested not to hold parties on Shabbat so that all students can participate, Lulka said. "We celebrate and respect everybody."

Associated Hebrew Schools, which celebrates its 100th anniversary this year, is often perceived as a community school, both for its history — in the early 1940s it was the only Jewish day school in Toronto — and because its student body reflects the spectrum of the Jewish community.

Religiously, however, it hews to a line that Mark Smiley — director of education and an alumnus of the school — says is "comfortable for modern Orthodox families as well as any traditional Conservative respect the integrity of other Jewish movements," Smiley said.

Range of schools is 'not typical'

TanenbaumCHAT is Toronto's only community Jewish day school, said Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's senior vice-president for the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercatz).

However, he noted, the term "community school" means different things to different people. He believes the term is, to a certain extent, "self-defining."

From a Mercatz standpoint, it means a school that serves the broadest scope possible of the ideological spectrum both in its curriculum and through an "open, tolerant and pluralistic" faculty. As well, Epstein said, a community school is open to all students, regardless of their families' ability to pay tuition.

In the United States, however, community schools often refer to schools that serve the non-Orthodox community and in fact were created as an alternative to existing Orthodox schools, said Epstein.

Toronto, with its wide variety of Jewish day schools, is "not typical," he noted.

families."

He believes Associated is a community school in that it serves children from Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Jewishly unaffiliated backgrounds.

Also, he added, "I believe a school can call itself a community school if it has an open enrolment that accepts children of all socio-economic strata."

The Associated curriculum offers "minimal opportunities" to talk about non-Orthodox denominations per se, Smiley said.

However, he added, "implicitly, the children are exposed [to other denominations] through their relationships to families that celebrate bar and bat mitzvahs from all walks of the Jewish community, and this is celebrated at Associated."

It would be "inappropriate" for any teacher at the school to "not

Smiley, who received smichah last year from the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary, said the fact that he is not known as Rabbi Smiley at the school has to do with two things, neither of them relating to the denomination that ordained him.

Ever since he was hired in 2003, he has been called "Dr. Smiley," in recognition of his PhD. Also, he noted, the school has a rabbi-in-residence on staff. "I believe my role is to be the educational leader," said Smiley.

He said it is a misconception that the school "only respects the religious and political institutions of traditional... Orthodoxy."

The school is "one of the few places where kids with tzitzit and kids from secular homes are together in a meaningful way."

Although Associated has no policy or precedent on recognizing interfaith or same-sex marriages of alumni, and no statistics on how many instances there are, Smiley said he "would hope that the Toronto community encourages figuring out how to bring people into the community rather than shutting them out."

He said that all are welcome at reunions.

In addition to "the need to uphold the sanctity of Jewish peoplehood, [there's a] need not to publicly embarrass anybody, which is also an important Torah value."

SMART Boards energize Toronto day schools

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

The future of education is here – in Toronto's Jewish day schools. The three Rs are coming alive with interactive whiteboard technology that's already in many schools and classrooms. Learning grammar is easy when kids can slide around nouns and verbs to make complete sentences, and at the tap of a finger, Google and YouTube can instantly illustrate lessons, making any subject fascinating.

"It's not fair – I wish we had that when I was in school," parents raised with traditional blackboards have been saying to Frieda Woznica, principal of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan. "We started last year with just two," says Woznica. Now, there are 12 SMART Boards, with plans to incorporate many more – across both TanenbaumCHAT campuses – over the next few years.

"A lot of people just think it's... a blackboard substitute," says Marsha Cohen, director of general studies at United Synagogue Day School (USDS), which is rolling out 20 SMART Boards in its two locations by September 2008.

It's really so much more, says Jesse Gold, IT Administrator for Bialik Hebrew Day School, which currently uses four SMART Boards and recently hosted an information session for parents on the new technology. "This lets you interact [with classroom lessons] more organically." While notes drawn on a blackboard or flip chart are static and quickly forgotten, lessons using the SMART Board can grow in an almost infinite range of directions.

Lessons using the SMART Board can grow in an almost infinite range of directions

The SMART Board works as a display – like a monitor – and a mouse all in one friendly unit. On the simplest level, a teacher could use it just like a whiteboard, "writing" on the board surface, with students taking notes. It gets exciting when teachers call up extended SMART Board software, dragging pictures, maps, clocks, grids or graphs onto the screen with a single gesture. Handwriting can easily be moved around on-screen; with a couple of finger taps, it's converted to print for use in any other program. Even numbers can be read directly into programs such as Microsoft Excel for instant math and graphing operations.

And because it's all hooked up to a computer, any session can be saved, retrieved later and even made available to students for review or for those who were absent, as TanenbaumCHAT does with its EdLine intranet that parents and students can access from home.

Bringing in SMART Boards, says USDS's Marsha Cohen, "has been so exciting, so motivating for our children." But perhaps even more, it's been energizing for the teachers.

Noa Schwartz, who teaches Grade 4 and drama at USDS Bayview, calls SMART Boards "a tool... that speaks to all learners." She started out using hers mainly for social science and math, but now uses it in almost every area.

"Imagine having a map of Canada you can interact with, divided into provinces – students are physically moving the shapes... from a puzzle into a fully-formed country. It takes it off the paper, makes it multi-dimensional, tangible for everyone."

The impact has been immediate and gratifying. "There's 100 per cent participation," Schwartz says. "You know through immediate feedback you're being successful."

Even though the system doesn't yet recognize and integrate Hebrew text the way it can with English handwriting, SMART Boards are illuminating ancient paths in Jewish studies at all three schools.

Teachers at TanenbaumCHAT can now easily call up historical maps of Europe and use the SMART Board to draw arrows and superimpose diagrams to illustrate the progress of armies and other often all-too-dry topics.

Even technophobes are up to speed

Schwartz uses a SMART Board to incorporate Jewish lessons even within secular subjects, displaying e-mailed pictures of modern-day Israel and having students respond in writing to the images. Another USDS teacher had students "light" Chanukah candles on-screen. "You just click to make every moment teachable," says Schwartz.

"It's permeating our whole curriculum in a really lovely way," says Bialik's principal of general studies, Benji Cohen. "Even teachers who are more reticent about technology are excited," he adds, a sentiment echoed by administrators at all three schools, where even the most concerted technophobes have quickly gotten up to speed. SMART Boards even lighten the load for teachers, letting them share curricula or individual lessons with others across the province and around the world.

"It's a lot of fun — they're very flashy," says Woznica. "When we had our first lunchtime [staff training] session, kids were pressing their... noses up against the glass window."

Still, the nuts and bolts of education remain central. "I don't want you to think they walk in at 9 a.m. and they're

"SMART Boarded" all day long," says USDS's Marsha Cohen. "It doesn't substitute for a book." Instead, she says, teachers "take the best of traditional teaching and marry it to technology... you need a variety of ways to learn to make your day interesting."

United Synagogue Day School Grade 4 teacher Noa Schwartz uses the SMART Board to teach Micaela Lewis about the map of Canada.

Gold believes there's simply no reason to "expect kids who live their lives with television and computers to be excited by technologies that are inferior" to what they can access at home. And if schools meet today's kids' high-tech expectations, the kids can succeed on an amazingly high level.

There is a price tag on those expectations. Outfitting a classroom with a SMART Board system costs between $700 and $3,400; the lower end doesn't include a projector and neither price includes a computer to run the system (it can work with either a PC or Macintosh).

Finding the money can be tough for Jewish schools, which are constantly, as Benji Cohen says, "trying to fund dual curricula with single budgets." For Bialik, he says it was a matter of getting all stakeholders on board: "Fitting expensive technology in isn't easy... [but] everyone recognizes SMART Boards as a priority."

USDS's Marsha Cohen agrees that buy-in on every level has been essential. "Parents in the extended USDS family have helped us in a significant way in fundraising... our ultimate goal is to have a SMART Board in every classroom from early years to middle school."

By investing in the technology a few SMART Boards at a time, schools avoid the cost of a full-scale roll-out and stagger the whiteboards' eventual obsolescence. Plus, as TanenbaumCHAT's Woznica points out, each year's models will likely be more powerful and capable. "The potential for this as a learning tool is just tremendous," she says. "We've just begun to scratch the surface in terms of what it can do."

Israel branding project targets Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The government of Israel is partnering with Jewish community organizations in Toronto to improve Israel's image and to get Canadians thinking of the country outside "the narrow prism of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

A two-day "brainstorming" meeting was held last week in Toronto to discuss ways of implementing the Israeli Foreign Ministry's "Brand Israel" program, which will focus on a "more creative, eclectic and yet more accurate picture of Israel," said

Ido Aharoni, founder of the ministry's Brand Israel concept.

Toronto is one of eight markets, including Tokyo and London, selected for the pilot program, he said.

Aharoni was in Toronto last week for the meetings with representatives of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian-Israeli Committee, Hillel and Hadasah-WIZO, as well as marketing and public relations specialists with ties to the Jewish community.

Aharoni said the ministry has conducted market research over the past few years that showed "Israel is viewed solely through the narrow prism of the Arab-Israeli conflict... Israel's personality is 90 per cent dominated by conflict-related images and some religious connotations," he said. "Those of us who know the brand intimately are disturbed by the divergence of brand and the perception."

That is compounded by Israelis' own focus on security matters — a concern they express when they travel abroad, reinforcing others' perception of the country.

While security considerations are important to Israel, that does not reflect the totality of the country, Aharoni said.

Other aspects of Israel are worthy of promotion, including its culture and arts; its accomplishments on environmental matters such as water desalination, solar energy and

Former Montrealer heading into space

BY DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

A former Montrealer is set to blast off in the Discovery space shuttle in May, headed for a six-month stay among the stars at the International Space Station.

In a telephone interview, Gregory Chamitoff made it clear that he could barely wait to finally get into space.

"It is very exciting," he said.

Chamitoff was born in Montreal and lived in suburban Laval until age 10, when he and his family — mother Shari, brother Ken, and late father Ashley — moved to California.

Although he no longer holds Canadian citizenship, Chamitoff, 45, has maintained ties with extended family in the Montreal area and pays occasional visits to the city, the most recent being this winter to attend a bar mitzvah.

At that event, Chamitoff reconnected with a Montreal first cousin, Stuart Feldman, who had a career as a magician.

"We used to hang around together," Feldman recalled. "I think it's just amazing what Gregory has done."

Gregory Chamitoff

Chamitoff's extensive background in science and at NASA has made him an ideal candidate to don astronaut garb.

The NASA biographical sheet notes that, among other accomplishments, he was around 30 when he earned his PhD in aeronautics and astronautics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Picked by NASA for the "Astronaut Class of 1998," Chamitoff qualified in 2000 for flight assignment as a mission specialist and has since worked in the space station robotics

Card Issue Dropped

OTTAWA — The federal privacy commissioner has ended her investigation into Rosh Hashanah greetings sent by Prime Minister Stephen Harper to people with Jewish-sounding last names. Jennifer Stoddard said she dropped the matter because political parties aren't covered by federal privacy laws, Canadian Press reported. Some Jews complained last fall that they received the cards at home and wondered how Harper got their names and knew they're Jewish. Others got cards despite being gentiles. Stoddard said she'll probe how parties handle personal data and advise Ottawa on changes to the Privacy Act.

CJC In Swastika Flap

KIRKLAND LAKE, Ont. — Canadian Jewish Congress says it was only seeking information when it wrote recently to Kirkland Lake, Ont.'s town council about the name of the town's Swastika Avenue. CJC director of community relations, Wendy Lampert, said she wrote council after a "community member" raised the issue with CJC, the Kirkland Lake Northern News reported. She asked why council reportedly chose in 1998 to name the street after the infamous Nazi symbol. The town said the name was actually chosen in 1911, years before World War II, and that Swastika, a village that's now part of Kirkland Lake, is 100 years old this year. Lampert said she considers the matter closed.

Cash To Hospital

TORONTO — Walter Arbib, CEO and co-founder of Toronto's Skylark Aviation, gave $300,000 to a West Bank hospital for needy mothers and their babies, in order to "further the possibility of peace," he told the Globe and Mail last week. The Tunis-born Israeli-Canadian gave the money to Bethlehem's Holy Family Hospital, which provides low-cost obstetrical care. It's Arbib's second donation in the West Bank.

Israeli Emissary's Apartment Firebombed

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Three Jewish groups, working in co-operation with police in Providence, R.I., are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the firebombing of an apartment belonging to a Jewish Agency emissary.

The Jewish Federation of Rhode Island, the Anti-Defamation League and the Hillel House that serves both Brown University and the Rhode Island School of Design (RISD) announced the reward March 17.

Josef Knafo, 24, was sitting in the kitchen of his second-floor apartment at about 1:15 a.m. on March 15 when he heard a bang, police said. He looked outside and saw a Molotov cocktail had hit his three-storey wooden apartment building and caught fire. He then discovered a second, unignited Molotov cocktail that had come in through an open window in his bedroom.

Knafo, an emissary for the Jewish Agency for Israel, works for Hillel serving Brown and RISD. The motive for the attack was unknown.

Jewish youths come together for Tikkun Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For the fourth time in as many years, Toronto Jewish youth groups have come together to organize a day dedicated to giving back to the community.

On April 13, an event called "Tikkun Toronto: Jewish Youth Repairing the World One Day at a Time," to be held at Beth Rathom Congregation, will engage more than 150 Jewish young people in community service initiatives throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

"The goal for the event is to get teens involved in the community and instill in them a desire to continue to give back by showing them all of the different ways that one can give back," said Missy Korn, Bnai Brith Youth Organization's (BBYO) program director.

"There is a shadow over community services sometimes. Kids don't think that it's fun, or they don't see the benefits of it, and between myself and the others on the planning committee, we want to show kids, to show Jewish teens, the benefits."

This initiative – funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and organized by BBYO, Canadian Young Judea, United Synagogue Youth (USY), Bnei Akiva and Darchei Noam Teens – provides 14 options for the teenage participants to choose from.

Teens take part in last year's Tikkun Toronto program.

For instance, students in grades 8 to 12 can choose to visit the Cummer Lodge Nursing Home to help set up for their Passover celebration. For three hours, the volunteers will help set up the party room with decorations, food and drinks and help bring the residents, who require assistance, down to the party room.

Other options include participating in the Global Day for Darfur Rally, serving ice cream and painting ceramics with the seniors at Extencicare during their ice cream social, and helping to create banners and volunteer packages for the annual Walk for Israel.

Children in grades 5 to 7 can volunteer in an event called "Sustainability Cookie Sweetness, With Some Tie-Dye on the Side."

During their three-hour volunteer session, the students will learn ways to improve the environment, and they'll tie-dye pillow cases that will be donated to those in need.

Parents are also encouraged to participate as supervisors. Teens and parents can register online at www.tikkuntoronto.org.

"The kids go to the website and pick their first, second and third choice, and then they come to Beth Rathom, where it is being held, for an orientation seminar and some ice-breakers," Korn said.

"They'll be divided into different projects, get on buses and go volunteer for three hours. Then they come back to the shul for pizza and a wrap-up."

She said that she hopes this event will offer a range of volunteer opportunities that will benefit everyone involved.

"It fulfils a need in that kids in high school have to do community service hours, but my personal goal for the event is to show teens the wide variety of ways they can fulfil these community service hours," Korn said.

"Hopefully, it'll give them a desire to continue giving back to the community, even if they don't require community service hours... My personal goal for this day is to instill in the teens a desire to give back and to participate in the tikkun olam in general across the world."

Sometimes the path to treasure begins at the end and leads the seeker backward to the beginning through a golden adventure of discovery and reward.

Such is the case with the last novel written by the Nobel Prize-winning Israeli writer S.Y. Agnon, Ad Hena, which The Toby Press has just released in English translation. The book was first published in 1952. Thanks to The Toby Press, it is now accessible to non-Hebrew readers as To This Day, translated by the celebrated translator, writer, critic and commentator, Hillel Halkin.

Agnon died nearly four decades ago, in 1970. Because a great deal of the literary terrain of his novels covers the long-gone world of eastern European Jewry, his work is not well known by the younger generation. For readers unfamiliar with the uniquely instructive and culturally artful corpus of Agnon's work, To This Day can be the serendipitous entry point.

As in all of Agnon's work, the narrative is far more than light that glistens on its surface. In a comprehensive and analytic introduction to the story, Halkin writes: "To This Day turns out to be composed of an intricately woven spider web of inter-connections, every strand of which crosses every other at numerous points."

Told in the dry, droll voice of a relatively young narrator who reminded this reader somewhat of the homespun but sage Depression-era American raconteur Will Rogers, the story is that of a young Jew stranded in Berlin during World War I.

The narrator finds himself in the city as a result of the hostilities. He must wait until the war is over until he can return to his homeland, Palestine. He therefore wanders from one boarding house to another in the war-deprived city looking for lodgings and accommodations.

Agnon was a true master of humour and pathos who fearlessly yet also humbly delved into moral and theological issues. One small example from To This Day is illustrative.

"Once upon a time, there were some Jews from Galicia who came to earn a living in Leipzig because they couldn't make ends meet at home. Their fellow Galicians offered them hospitality and advice, helped set them up in business and welcomed them in their synagogue. The newcomers were happy to have a Galician-style synagogue in Leipzig that relieved them of the need to pray with German Jews who looked down on them as foreigners.

Although the God of Israel is One, the synagogues built in His honour are many. In short, since this isn't the time or place for a lecture on Jewish customs, the Jews from Galicia prayed in the Galician synagogue in Leipzig and felt at home there. And while this isn't the time for a lecture on Jewish prayer either, the God of Israel may be One and His people may be one, but the same can't be said of their prayer."

Agnon's winking observation about intra-Jewish relations is as biting today as it was more than half a century ago when he wrote it.

Similarly penetrating observations appear on virtually every page. His stories amount to remarkably thoughtful and insightful excursions into Jewish history, folkways, customs, frailties, vanities, sensitivities and fate.

When he received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1966, Agnon described to King Gustav Adolf of Sweden and the many other people assembled at the palace in Stockholm the literary influences that affected his writing.

Meet S.Y. Agnon

"In my writing, I have been influenced first and foremost by the Bible, Mishnah, Talmud, Midrash and Rashi's commentary on the Bible. The next influences were the medieval halachic commentators, Hebrew poets and philosophers led by Maimonides. I also used to read every book in German that came to hand."

And then, as if explaining to the Swedish king the basis of the universal appeal of his stories and of his writings, he added: "I was influenced by every man and every woman and every child who happened my way, both Jews and non-Jews. The conversations of people, the stories they told, were engraved on my heart, and some of them came up into my pen."

American literary critic Edmund Wilson wrote of Agnon in 1964: "One is quite ready to accept him as a true representative of that great line of Jewish writers that begins with the authors of Genesis."

Wilson described Agnon then as "the foremost living Hebrew writer" and "a man of unquestionable genius." Though he lamented that he could not read Agnon in the original Hebrew, he noted that the two books that he had read translated by I.M.

Lask, The Bridal Canopy and In The Heart of the Seas, "certainly read very well, and even in the alien medium, it is evident that the texture of the writing is distinguished, poetic and strongly personal."

Readers wishing to "meet" S.Y. Agnon for the first time are advised to enter his world through To This Day. It is a world most will not wish soon to leave.

'Israel is much more than conflict' clean technology; its high-tech successes and achievements in higher education; and its involvement in international aid, he added.

Getting Canadians – both Jewish and non-Jewish – to see Israel in that light is part of the branding effort. Not only would that change Israel's image, it could lead to more tourism and investment, educational exchanges and other benefits, Aharoni said.

Federation spokesperson Howard Gissin said his organization and other federated communities across the country are committed to supporting the branding initiative and mobilizing the Jewish community behind the effort.

"It's a matter of letting the Jewish community know that Israel is much more than the conflict and the military-diplomatic debate," he said.

"We have the means of information dissemination to be able to turn the brand initiative into reality and turn theory into practice. "We consider this to be an historic enterprise."

Aharoni said the pilot program will likely be launched in the next year or so. He said the branding process is a long-term strategy – it could take decades to change Israel's "persona" – and will include several aspects. It could involve sponsoring a film festival, supporting cultural and sport exchanges, or junkets to Israel for Canadian opinion-makers.

Once a brand is built, it becomes entrenched in the public's mind.

He pointed to the United States, whose image, in large measure, was formed by its entertainment industry, not its foreign policy. Think of Brazil, he suggested, and whether it's soccer or carnival costumes, you're not likely to see the country as the world's crime capital, he said.

As for Canada, the country has "a very strong brand. Canada has a wonderful image in Israel as a multicultural, tolerant, open-minded supporter of Israel."

But unlike Israelis, "the average Canadian does not go to bed at night wondering if he will have a country the next day," he said.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, said the branding initiative is still in its early stages, and the slogans, logos and visual representations haven't been determined yet.

"More important are the qualities" that will be promoted.

"Israelis' ingenuity, their passion, fusion, all those qualities Israelis find pride in" could form the brand essence, he said.

At the end of the day, Gissin hopes all major Jewish organizations will support the branding initiative. "The effort we are taking to make Israel more relevant to Canadians does not ask you to compromise or change your political or religious beliefs."

It only asks people "to see what is good and attractive in Israel," he said.

branch, been the lead CAPCOM (capsule communicator) for the space station's Expedition 9 mission in 2004, and served as crew support astronaut for Expedition 6 in 2002-2003.

For the upcoming mission, officially known as STS-124 – its target take-off date is May 25 – Chaminoff will head up to the space station aboard Discovery as flight engineer and science officer.

Also on board will be the Kibo Pressurized Module (PM), part of a larger Japanese experiment module, the largest module to be placed at the international side of the space station. The module will comprise an entire wing. It is so large that it is being sent up in stages.

Is also this module, Chaminoff said, that will be the source of most of his work. He will spend the six months conducting a series of experiments and ensuring that the module is installed and activated properly.

Upon his arrival at the space station, Chaminoff noted, he will trade places, as it happens, with another Jewish astronaut, Garrett Reisman, also a flight engineer.

"I think that will be the first time there are two Jewish astronauts in space at the same time," Chaminoff said with a laugh.

In fact, Chaminoff, who is slated to return to Earth on STS-126, admits to a certain kinship with other Jewish astronauts who have flown on shuttle missions before him, including Jeffrey Hoffman, who took a "space Torah" along on a shuttle mission, David Wolf, who spent four months at the Mir space station, and Scott Horowitz.

Earlier, Chaminoff worked and became friends with Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon when he trained during the late 1990s at the Johnson Space Centre in Houston.

Ramon died a national hero in 2003 when the space shuttle Columbia was destroyed while re-entering the Earth's atmosphere.

"He was a wonderful guy," Chaminoff said.

Kolel lunch to focus on women's movement

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

Staff Reporter

Although Canadian women are years ahead of their American counterparts when it comes to access to maternity leave and child care, Canadian Jewish feminists lag behind those in the United States, says Sarah Fulford, the new editor of Toronto Life magazine.

While Canadian women get year-long maternity leave and government-subsidized day care, Americans face the dilemma of having to leave their children after six weeks to return to work, or to quit working and face financial hardship, she said.

Fulford will be speaking on the challenges and changes in the women's movement, along with the Letty Cottin Pogrebin, author, journalist, social activist and founding editor of Ms Magazine, and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, at a fundraising luncheon for Kolel on May 12 at noon at the recently renovated Darche Noam Synagogue, 864 Sheppard Ave. W.

Fulford said in a conference call that "at a time when doctors are encouraging new mothers to nurse their babies for at least six months, I am perplexed that American women have not stormed the streets."

Rabbi Goldstein said, however, that with regard to religious life, she is a "rabbi among rabbis after 25 years in Toronto, but there is still a lot of tokenism. Gender definitely plays a role. I often get calls from the media [to discuss various topics] when they realize that they have spoken to a number of religious leaders, but none were women."

Canadian synagogues tend to be established and set in their ways, she said, and not many have considered changing their liturgy to address feminist issues. "In the United States, feminist liturgy is a done deal."

Rabbi Goldstein said she represents a woman who broke through the glass ceiling, "and the challenge now is for [younger women] to change the face [of Jewish institutions]."

Pogrebin said the difficulty lies in the fact that people can't aspire to be what they have not seen. "Somebody has to break through the model."

She said Jewish women need to take pride in their accomplishments. Since the first and only International Jewish Feminist Conference, held in Jerusalem in 1988, "it became clear that women needed to become included. When we went to the Wall to pray, every woman could feel comfortable."

Anyone who has attended a Passover seder, she said, has heard the story of liberation. "We can also liberate the oppressed."

Rabbi Goldstein noted that women who participated in Sukkah by the Water, a feminist celebration of Sukkot that ran annually in Toronto in the early 1990s, represented all denominations. "Everyone came together. We taught cross-denominational dialogue, because we didn't have much to lose."

She said anyone who attends the luncheon will have a chance to learn "so much from [these women's] inspirational journeys. They are [an] example of the kind of thought-provoking and stimulating experiences Kolel offers."

Pogrebin said Kolel is a marvelous example of how "sparks can fly" in a pluralistic environment.

Funds from the luncheon will go towards Kolel programs. For tickets, call Esther Schlesinger at Kolel, 416-636-1880, ext. 255.

Hypocrite's complaint

US. Vice-President Dick Cheney visited with Israeli and Palestinian leaders last weekend to try to once again breathe some fresh air and forward motion into the limp sails of the peace negotiations between the two sides. Bilateral discussions had slowed down considerably after the Palestinians expanded their campaign of rocket terror into Ashkelon and surrounding areas. Cheney used the occasion to restate and re-emphasize America's commitment to Israel's security and to the creation of an independent Palestinian state.

True to past form, however, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas carped about Israeli behaviour. He criticized Israel's expansion of "settlements" in the suburbs of Jerusalem, the ongoing checkpoints in the West Bank and the military operations targeting Palestinian gunmen. And, of course, he utterly ignored Palestinian behaviour. He seemed little bothered by the constant terror raining down on Israeli civilians from Gaza, the attempted terror from the West Bank and the unceasing incitement against Israel and against Jews from official PA educational and media organs.

In their fourth report on Palestinian educational material, according to JTA, the American Jewish Committee and the Center for Monitoring Peace in the Middle East found little mention of the State of Israel in Grade 11 and 12 schoolbooks and described hatred of the West as a "prevalent theme."

"Many Palestinian children are exposed to a rigid, narrow worldview in which Israel does not exist and Jews are considered subhuman enemies," said AJC executive director David Harris. "A negotiated settlement cannot succeed until Palestinian children are taught to live in peace with their Israeli neighbours."

And worse. Palestinian Media Watch (PMW) reported last week on an "educational" exhibit that depicted Israel burning Palestinian children in a crematorium. Young children are seen standing beside dolls being placed into a model of a crematorium. The exhibit included an oven. Inside the oven, small children are being burned. Another part of the exhibit, PMW reported, was a black platform with the words, "Stop the Israel's Holocausts [sic]."

Such "education" of children is perfidious and a prescription for never-ending war.

But Cheney appeared not be moved by Abbas' finger-pointing. "The U.S. remains strongly committed to the establishment of a Palestinian state," he said. But he continued: "Achieving that [state] will require tremendous effort at the negotiating table and painful concessions on both sides. It will also require a determination to defeat those who are committed to violence and who refuse to accept the basic right of the other side to exist." Rockets and terrorism against Israelis, Cheney pointed out, "do not merely kill innocent civilians. They also kill the legitimate hopes and aspirations of the Palestinian people."

Thankfully, the U.S. government is not swayed by the complaints of a hypocrite.

Israel announced that it had decided to share with the United States information it learned about Syria and the PLO during the Lebanon War. It had previously refused to do so for fear the information would find its way to other Arab states, and then to Soviet bloc countries. In return, the United States sold 200 air-to-air missiles to the Israel Air Force.

Don't Close She'arim!

Mourning took place at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre recently after the closing of the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School was announced to the parents of its students and staff ("She'arim to close its doors in June," CJN, March 20).

Jewish educators created She'arim - meaning "gates" in Hebrew - to accommodate children who are unable to master the skills needed for a dual-language day school program. The school accepts students from all streams.

These students, who failed in regular classrooms, often had behavioural problems that could not be managed by their schools. The program at She'arim enabled them to return to the Jewish day school system within a few years. The learning strategies they acquired gave them the skills and self-confidence to finish high school, to eventually attend colleges, universities and yeshivot, and to obtain professional degrees.

The school's success is in large part due to the fact that the children are removed from their regular schools, environments in which they could not compete.

To close down this unique remedial school will deprive Jewish students and their families of a tried and successful learning environment. This school is staffed by experienced, compassionate educators who would be difficult to replace.

Keep the gates open.

Conservative gov't should be applauded

The United Nations Human Rights Council recently endorsed a resolution by the United Nations condemning Israel for a recent armed incursion into the Gaza Strip that claimed more than 120 lives, many of them civilians. While there were a number of abstentions, only Canada had the courage to vote against the resolution. Included with those countries censuring the Jewish state were China and Russia. Never has the council entertained the question of Russia's brutality against Chechens or China's onslaught against civilians in Myanmar and currently in Tibet. It is also worth noting that Canada withdrew from attending the next UN conference on racism even before Israel decided to withdraw. Today's Canada is a true ally and friend of Israel. The position taken by Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Conservative government should be applauded by the Jewish community.

Conservative shuls' new siddur

Of course, Rabbi Philip Scheim and his Conservative rabbinical colleagues who have opted for Siddur Hadash (Conservative shuls adopt new siddur, CJN, March 6) are free to adopt their liturgical book of choice based their congregations' preferences, and I applaud them for selecting a siddur that includes transliteration. However, the reasons Rabbi Scheim lists for choosing not to use the Siddur Sim Shalom, the official siddur of the Conservative Movement, are flawed.

Rabbi Scheim is bothered by Sim Shalom's optional inclusion of the matriarchs in the Amidah. This apparent obstacle can be solved by simply choosing to read the traditional liturgy, which is set as the standard text within the siddur. The text, which includes the matriarchs, is on a separate page, allowing congregants and clergy the easy option of turning to the next part of the service.

This, in fact, is part of the beauty of Sim Shalom. It allows Conservative congregations of various liturgical practices to remain unified through the same prayer book.

Rabbi Scheim also takes issue with some liturgical changes within the Sim Shalom. However, many of these adjustments are also found in the Silverman siddur, previously used by these congregations. Rabbi Scheim complains that the Silverman siddur's English translation is not contemporary and that the siddur does not properly deal with events such as the Holocaust and the establishment of the State of Israel. This is all certainly true, yet a siddur that offers a modern English translation and that speaks about the Holocaust and the State of Israel has been in existence within the Conservative movement for more than 20 years - the Siddur Sim Shalom!

Chiropractic treatments

I was taken aback by the title "Kids and chiropractic: proceed with caution" (To Your Health, CJN, Feb. 7). I understand the writer's well-intentioned effort to portray both sides of the issue. However, the end result was a distorted picture. There are many studies showing the safety and beneficial health effects of chiropractors adjusting children.

There is also ample scientific evidence showing the safety of chiropractic neck adjustments ("Dangers of chiropractic treatment," CJN letters, Feb. 28). The most recent study, in the journal Spine, showed no more increased risk of stroke, whether a person visited a chiropractor or a medical doctor, and that, in general, the correlative cases of stroke were not causal (i.e., the chiropractor did not cause it).

Perspectives

Associated has come a long way

By STEPHEN SPEISMAN

Special to The CJN

In the first decade of 20th-century Toronto, eastern European Jews came to outnumber those from England whose religious life centred around Holy Blossom synagogue. A majority of the Lithuanian, Galician and Polish Jews resided in St. John's Ward, an area bounded by College Street, University Avenue, Yonge Street and Adelaide Street and consisting primarily of dilapidated frame cottages.

Most eked out a living in the garment factories located on Church and Wellington streets, or at Eaton's, adjacent to the Ward. Others peddled goods in the city or in the countryside, or collected discarded materials that they sold to waste processors. A few became bakers or opened second-hand furniture or clothing stores, or sold groceries and confectionery. Life was hard. Toronto was not a welcoming place.

North America had the reputation in Europe of offering economic opportunity, but adverse conditions for the survival of Judaism. Consequently, few qualified teachers immigrated. As a result, Jewish education in Toronto was dominated by siddur melamdin, teachers of the prayerbook, who had only an elementary knowledge of Jewish law and the Hebrew language and became teachers because they could not succeed in business. A qualified teacher charged an average of $2 a month, while a siddur melamed could be had for 50 cents, a great attraction to the impoverished Jews of the Ward.

A few opened chederim (schoolrooms) in their own homes, but most qualified teachers and charlatans alike offered instruction in their students' kitchens. The synagogues of this period, with the exception of Holy Blossom, did not see education as part of their function. Indifferent parents easily found an excuse to provide their children with no Jewish education whatsoever. As the Jewish population grew, this sorry state became increasingly obvious.

The impetus for a communal Talmud Torah came from Rabbi Jacob Gordon, who had arrived in 1905 to be spiritual leader of Goel Tzedec and Beth Hamidrash Hagadol, the Lithuanian and Russian shuls respectively. He rallied the wealthier balabatim (mainstays) of those synagogues in a fundraising effort, and in 1907, he purchased an eight-room house on Simcoe Street immediately west of the Ward. Here they established the Toronto Hebrew Religion School, colloquially known as the Simcoe Street Talmud Torah, modeled on a similar one in Pittsburgh.

The history of the Associated Hebrew Schools had begun.

The plan was to keep tuition low by promoting "membership," regardless of whether a family had a student in the school. Rabbi Gordon combed the city for qualified teachers. Messrs. Madorsky, Steiner, and Greenberg comprised the staff, in addition to Ben-Zion Nathanson, a Lithuanian Hebraist from the United States, who served as principal. Rabbi Gordon also taught occasionally.

The Talmud Torah offered no secular subjects and met after the conclusion of the public school day. Although initially only boys were admitted, the school would later teach girls as well. The curriculum included Bible, Halachah and Talmud.

The philosophy at Simcoe Street reflected Rabbi Gordon's outlook and still characterizes Associated. The school taught traditional Judaism, as well as Zionism and loyalty to Canada, and encouraged secular education and athletics. Only qualified teachers would be engaged, and instruction and conversation in Hebrew were employed.

In Europe, a Talmud Torah was considered an institution only for the poor who could not afford private instruction. Simcoe Street, however, was able to overcome this stigma and attracted even the children of the prosperous simply because of the quality of the education offered. Tuition ranged from $3 to $25 a year, but those unable to afford the cost were admitted free. About 100 students attended in School, popularly called the Brunswick Talmud Torah, continued the afternoon-school operation of Simcoe Street and was envisioned as attracting both Orthodox and liberal Jews, and providing education for adults as well as children. The term "free" school did not mean that there was no tuition, but rather that no ideology other than traditional Judaism was emphasized. The athletic facilities would be shared by the YMHA, which then rented quarters at the corner of College and Brunswick and in the next decade would build on the north side of the Talmud Torah.

At first, Brunswick Avenue was an unequalled success. By 1926, the school had expanded to include a junior high school, and a number of local teachers disbanded their own chederim the early years; their number increased as the Jewish population grew. It was intended that the school would serve the broad spectrum of the community rather than those from any particular European country.

By the end of World War I, the bulk of the Jewish community was moving westward out of the Ward, primarily to streets between McCaul and Bathurst streets.

Prosperous professionals and manufacturers located on Beverley Street and later on Palmerston Boulevard, storekeepers in the developing Kensington Market, and along College Street. Although the Talmud Torah now had almost 250 students, enrolment was declining because Simcoe Street was now remote from the majority of potential students. Even so, the school was uncomfortably overcrowded. In 1917, Rabbi Gordon, together with Louis Levinsky, who had been president since the institution's inception, embarked on a personal fundraising campaign that enabled the purchase of property on Brunswick Avenue north of College.

After much debate, and committee visits to New York and Philadelphia, Benjamin Brown, Toronto's first practising Jewish architect, was hired to design a state-of-the-art facility that could also serve as a Jewish community centre, although the school board initially declined to permit use of the building for this purpose.

Opened late in 1925, the building included 15 classrooms able to accommodate 800 students, a 1,300-seat auditorium-banquet hall, fireproof concrete flooring, a gymnasium, and other recreational facilities. The Toronto Hebrew Free and joined the faculty. Nevertheless, Brunswick was never able to eliminate private instruction, congregational schools or the multitude of chederim. Furthermore, secularist parents objected to the religious bent of the school and enrolled their children in the various secular Jewish schools that had been established in the city. Simcoe Street remained open until 1928, when its classes merged with Brunswick.

The Depression of the 1930s took its toll on the Hebrew Free School. Enrolment, which stood at more than 400 in 1932, began to decline, and its deficit increased, despite an attempt to use profits from the supervision of kosher meat to subsidize the school. By 1935, the school was unable to cover the teachers' salaries. The Talmud Torah hung on for 12 weeks while the teachers continued to work without pay. Ultimately, it had to declare bankruptcy and close. Planning and fundraising efforts by prominent members of the community, which would result in the creation of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, permitted the school to reopen after nine weeks as the Jewish Centre of Educational and Communal Activities. Fortunately, the building was up to the challenge.

By the early 1940s, many in the Jewish community were confident enough in their position in Canadian society to no longer fear that a day school education would hamper students in their future careers. Consequently, an all-day kindergarten was opened at Brunswick Avenue, with Toby Taback as its first teacher. Another grade would be added each year to offer both the public school curriculum and Jewish studies. The first Grade 1 class had 25 students. This department was named the Toronto Hebrew Day School. However, afternoon classes continued.

The 1940s saw the development of a system of affiliated afternoon branches in various parts of the city as the Jewish population began to spread out. Designated the Associated Hebrew Schools, it was the brainchild of Dr. Levi Jacober, principal at Brunswick, and Samuel A. Kurtz, its executive secretary. It included Bais Yehuda Synagogue (Dovercourt Road and Bloor Street), Euclid Avenue Talmud Torah, Shaarei Shomayim Congregation (then on St. Clair Avenue) and a Spadina Road branch at Hawarden Public School in Forest Hill. The goal was to provide uniform standards and shared staff. Average tuition was $6 per month for the afternoon classes and $84 a year for the day school.

By the early 1950s, it was evident that the Jewish population was moving northward, especially along Bathurst Street. Despite a huge deficit, sod was turned for a new school at Bathurst and Neptune Drive in the spring of 1955. With 60 classrooms, an auditorium/synagogue, science labs and a gymnasium, the school welcomed students from the three major strands of Judaism, reinforcing the philosophy of a seamless peoplehood and Zionism. Associated now represented one of the largest day-school systems in North America. It soon outgrew the Neptune building, necessitating its enlargement and the renting of facilities at area synagogues.

As the demographics of the Jewish community changed over the next 15 years, Associated struggled to keep up, with portables at Neptune, and a new school at Finch and Bathurst in 1972. A perceived shift of Jews to the city's northeast in the early 1980s led the school to purchase a 15-acre site on Leslie Street south of Steeles Avenue. The result was a splendid 150,000-square foot building planned to accommodate 1,200 students and offer cultural and athletic facilities to the Jewish community. Although the Jewish population continued to grow in the northeast, young families with school-aged children tended to locate close to the Bathurst Street corridor.

Thus, through the good offices of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, land was acquired on Atkinson Avenue in Thornhill and the Leslie Street building was eventually sold. The Neptune branch was demolished and a smaller building was erected on part of the site.

As Associated celebrates its centenary, the institution flourishes far beyond what could have been imagined by its founders. It has continued to remain true to its founding principles: the provision of excellence in both Jewish and secular education, adherence to tradition, and the promotion of a wide community outlook, as well as a love of Israel and the Hebrew language.

Over the past century, Associated Hebrew Schools has demonstrated a willingness to accommodate changing demographics and the needs of a growing, modern Jewish community. It is no surprise that many of its graduates have come to hold positions of leadership in various parts of our community.

Stephen Speisman is the author of The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937. He was the founding director of the Ontario Jewish Archives and is a former executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park.

Musings on marriage

March 27 is my anniversary. Forty-three years! That sounds like a lot in these divorce-happy times. People don't stick together for long — they're afraid of commitment or growing apart, or they're just plain unable to be faithful. Some say that marriage to one person was never meant to last so long. As we gain in the longevity battle, we seem to lose in the marital one.

Norma Baumei Joseph in Montreal

In my crowd, that number — 43 — is not so unusual. Most of us have been married to the same partner for that many years or more. Our parents, too, were among the longtime married.

Yet we are aware of our surroundings — we know that we're statistical anomalies. I have no idea why we were able to make it last while others were not. I have no clue as to why we chose well, or even if we chose well, or if we just stubbornly made it work.

Perhaps it was a bit of both. I do know that most of us married young and worked hard to stay that way.

It was never easy. We didn't ride off into the clouds of wedded bliss. We fought and bickered and struggled. But we learned to trust and cleave and love.

To a certain extent, we grew up together. I know I did. I got married in my third year of university. I was, in large part, unformed. My husband and I jointly became adults.

We informed each other and learned to depend on each other. It wasn't easy, but in some ways, early seems good in this day and age.

I know the current wisdom is that later is better. Let them grow up, get a career, know their minds. But that leads to a maturity that is sometimes inflexible, apprehensive, distrustful and incapable of compromise. Perhaps the ability to share bedroom space is vitiated by living alone for too long.

Obviously, no equation works for everyone. And who are we to judge? In some communities, later is better. In others, early works. In some, a shadchan is mandated. In others, open-market meeting is the rule. In each case, we hope we meet the right person and that it lasts. We hope it works.

But if it doesn't, thank God there's such a thing as divorce. Marriage is great if it works. It's awful if it doesn't. There's no shame in admitting that it's failed. Just make sure you give it your best shot. When necessary, get out and look again.

That's the humanity in Judaism.

If some people pervert its basic sensitivity by holding women hostage to male divorce control, they pervert God's law and we're all to blame for being complicit. No one should sit idly by while this happens, for it demeans our religion, rabbis and community.

Happy anniversary!

My chance to mould young minds

Some months ago, I wrote a column about a social studies textbook being used in B.C. classrooms that contained a pernicious sidebar about the modern State of Israel.

Recently a class using that very textbook came to our synagogue to learn about Judaism and the Jewish community — 500 Grade 8 students whose contact with living Jews was minimal, if they had experienced any at all.

What could I say that would put what they might have read into some context?

The class was a study in the demographics of British Columbia's Lower Mainland, with students whose families came from Asia, from the Indian subcontinent, from eastern Europe — indeed from all over the world. Many, but not all, were Christians, but others were Sikh, Hindu and probably Muslim.

We were given a generous 40 minutes in which to discuss Judaism and the local Jewish community. This required condensing 3,800 years of the development of modern Judaism, plus giving a brief overview of how the local community functions.

Given the impossibility of such a task, what was a girl to do?

I hoped that those familiar with the Christian Bible would relate to the stories of Abraham, Jacob and Joseph, the saga of Moses (they had prepared by watching the film The Prince of Egypt) and the Exodus, but after that, I expected that there would be a wilderness of ignorance. Maybe some had heard about the kings of Israel, but beyond that, nothing.

For those who didn't have one of the three western monotheistic religions as part of their backgrounds, we would have to start from scratch.

I started with the founders of the Israelite nation, Abraham and Sarah, and the beginning of monotheism. I described slavery in Egypt and the central importance of the Exodus story — that gave me a chance to talk about Passover and national liberation. I talked about the entry into the land of Israel and how the land of Israel, central to Judaism, at one time housed the Temple in the capital, Jerusalem, and how the present State of Israel has been reborn as a modern nation.

I was able to compare the idea of Judaism as a religion based on a code of laws to Islam, which also requires a commitment to a system of laws regulating private and communal life. I described the role of the rabbi as scholar, teacher and moral authority, noting that Judaism has no sacraments similar to Christian communion and no priesthood.

I talked about kashrut and the respect it engenders for animals. I described home-based holidays (e.g., Passover and Chanukah) and the solemn synagogue-based services on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. The students had a chance to see the Torah scrolls in the ark and to look into the prayer book at the Shema, which I likened to our basic creed.

Then I waited for the questions.

They wanted to know why the boys had to wear kippot and what they signified, and whether girls and boys had the same responsibilities. I noted that had they themselves been Jewish, they would have celebrated a bar or bat mitzvah at the ages they are now (12 and 13).

Why did we practise animal sacrifice? The question offered me the chance to assure them that today's Judaism is not to be found in the biblical account alone, but in the rulings of the rabbis, and that following the destruction of the Temple 2,000 years ago, we no longer worshipped in the same fashion, but in the synagogue, having replaced sacrifice with prayer.

And then came the big one: do Jews believe that Jesus was the Messiah?

Finally, I had the chance then to talk about the Jewish idea of the messianic era, the time of peace and universal harmony.

Whatever they knew, or thought they knew, about Jews and Judaism (and I'm sure some of them harboured more than a little prejudice), this was a chance to really engage their ideas about justice — on which teens are very, very strong — and Judaism's commitment to a future just society.

Whatever else they came away with, I can only hope I gave them positive insight into a religion that they knew very little about. At least it was a start.

In support of Canadian Jewish Congress

Articles strongly criticizing the work of the Canadian Jewish Congress, by Laura Rosen Cohen and Colby Cosh, recently appeared in the National Post.

Cohen would have Congress address issues of essentially minor parochial concern of little interest in serving the long-term interests of our community.

Cosh focused on Congress' long-time support of anti-discrimination laws and the human rights commissions that administer those laws, as well as Congress' support of the hate propaganda provisions in the Criminal Code. He described Congress as a member of the "anti-hate community." It is hard to understand why any right-thinking Canadian would not be proud to be a member of a so-called anti-hate community.

Although I work with Congress as a member of its newly elected board of directors, I am not an apologist for Congress. In fact, board members are often Congress' greatest critics. However, I am both assured and impressed that the CJC as a national Jewish organization is expending its energy in positive, progressive and forward-looking ways in order to serve the interests of Canadian Jewry and Canadian society at large.

Traditionally, the social action agenda of Congress has addressed important issues that affect society at large and those who are marginalized, including issues relating to the disabled, victims of poverty or injustice.

Congress has a long history of involvement in the development of ground-breaking fundamental legislation. CJC had a major role in the development of legislation combating discrimination in employment, housing and public services, dating back to the origins of the Ontario Human Rights Code. In the 1960s, Congress' work with groups such as the Jewish Labour Committee and the Ontario Black Coalition led to the development of the code led the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

Congress also served as an advocate in the development of anti-hate propaganda legislation, which led to the amendments to the Criminal Code.

More recently, Congress has addressed a potpourri of legal issues of concern to the Jewish community. These include legal proceedings related to the deportation of war criminals, the prosecution of those who propagate hate, and measures to assist Jewish Canadians improperly prosecuted or imprisoned in foreign lands.

CJC has consistently viewed anti-hate propaganda legislation as providing a "fence of protection" for vulnerable minorities, given that history has demonstrated that hateful words can lead to hateful actions.

With the dark experience of the Holocaust etched into our very fabric, we, as a community, are particularly sensitive to the heart-rending hardships suffered by those in Darfur and elsewhere in the world. In furtherance of our Jewish values, we remain aware, vigilant and responsive to similar injustices and human suffering wherever they occur.

Congress supports the preservation and enhancement of Canada's many multicultural and multi-ethnic communities. It works closely with other segments of our society in order to foster mutually beneficial relationships and to support the aspirations of other segments of the Canadian population. This has included meetings with members of Canada's Muslim community, First Nations communities and others.

Congress has also been concerned with cutting-edge issues that confront Canadian policymakers, such as immigration, the funding of religiously based private schools and a host of issues dominating the contemporary political agenda. The CJC has been involved with the reasonable accommodation debate in Quebec, which affects those who wish to observe particular minority religious practices. Another important debate relates to the applicability of religiously based law such as Halachah or sharia in family-law-related issues versus the desire that all persons be treated equally under the law. And, of course, Congress deals with the ever-looming threat of anti-Semitism.

Other Jewish organizations are also dedicated to the achievement of similar goals, but in representing the various organized Jewish communities across Canada, Congress plays a major, leading role in addressing these objectives.

The leadership of Congress rests in the hands of dedicated individuals who, like Congress itself, are committed to ensuring the well-being of Canadian Jewry. Congress is not immune from informed criticism or constructive suggestions. But this vital organization should be supported and lauded for its enlightened, effective and strategic advocacy in support of our community interests and in support of a better Canada for all.

Israel as portrayed in Hollywood movies

How have Hollywood feature films portrayed Israel? Israel will soon mark 60 years of statehood, so now is as good a time as any to consider this question. To get a handle on the subject, I borrowed three "oldies" — The Juggler, Exodus and Cast A Giant Shadow — and one fairly new film, Munich, from Brahm Goldfarb at the Toronto Jewish Media Centre.

The Juggler, directed by Edward Dmytryk and produced by Stanley Kramer, was released in 1953 and stars the masculine Kirk Douglas as a German Jewish Holocaust survivor who's haunted by the murder of his family. Shot in black and white, the film opens in 1949 as a boatload of refugees, wearing hats and scarves, arrives in Haifa. They are then transported to a camp near the Mediterranean Sea. Hans Muller (Douglas), a juggler and ventriloquist, is among the new arrivals. He is torn by the recent past. He relishes the illustrious career he had as an entertainer in pre-Nazi Germany, but is wracked by guilt because he did not leave when it was still possible. Muller is warmly welcomed to Israel, yet a camp official makes it clear that his skills are irrelevant in a raw, somewhat underdeveloped country suffering from food shortages. Observing Muller's erratic behaviour, a doctor prescribes psychiatric treatment.

Feeling under-appreciated, Muller leaves the camp, passing himself off as an American as he heads to Haifa. There, he has an altercation with a police officer and meets Yehoshua (Joseph Walsh), a bright-eyed orphan whose parents were killed by the Nazis. They trade Hebrew words and phrases as they walk — yes walk — to Nazareth. Yehoshua is wounded when he stumbles into a minefield, and kibbutzniks tend to him. Muller, meanwhile, attracts the attention of Yael (Milly Vitale), a young woman smitten by his good looks. Eventually, Muller comes to realize that Israel is his home and that he has nothing to fear.

A workmanlike movie with fine performances, The Juggler portrays Israelis as tough and practical idealists and Israel as an austere land besieged and threatened by Arabs.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Exodus, a pro-Zionist blockbuster directed and produced by Otto Preminger and adapted from the pulp novel by Leon Uris, hit theatres in 1960. The young Paul Newman depicts Ari Ben Canaan, a dashing but bitter Sabra of Russian origin sent to Cyprus by the Haganah in 1946. His task is to smuggle Jewish refugees to Palestine (which is still controlled by Britain). His British foes are a mixed lot. Sutherland (Ralph Richardson), a general based in Cyprus, is somewhat sympathetic to the plight of these Jews. Major Caldwell (Peter Lawford), his snotty and casually anti-Semitic assistant, claims that Sutherland is descended from Jews. Kitty Freemont (Eva Marie Saint), a Presbyterian nurse from Indiana whose husband was killed in Palestine while on duty as a news photographer, is on a visit to Cyprus. At Sutherland's suggestion, she volunteers her services at a detention camp brimming with refugees. Yet she feels "strange" among Jews. In the camp, she meets Karen (Jill Haworth), a strikingly blonde Jewish orphan whom she hopes to adopt and take to the United States.

Kirk Douglas in Cast A Giant Shadow

Exodus' sub-themes are set in Palestine. Ari and Kitty fall in love against the backdrop of violence. Dov Landau (Sal Mineo), a pugnacious Auschwitz survivor, joins the Irgun and helps blow up a wing of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem. After he is caught and imprisoned in Acre prison, Ben Canaan and his commandos try to free him and his fellow freedom fighters. Ideological tension erupts between Landau's Irgun mentor, Akiva (David Opatoshu), and Ari's father, Barak, (Lee J. Cobb), a mainstream Zionist. Taha (John Derek), a Palestinian Arab who has known Jews all his life and lives next to a youth village to which has donated land, must decide where he stands as the United Nations partitions Palestine and Israel declares statehood.

Like The Juggler, Exodus portrays Palestinian Jews sympathetically, and quaintly enough, they are referred to simply as "Palestinians."

Exodus, whose musical score is mesmerizing, is a marathon, clocking in at 208 minutes. Although it is epic in scale, with performances to match, it clearly could have benefited from tighter editing. It ends on a sanguine note as Ari expresses the hope that Jews and Arabs can coexist.

Cast A Giant Shadow (1966), directed by Melville Shavelson, is based on Ted Berkman's biography of the Jewish war hero David Daniel (Mickey) Marcus, Israel's first general. A West Point graduate, a lawyer in civilian life and a desk soldier in World War II who nonetheless participated in the Normandy invasion and then played a role in the Nuremberg war crimes trials, Marcus was recruited by the nascent state of Israel as a military adviser to the Haganah. In tragic circumstances, he was fatally shot by an Israeli sentry.

The film, 138 minutes in length, starts in New York City in December 1947 as Marcus hurries to an appointment and is intercepted by a persistent Haganah emissary. Marcus (Kirk Douglas), an assimilated Jew, is reluctant to join the cause and, like his wife, believes that the Jews stand no chance of defeating the Arabs. But he finally relents, saying, "Someone has to help them fight back." Israel's chances of surviving the expected Arab onslaught are slight. A U.S. army officer Marcus consults spells out his views graphically. This "pipsqueak nation" is going to be "blown off the map," he predicts. Marcus, arriving in Palestine under the pseudonym of Michael Stone, gets a foretaste of things as his airport bus is raked by Arab machine gunfire. He also meets Magda (Senta Berger), a gutsy soldier with whom he will fall in love.

Cast A Giant Shadow, which artistically is a better film than Exodus, unfolds against the backdrop of the Normandy landing, Arab-Israeli battles and Marcus' contribution to Israel's organizational and fighting abilities. Marcus is given credit for folding Israel's quarrelsome militias into a unified force and outwitting the Arabs by building the Burma Road to Jerusalem.

Douglas acquires himself well, while John Wayne is all wind and bluster as an American general who comically mispronounces the blessing "L'chaim" as he encourages Marcus to fight on. Yul Brynner and Frank Sinatra respectively play a Haganah commander and an American volunteer pilot. Douglas' son, Michael, appears fleetingly as an Israeli jeep driver. Cast A Giant Shadow is a tribute to Marcus, a courageous and resourceful strategist who discovered his Jewish identity in Israel. "He was the best man we had," Ben-Gurion observed in an epitaph.

Munich, an action-packed Steven Spielberg film nearly three hours long that won five Academy Awards, came out in 2005, when the prospect of a rapprochement between Israel and the Palestinians had faded under the impact of the second intifadah.

Adapted from George Jonas' high-voltage book, Vengeance, Munich is about Israel's covert response to the 1972 massacre of 11 Israeli athletes at the summer Olympic Games in Germany. Shocked but unbowed by this horrific incident, Israel's prime minister, Golda Meir, ordered the assassination of its Palestinian planners. The Mossad carried out the strikes in European capitals and the Middle East.

Starring Eric Banna as the Mossad's sensitive team leader, Gila Almagor as his discerning mother, Geoffrey Rush as his hard-boiled case officer and Daniel Craig (the new James Bond) as the team's macho driver, the film is both hair-raising and contemplative, raising legitimate questions about Israel's conflict with the Palestinians and underscoring the need for a Jewish homeland.

Why is the Jewish calendar different each year?

By MICHAEL STAVSKY

Many of us wonder why some years, Pesach occurs in March, and other years, like this one, it comes toward the end of April. The same is said for all the other holidays. Why do we freeze in the sukkah some years and swelter at other times?

The Jewish calendar is based on the monthly lunar cycle. In the time of the Sanhedrin – the supreme judicial body from the time of the Temple until about 425 CE – a new month was not declared until two valid witnesses came forward and testified to the appearance of the new moon. The rabbis would declare that day as the first day of the new month and could then determine when its holidays would occur. They quickly realized that this method of determining new months didn't correspond to the solar calendar.

The lunar year is 354 days long, whereas the solar year is roughly 365 days. Over time, this discrepancy of 11 days would lead to the holidays falling at different times of the year. After 20 years, Pesach would fall in September and Rosh Hashanah in February!

This would not be a problem, had the Torah not stated in Devarim 16:1, "Keep the month of spring and make Pesach." In Shemot 34:18, the Torah also states that we left Egypt during the month of spring. The rabbis understood this to mean that Pesach is Chag HaAviv – the holiday of spring.

In order to keep Pesach in the spring, when declaring the month of the Nisan, the Sanhedrin would determine whether Pesach would fall after Tekufat Nisan – the spring equinox – by observing weather conditions and the sun's angle in the sky. If it was still winter in their estimation, a second Adar would be declared. Pesach would then fall a month later – in spring – and would create a year of 13 months. Such a year is called a shannah me'uberet, literally a "pregnant year."

During the time of Hillel HaNasi (approximately the fourth century CE), with intense Roman persecution of Jews continuing unabated, the system of witnesses testifying before the Sanhedrin could no longer be relied upon. The rabbinical scholars of the time devised a fixed calendar based on a 19-year cycle, starting from the year of Creation. In this system, the holidays would always fall in the correct season.

THE RABBI EMERITUS LECTURE SERIES

Rabbi Avraham Feder, Rabbi Emeritus and Senior Scholar of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, will once again lead us in two inspiring emeritus lectures, Monday, March 31st and Thursday, April 3rd.

This is one of the most popular events at Beth Tikvah, so mark these dates in your calendars and come early!

1. Monday, March 31st at 8:00 p.m.

"Israel at 60: Triumph and Trial"

There is no doubt that Israel's achievements in its 60 years of existence have been by any yardstick miraculous. At the same time, the relentless challenges hurled at the Jewish state by its enemies have burdened the Israeli Jewish population and Jews all over the world with a constant anxiety concerning security and well being for the future. How prepared are we ideologically, emotionally and strategically for what lies ahead?

2. Thursday, April 3rd at 8:00 p.m.

"A Purim for Shylock"

Supposing Mordecai and Esther had found themselves in Shylock's Venice of Shakespeare's "The Merchant of Venice." Or, put another way, supposing Shylock had been transplanted into the Shushan of Mordecai and Esther. Would Shakespeare's play and the biblical Megillat Esther have been written differently? The discussion relates to two strategies for Jewish survival in the diaspora.

The Community is invited to attend; doors open at 7:30 p.m.

There is no charge.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

By RABBI
REUVEN TRADBURKS

The day this issue of The CJN appears is the day our son, Elie, reports to the Israel Defence Forces for his first day of active duty.

In all, 12 young men from Toronto are beginning their training this week in the IDF's volunteer program for non-Israelis.

We asked Elie if he was excited, nervous, and/or proud of what he was doing. "Not really," he answered, "I can't say I'm excited or proud - maybe a bit nervous. This is just what I have to do. Why should my friends who are Israeli serve and I don't do my part? I benefit from the security of Israel, so I need to do my part, too."

In one little expression, Elie summed up Judaism: "I need to do my part."

Whether I would do what he is doing is another matter - I think I would be more than a little nervous, and maybe my part is different than his. I satisfy myself that my contribution to the safety of the Jewish people is in the spiritual realm.

But nonetheless, doing our part is the key, and this theme is reflected in this week's special Torah portion.

I've always been bothered by the "yoke-less cow." In the time of the Temple, when a person came in contact with the dead, they needed to become purified through the red heifer, which was sacrificed and its ashes mixed with water and sprinkled on the person.

But it was not just any red heifer. It had to be a "yoke-less" red heifer. It could never have borne a yoke. In other words, it was a lazy red heifer. A country-club red heifer. A couch-potato red heifer. A hanging-out, shooting-the-breeze, killing-time red heifer.

The requirement that the red heifer should never have borne a yoke is one of those flashing, hot-zone verses in the Torah. Every parshah has one - some detail of the story or mitzvah that kind of sticks out, drawing your attention, even demanding your attention.

Why would a person who has had contact with the dead need to become purified through a "yoke-less" red heifer?

I can't say definitively, but I can take a stab at an answer.

Death is inactivity, the cessation of vibrant life. It is startling in its finality, in its quiet and in its inaction. We call a person who has died a "niftar," a person now exempt from mitzvot. In death, one can no longer bear a yoke, one can no longer do his or her part - that person's time has run out.

In contrast, life is about bearing that yoke, shouldering one's responsibility.

The red heifer may not have borne a yoke. It may have been a lazy, country-club, hanging-out, shooting-the-breeze heifer. But that's not what I'm going to be.

One of the greatest challenges of our time is bucking the indulgent culture of our society and viewing our lives as being full of responsibility.

What is my part, my unique ability, my contribution?

We all have myriad moments to do our part - whether in the unique Jewish activities of keeping Shabbat and keeping kosher, or in interpersonal moments of kindness, or sometimes, in very dramatic fashion, in shouldering heavy communal responsibility in the form of our obligations to the Jewish people. Life is about doing our part: figuring out our unique contribution and then living a life of responsibility.

May it be God's Will that all the young men who are doing their part for the safety of our people in our Land go in peace and return in peace.

Rabbi Tradburks is spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto.

Rabbinic Reflections

The fun of Pesach in Israel

My family and I will be in Israel for Pesach this year, and one of the reasons - if not the main reason - is Cafe Hillel.

The first time we went to Israel for Pesach, a few years ago, my son was excited beyond all measure because he could have the most delicious chocolate cake that he had ever tasted in a cafe on the street - during Pesach!

He wasn't used to being able to eat out on Pesach at all, but to have chocolate cake that tasted so good - so, in his words, "real" - outside our safe, kosher-for-Passover house? What a goldene medinah we had brought him to!

He talked about that cake for years afterward, and he still does. In fact, at every Seder, when we say, "Next year in Jerusalem" he adds, "At Cafe Hillel!" This year, we decided to go back. I hope Cafe Hillel still makes that chocolate cake.

I feel the reality of living in the Diaspora so much during Pesach. There's no Cafe Hillel, and no people eating pesachdik chocolate cake under the sun at a sidewalk cafe.

Purim is OK in Toronto. We can see kids in costumes up and down Bathurst Street and not feel too weird delivering our mishloach manot down the street.

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi
Elyse
Goldstein

But Pesach? In Jerusalem, you go to a beautiful outdoor market, overflowing with colours and sounds, and the cheese seller looks at you quizzically when you ask which cheese is kosher! Pesach.

"Lady," he says with a laugh, "this is Israel! All my cheese is kosher for Passover!"

In Toronto, you drive up to Thornhill and hope that some kosher cheese is left the week before Pesach, because you haven't kashered your kitchen yet and you didn't buy it a month in advance.

In Jerusalem, Sephardi-style rice and chick peas are the norm, not the exception. The talk in shul is about the responsa suggesting that all Jews adopt these Sephardi Pesach leniencies for the sake of Klal Yisrael.

In Toronto, the talk is all about new strictures - what we can't eat this year that we could last year, and what new matzah kugel we can invent with the same few outrageously expensive, chemically filled, canned, kosher-for-Passover ingredients.

In Jerusalem, you can hear the sounds of Chad Gadya in open windows on the night of the seder, and your office is closed the next day, even if you're the most secular Jew around. You take the day off and relish the freedom of not being a slave in the modern world.

In Toronto, your phone still rings in the middle of the seder with telemarketers who don't know its your holy day, and your kids have to take the day off school, hoping they haven't missed a test.

In Israel, the flowers are blooming and the air is warm for Pesach. You can swim during chol hamoad and break out your sandals.

In Toronto, it might still be snowing.

In Jerusalem... well, it almost makes you want to live there.

At least for the week of Pesach.

Jewish Life

With the United States and possibly the world economy teetering on the brink of recession, central bankers around the world have been feverishly trying to ensure that credit will remain readily available. Thus, there has been a continuing lowering of interest rates and the infusion of literally hundreds of billions of dollars into the marketplace in an effort to ward off a crisis that could wipe out millions of jobs and trillions of dollars.

While the scale might be smaller, our talmudic sages, well versed in the workings of the marketplace, were not averse to instituting new laws to deal with a potential lack of credit. Perhaps the most far reaching was the waiving of the requirement to cross-examine witnesses in loan transactions. Biblical law requires that in order to collect on a disputed loan, two witnesses, who would be subjected to harsh cross-examination, must testify as to the veracity of the monies owing. (If only one witness was produced, the defendant would be required to take an oath that no monies are owing in order to be exempt from payment.)

Yet enforcing such a requirement might ultimately cause lenders to stop lending, worrying that the collection process is too burdensome and expensive. Thus "in order not to close the gate to debtors" (Sanhedrin 3a), our sages dropped this requirement, opening up the credit markets in the process.

Avoiding the credit crunch

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The enactment by Hillel of the Pruzbul in the first century BCE is another measure that was taken to keep credit lines open. The Torah rules that loans still outstanding at the close of the shmittah year (the current one ends Sept. 30) are to be cancelled. It also forbids people from refusing to lend money in anticipation of the shmittah year. When Hillel saw that many were nonetheless refusing to lend money, fearing the inability to collect – in effect displaying a lack of trust in God – he instituted a legal mechanism by which loans were transferred to the beit din (Jewish court). As only individual loans are cancelled by the end of the shmittah year, this device enabled people to collect loans after the shmittah year, and thus the needy continued to have access to capital.

The ability of the sages to "circumvent" biblical law in monetary matters is a well-established principle of Jewish law, based on the concept of "hefker beit din hefker," that the court has the right to declare property ownerless and to transfer title from one party to another. This idea has found an echo in western legal tradition, which allow governments to expropriate property when deemed necessary for the public good. While the court has the right when necessary to transfer property against a person's will, two willing individuals may also "make a condition against the law of the Torah." To cite one example: Torah law states that one who borrows an object is liable for damages, even if caused by events beyond his control. Yet, if the parties agree, a condition can be inserted into the loan agreement exempting the borrower from such unforeseen circumstances.

While Jewish law tried to ensure that even the poor had access to credit, lenders were not required to take on unnecessary risk. Proper collateral could be demanded and debtors were expected to go to extraordinary lengths to repay monies owing. In fact Jewish law has no provision for bankruptcy. Yet at the same time, Jewish law prohibits asking someone for a loan repayment when it's known that they don't have the ability to comply. A creditor is even forbidden from going out of his way to greet the debtor, since such encounters can cause a great sense of embarrassment to the debtor.

Little did Rabbi Dov Behr Manischewitz know over a century ago that his name would become associated with one of the largest kosher wine companies in the world. Despite their popularity, labels like Cream Peach, Loganberry and the venerable Concord Grape haven't convinced wine drinkers that kosher wines can compare with the finest that France, Italy or California have to offer.

Many kosher winemakers say their products can rival the best in the world. And they are trying to get that message across by some pretty sophisticated sites on the Internet. So what better time to sample their sites as we begin the countdown for Passover!

Where did the idea that "kosher wine" equals "sweet wine" come from? According to the Kosher Wine Institute, the poor quality of some kosher wine is "due largely to historical circumstance. The Concord grape, the only available variety for Jewish immigrants arriving in the New York area, is an acidic grape which must be balanced with sugar to be enjoyed. Hence, sweet wine. Time passes, and compromise becomes tradition." [tinyurl.com/33qyou]

If extra sugar and Concord grapes don't make a wine kosher, then what does? [tinyurl.com/2v2jhg] The rules surrounding the production of kosher wine are much more stringent than those regarding other kinds of kosher food. Equipment to make the wine must be used exclusively for the production of kosher products. Only Sabbath-observant Jews can

Kosher wine: that was then handle the grapes and wine. In fact, no non-Jew can come in direct contact with the wine or associated machinery unless the juice has been briefly heated (mevushal) to between 80 and 90 degrees Celsius. [simchawine.com/kosher.html]

Many critics of kosher wine claim that this heat-flash pasteurization damages the wine, but winemakers say modern techniques minimize effects of the heating. For a lively discussion, see Mevushal Need Not be Nasty. [tinyurl.com/2meowp]

Jewish winemaking goes a bit further back than the Concord grapes of New York. Israel's premier wine critic, Daniel Rogov, suggests that although the land has a tradition of winemaking that stretches back millennia, those ancient wines were nothing to write home about. "The wines shipped to ancient Egypt were so bad that they had to be seasoned with honey, pepper and juniper berries to make them palatable, and those sent to Rome and England during the height of ancient Roman civilization were so thick and sweet that no modern connoisseur could possibly approve of them. So bad were most of these wines that it was probably a good thing that the Muslim conquest in 636 CE imposed a 1,200-year halt to the local wine industry." [tinyurl.com/3x7q4f]

Jump forward a few centuries to the 1890s, when Baron Edmond de Rothschild felt the country vintners deserved another chance. He built two large wineries that would become Carmel Wines, Israel's largest. [tinyurl.com/22qmhZ] On this side of the Atlantic, the Herzog family's giant Royal Wine Corporation traces its roots to 19th-century Czechoslovakia. The company is now based in New York and is known for its Kedem and Baron Herzog lines. [kedemwines.com] Another well-known name, Schapiro's Wines, was founded in 1899. The company's motto was "wine so thick you can cut it with a knife." [tinyurl.com/yuuV5m]

I found a delightful piece of Jewish wine trivia about the non-Jewish Martini Wine Company, one of the few wineries in the United States to remain in operation during Prohibition. When Narciso Martini found out that rabbis were each allowed 50 gallons of wine per year for religious purposes, "he shipped as much as 10,000 gallons of wine a year – all perfectly legal – to rabbis in New York for the duration of this period. 'It's amazing,' Elmo, his son, once recalled, 'how many more rabbis there suddenly were in New York during Prohibition.'" [tinyurl.com/2yb69q]

And Manischewitz? Actually Manischewitz wine is not produced by Rabbi Dov Behr's B. Manischewitz Company. History students plan women's seder at CHAT

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Students in Leila Roiter's class on "Women in Jewish History," a Grade 12 elective at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's south campus, are putting on a women's seder next week.

The event was Roiter's idea, but students are doing all the planning and will lead the seder.

"We're all responsible for creating one or two pages in the Haggadah," said Spencer Hoffman, one of five males in the 22-person class, who added that he was put in charge of publicizing the event.

Familiar seder elements such as the "four sons" cited in the Haggadah will be replaced by "four daughters," and there will be a focus on Miriam's cup rather than Eliyahu's, because "Miriam is such an integral part of the Passover story," Hoffman said.

An orange on the seder plate has become a mainstay of feminist seders, which originated in the United States in the late 1970s or early 1980s.

The students' seder will feature seder plates with and without oranges, however, to show both continuity and change, Roiter said.

The orange on the seder plate dates back to the early 1980s, when Jewish feminist and author Susannah Heschel, now a Jewish history professor at Dartmouth College, was invited to speak at Oberlin College.

The next Passover, she placed an orange on her family's seder plate, in response to a feminist Haggadah written by Oberlin students that included a crust of bread on the seder plate as a sign of solidarity with Jewish lesbians.

Bread, Heschel explains, renders everything chametz, so instead, she used an orange to express solidarity with lesbians, gay men and others who are marginalized in the Jewish community, including widows.

Also, she wrote in 2001, an orange represents "fruitfulness" when lesbians and gay men are contributing and active members of Jewish life.

"A Jew is a Jew," Heschel told The C.J.N. last week. "I think we need solidarity."

At the upcoming school seder — although the students have been made aware of the historical significance of the orange, which will be mentioned as part of the program — "we want to focus on the role of women having an opportunity for expression and participation," particularly in light of the focus of the course, Roiter said.

Hoffman, who signed up for the course after hearing positive things about it from his older sister, said that "it's really cool to see everything from a different perspective... We end up having a lot of discussion."

Also, he added, he enjoys politics and history. As part of the course, he is working on a project about former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir.

About 100 family members and friends are expected to take part in the seder, which Roiter said symbolizes "an ongoing theme in Jewish history" — the balance between tradition and continuity.

Roiter, who helped develop the course in 2002, organized a women's seder for her students four years ago, but her wedding and an extended maternity leave were factors in the event's ensuing hiatus.

Although women's seders are not traditional, there are observant women who participate in them, Roiter said.

She believes it's "good for students to see that not just one segment of the population owns that passion and tradition."

The school administration has been supportive of the project, she added.

"I'm hoping students will see that it's possible to maintain traditional Judaism and honour Jewish women's contributions."

Nisan elevates our happiness

Within every 19-year cycle, years 3, 6, 8, 11, 14, 17 and 19 would be me'uberet (leap years); and all others not. This would always ensure that Pesach would come during spring.

But why add a second Adar and not a second Kislev or some other month? During the first and second Temple periods, every Jew was required to bring the Pesach sacrifice, as commemorated by the shank bone on our seder plates. The Sanhedrin wanted to ensure that enough sheep would be available for every family to do this. They estimated the herd's numbers during Adar. Kabbalists point out that the Mazal (Zodiac sign) for Adar is Pisces, which is represented by twin fish. This corresponds to the two Adars.

During Adar, we are joyful because of the miracle of Purim. When Nisan arrives, this happiness is further elevated, as it's the month of our redemption from Egyptian bondage. May this festive time of the year be one of peace and celebration for all of us.

Rabbi Michael Stavsky received smichah last summer from Yeshivat Pirchei Shoshanim in Jerusalem. He works as a graphic artist in the The C.J.N.'s production department.

Teacher puts positive spin on disability

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Batya Feigenbaum was born, she suffered a spinal cord injury so severe that doctors offered her parents little hope that she would live a normal life, let alone survive her first night.

Today the ebullient 23-year-old is a grade 9 and 10 Jewish studies teacher at the Orthodox girls' high school Tiferes Bais Yaakov who uses a motorized scooter – and, for brief periods, crutches – switching to a wheelchair for Shabbat.

"They are our teachers..."

In the classroom, Feigenbaum doesn't see her disability as an issue. Although it's difficult for her to write on the chalkboard, because her walking is limited, she says she uses her challenge as a "tool," getting students to write on the board instead.

She also has students hand out papers for her, and said that after the first few days of the school year – once they see that she is comfortable with her disability – they become comfortable with it too.

Her birth injury in the course of an emergency caesarian section at a hospital in Israel initially left Feigenbaum as a quadriplegic, not breathing on her own. She began to undergo therapy within days of her birth, and the family moved to Toronto when she was two years old to pursue new treatments that were not available in Israel at the time.

In Israel, she recovered movement in her upper body, but it wasn't until she came to Canada with her American-born parents and her siblings that she gained feeling in her legs and started crawling at age three, six months after beginning experimental therapy.

Feigenbaum's work day is divided into morning classes and afternoons working as the school secretary. She is also running student council activities to fill in for a co-worker until Pesach.

Her ability to multi-task is evident, as she tends deftly and kindly to the needs of a student who is writing a test by herself, barely interrupting the flow of her interview with The CJN.

Batya Feigenbaum says that once students see that she is comfortable with her disability, they become comfortable too. [Frances Kraft photo] she attended for a year after high school.

"I love it," Feigenbaum says of her teaching career. "I can't imagine doing anything else."

"You're making a difference in someone's life."

The daughter of two educators – her mother Lani teaches kindergarten – Feigenbaum said her parents never pushed her to enter the field. "This is who I am," she said.

A lesson from the teacher: "I think that life is really what you make of it. There's a reason for everything. I very strongly believe that... You can become bitter, sad and angry, or rise above it and make the most of it."

Although she sees herself as "very easygoing" in the classroom, she said she always starts out "tough" at the beginning of the year.

"In certain aspects, I'm strict," she said. "I give [students] a quiz every class – just five questions, to review."

That doesn't always go over well at first, Feigenbaum admitted, but with time, she believes her students appreciate that it helps them learn the material.

Because she is "close enough in age [to her students]...

that I'm still sort of cool," Feigenbaum said it's easy to have a good relationship with her students.

"I think it's a balance. If the girls respect you, you don't need to be extremely tough with them."

While they know that she's "their friend," she said, "there's still that distance, because I'm their teacher."

Feigenbaum – who grew up doing household chores just like her siblings, and who got her driver's licence at 17 (to operate a vehicle with hand controls) – is being honoured this week at a fundraising dinner for DANI, an organization that helps young adults with special needs. She has been honoured in a similar way twice before.

She said that she agreed to be honoured, despite some discomfort with the idea, because it can raise awareness about the abilities of people with disabilities.

Upcoming spring aliyah fair presents benefits for olim

The Israel Aliyah Centre spring fair is set for April 2, at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Israeli experts will be on hand to talk about topics of interest to people making aliyah or thinking about doing so, including the new tax regulations and the health system in Israel. Representatives from the ministry of absorption will talk about the job market and employment.

As well, there will be representatives from a number of cities that are offering benefits to new olim, and from Israel House who will talk to returning Israelis about benefits for those who return this year.

The fair also gives potential olim the opportunity to start networking and bring resumes to employment experts who can meet with them one-on-one after the presentation.

Liane Sela, regional director of the Aliyah Centre, affiliated with the Jewish Agency for Israel, said the new partnership between the Aliyah Centre and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is helping to create an "aliyah buzz in the community and put aliyah on the agenda."

Efforts by Israelis, such as offering benefits to olim who choose certain cities as their first home and opening the new absorption centre in Tel Aviv for young people, "show that Israelis have a real concern for western olim," she said.

She said the fair is useful even for those who are planning aliyah in the next year or two. "Information and intelligence are the most important tools in making aliyah and for immigration in general."

Sela said May 5 has been set aside as a special aliyah day. "Anyone who chooses to move to Israel on that day will enjoy an extended benefits package."

The fair begins at 7 p.m., and two consecutive sessions will run all evening. For information, call 416-633-4766.

Theatre group raises funds for abused women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A performance of song, dance and script by women for women will raise funds to bring awareness to domestic abuse in the Jewish community.

To be held March 31 at 7:30 p.m. at Leah Posluns Theatre, the show, Koleinu, features a group of six performers who have teamed up with Jewish Family & Child to support its programs for abused women.

Rivka Lomiansky, 24, who runs Neshamah, a musical theatre group for Torah-observant girls, said the women originally got together to look for an opportunity to perform in a way that expresses their values.

"We have created modern but modest dances," Lomiansky said.

The idea behind the show, she said, is to be a voice – Koleinu means "our voice" in Hebrew – for those who need it, and to let people in abusive relationships know that there are people who care.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of Jewish Women International of Canada, said that abuse in a relationship knows no bounds.

"It can happen in any group – high education or no education, rich or poor, secular or religious," she said.

Lomiansky said the evening will include a raffle, women artisans selling work, and kosher food. For information and tickets, call 416-636-5984, ext. 321, or visit koleinu.eventbrite.com.

SOUPER SUNDAY: Morris Winchevsky School students and friends display hand-painted soup bowls that they decorated at their Wacky Purim Party on March 9. A mishloach manot project, the bowls will be used at the Winchevsky Centre's community fundraiser, Souper Sunday, at 11 a.m. on March 30, to benefit the North York Harvest Food Bank and Jewish Family & Child. The event, which includes lunch, is open to the public.

Rockin' Toronto's PR scene

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

To hear her tell it, Debra Goldblatt had an awkward adolescence. Somewhat chubby, less-than-popular and a late-bloomer to boot, she always felt a little out of place among her peers.

Not anymore.

Presiding over her successful boutique public relations firm, rock-it promotions, the 34-year-old has blossomed into a major publicist and a force to be reckoned with on Toronto's competitive public relations scene.

Somewhere, Goldblatt's inner child is beaming.

Her firm celebrated its eighth anniversary in February, and its resilience is emblematic of Goldblatt's desire to work in a milieu she loves.

Foundin the firm in 2000, around the time her mother was dying of cancer, Goldblatt set out on a mission to take control of her life and succeed as a businesswoman.

"That was the worst time in my life," she says, adding that her parents supported her new endeavour by buying her a computer.

"I had no idea what I was doing," she confides. "I had no car, no bank account."

Still, her business flourished, as did her sense of purpose, something that had been missing early on in her life.

After she quietly nurtured a talent for writing throughout her high school years in Toronto, a close friend encouraged her to apply to Concordia University's creative writing program.

Based on the strength of her writing, Goldblatt was accepted at the Montreal university and quickly determined she had found her new life path.

"From that point on I haven't looked back," she told Heebonics over lunch at a trendy St. Clair Avenue West eatery last month. "That's when I found myself as an adult and realized the importance of doing something that you love. I found this escape where I could sit and write all day and be with people who were a little quirky and not quite the kids I grew up with. I felt totally normal in this environment, and not everybody finds that."

Goldblatt took her love of writing and honed her skills working at various PR firms in Toronto in the late 1990s.

It was a career tailor-made for her, she said, noting that even as a child she always had an ability to mediate and troubleshoot quarrels.

"As a kid, I wanted to be a judge," Goldblatt confessed. "But then I learned you had to be a lawyer first and that was too much school. I wasn't big on school."

She credits much of her inherent negotiating skills to her father, a former National Hockey League player representative.

"Watching him in his business informed me a lot more than I realized," she said, adding that growing up with a constant lineup of NHL players around made her immune to the star power associated with the status and lifestyles of high-profile athletes.

To this, Goldblatt modestly adds that boyfriends would come to her parents' home and be blown away by a basement full of official NHL paraphernalia. To her, it was just the basement.

That ability to downplay what others would thrill over has been a distinct advantage for her over the years, as rock-it promotions' roster of clients gradually built up a veritable who's who of popular Canadian artistic talent, including CTV's Canadian Idol judges, broadcaster Jian Ghomeshi and actor Kristin Booth among others.

Beyond that, the firm also represents business clients and events such as the L'Oreal Fashion Week, Conair Canada and the Worldwide Short Film Festival.

Rock-it's association with the entertainment industry stemmed from an incident in 1999, while Goldblatt was employed by a now-defunct Toronto PR firm.

She was able to cultivate a relationship with then-little-known Canadian actress-director and Oscar-nominee Sarah Polley, she said. When the PR firm decided not to represent her over what seemed a minor detail, Goldblatt took it upon herself to court Polley on her own time as a freelance publicist and ended up representing her for that year's Toronto International Film Festival.

Though rock-it no longer represents Polley, she's still in touch with Goldblatt. And Goldblatt still marvels at the way it all came together.

"Sarah was amazing and I'll always thank her for that. She gave me my first real break. She's a beautiful person."

That her firm continues to be so successful is a testament to both Goldblatt's personal ethos and her business philosophy.

Courteous, respectful, feet firmly planted on the Rock-it promotions publicist Debra Goldblatt's determination keeps her PR firm a force to be reckoned with.

ground (though she admits she was a "party girl" in her younger days), Goldblatt seems able to confront any social or business situation with equanimity.

"I've never had to solicit a client. Not once. That's the truth," she swears. "It is imperative that younger people getting into this business understand the importance of word-of-mouth. If you do a good job for one client, you'll get 10 calls from it. Because people will want to know who did their PR. It's the first thing that people ask - if there's great buzz and a ton of press and people are going 'Holy moly! That project is everywhere,' people will call."

Beyond that, Goldblatt and her husband, actor Matt Austin, have rediscovered a need to celebrate their Jewish roots.

Looking forward to having children at some point, Goldblatt said, "It's interesting that [Judaism] has become more important all of a sudden in my life. I'd like to continue the holidays and Shabbat dinners now with my family."

Goldblatt added that she makes it her policy to never work during the High Holy Days.

Eight years on and her love for the business is undiminished.

"Getting to work with real Hollywood stars really is amazing. That's what gets me going," she said. "There's something beautiful and shiny about the artists in this industry."

Purim cards for Sderot kids

Students at Or Haemet Sephardic School hold Purim greeting cards for children in Sderot, the city in the Negev that has suffered Qassam rocket attacks from nearby Gaza for several years. With them is Michael Ettegui, founder of Yaldeinu, an organization that supports formal and informal Jewish education. The cards are part of Yaldeinu's Purim Drive for the Children of Sderot. Half a dozen synagogues and schools in Toronto and Montreal took part in the drive.

Obituary

Community stalwart worked to age 95

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A stalwart of Toronto's Jewish community, Sam Sable died at Baycrest Hospital on March 14. He was 95 years old.

One year ago, he was honoured by Associated Hebrew Schools for more than 60 years of work on behalf of the school and the Jewish community. A fund was established in his name at the time to provide tuition assistance.

A strong proponent of Jewish education who helped establish a fund in support of Jewish education in 1947, Sable was a founder and the first president of Toronto's community Jewish high school, now known as the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

He was also involved in the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, and was a veteran fundraiser for Associated and other causes.

A former president of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation whose history with the shul goes back to the 1940s, Sable was also involved with many Israel-based hospitals and universities, as well as Baycrest, and the United Jewish Welfare Fund (a forerunner of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, where he served as the organization's first president).

Sable's efforts extended outside the Jewish community, too, where he was a board member of the Columbus Centre, an Italian Canadian community centre. He was honoured by the City of Toronto for his volunteer work.

Born in Zhitomir, in what is now Ukraine, in November 1912, Sable left with his family for Winnipeg as an infant. They later settled in Toronto, where he attended the Toronto Hebrew Religion School, known as the Simcoe Street Talmud Torah, an early incarnation of Associated.

Sable's father, who had a store on York Street, used to seek out Jews arriving at the nearby train station and offer them assistance. Sable thus learned to show concern for other Jews and help those in need, Rabbi Asher Vale said in a eulogy.

A graduate of Jarvis Collegiate, Sable entered the University of Toronto but left during the Depression to work in the family shoe store after his father suffered a stroke.

He later achieved financial success buying and managing properties, and continued to go to work almost every day until January. A regular at Shabbat morning services, Sable switched in later years to Beth Tzedec Congregation, which was closer to his home.

In his volunteer work, Sable gave not only of his money, but of his "time, effort, body and soul," Rabbi Vale said at the funeral.

Sable's grandson, Jordan Sable, a teacher at TanenbaumCHAT, recalls his grandfather telling him, "After family, community is everything."

He remembers his grandfather as a voracious reader and a "loving, strong, constant and incredibly energetic" force. The family patriarch took on a more nurturing role after his wife Jean died 15 years ago, taking his family out for dinner and attending his great-grandchildren's birthday parties and school functions, Jordan said in a eulogy.

Sable was "one of a kind," said Jordan's brother Josh, who like his brother is an educator at TanenbaumCHAT.

Sable had "a real zest and passion for life, and was always very positive. He was an extremely warm, and loving, and giving grandfather," Josh Sable told The CJN.

Sable is survived by his three children Marlene Weller, Martin, and Heather Sable, five grandsons, and eight great-grandchildren. He was predeceased by his wife Jean, and by his siblings Rose, Lily, Sam (from whom he differentiated himself by adding a middle initial to his name) and Florence.

Sam Sable

An era has come to a close

By DONALD CARR

Sam Sable was slight of physical build, but to the community, he was a giant.

There was hardly a position in a community organization that he did not hold during his many years of service.

It wasn't until the 1950s that I saw Sam in action at community meetings. I marvelled at his grasp of convoluted, even tortuous, issues facing the kahal.

Sam's clear voice rang out in the halls of 150 Beverley St. at the offices of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, as he took principled position after principled position. While he was a strong advocate for the day school system at every opportunity, his purview was not restricted to that. There wasn't an issue involving Jews and the Jewish community – locally, across Canada, in Israel and throughout the rest of the Jewish world – that didn't attract his attention. And, while he could become exercised and even irate, he never lost his gentlemanly approach.

Over the years, as he withdrew from active participation, he maintained his interest in everything going on in the Jewish world around him. I recall that he attended a meeting of past presidents of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto just a year or two ago and offered comments and suggestions on each agenda item.

To be at a simchah attended by Sam, was to know that he would lead the Birkat Hamazon, for he delighted in doing so, and in a voice that required no microphone and in a manner that demonstrated – every time, all the time – his love for his people and his religion.

Notwithstanding his commitment to Orthodoxy and his presidency of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, he never shied away from participating fully in services conducted by the other streams of Judaism. It was neither in his personality nor in his religious belief to question the appropriateness of such participation. To him, a Jew was a Jew, and he never subscribed to boycotting a different mode of prayer to the same God.

An era has come to a close. I will miss him, as will so many others. He left not only a good name, but also an indelible mark on so many facets of this Jewish world. He left legacies for generations of schoolchildren and citizens, who knew him not, but who benefited from his good works and his benevolence.

Donald Carr is president of The CJN.

Hillel president receives UWO award

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Kyle Lichtman, president of Hillel at the University of Western Ontario, received the Honour W Award last week for his "outstanding contributions to the community."

The award, which was presented to Lichtman on March 19, is given annually to a maximum of six members of the Western community and is sponsored by the University Students' Council.

Lichtman, a 21-year-old politics and philosophy student at UWO who is originally from Toronto, said that growing up as a Jewish student and involving himself in community activism has been an integral part of his life.

"I challenge myself to engage people. People aren't coming to university to necessarily be Jewish, but we provide programming through Hillel that makes them feel comfortable and makes Hillel more approachable than anything else. It shows them that doing such a simple act is acting Jewish and staying involved in the Jewish community."

He said that he's been involved with London Jewish Campus Service, under which two clubs, Hillel and Israel on Campus, operate, and he's been involved with both since his second year on campus.

But since last year, he has been on the executive of Hillel, Israel on Campus and the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students.

Lichtman suspects that he was anonymously nominated for the award by someone he works with at Hillel.

"The person had to send in a write-up of what you had done on campus and I guess [the award goes to] whoever fits the criteria of making the most contributions to the Western community," he said.

As Hillel president, Lichtman has been involved in programs that help the less fortunate and raise money for a number of causes.

"We ran a program called 'Manicure For a Cure,' where we did $5 manicures and all the money went to breast cancer research. We brought in estheticians who needed community service hours and we decorated the University Community Centre pink," he said.

Lichtman said Hillel recently ran a program in which members served coffee, with all the proceeds going to a women's shelter.

He also had his hand in a fashion where all the money went to Africa isReal, a non-profit organization based on the values of tikkun olam "that funds leading AIDS researchers and doctors while aiming to raise awareness of the real issues plaguing Africa today through social action."

Earlier this year, Lichtman spent a week doing community service in New Orleans on a Hurricane Katrina disaster relief trip.

While Lichtman is being recognized by the wider UWO community for his contributions, he said he is proud to be representing the Jewish community on campus.

"Throughout high school as well as university, it has been important to me to represent myself, as well as the Jewish student community, in the best manner possible," he said.

His goal is to try to "get more people involved on campus and show people that Hillel isn't only for Jews and show what Jews are capable of and how acting in a charitable manner is Jewish."

Lichtman said that the most rewarding part of the work he does is getting students like him to engage in the Jewish community on campus and focus on positive, community-building events.

"I'm really proud of the type of programming that we're doing... Accepting this award gives me great pride in knowing that I have acted in a way that makes a difference and I hope that it inspires others to act in a similar manner as I have learned from those before me."

PASSOVER FOOD IDEAS

Shifting into Passover mode

Passover customs vary from country to country, community to community and family to family, but what rarely changes is the gathering of family and friends for the ritual seder that is decidedly different from any other holiday meal.

Editorial

Not only do we tell the story of the ancient Hebrews' liberation from slavery in Egypt about 3,000 years ago, we also prepare a number of foods that commemorate the event.

These symbolic foods include wine, matzah, a lamb bone, roasted eggs, bitter herbs, a green vegetable and charoset.

Families, however, often put their own twist on the traditional foods. Some replace the lamb bone with a turkey or chicken bone, while vegetarians may use a roasted beet and feminists add an orange to their seder plate.

Recipes for charoset, which represents the mortar used by Hebrew slaves to make bricks, vary the most, often according to country.

While a typical east European charoset is usually made of apples, walnuts, spices and wine, Sephardi charoset may include raisins, figs, dates and sesame seeds.

We've included a number of charoset recipes this year, for those who want to add a global influence to their table, and we are offering a variety of recipes for first-time cooks, seasoned chefs or those who just want to add something different to their Passover menu.

In the midst of your cleaning, preparing and planning for Passover, we want you to take a break and enjoy our holiday food pages. You might find something totally new to you, or you might discover an alternative way to make an old favourite.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a chag kasher v'samayach. —C.B.

Mix meat with fruit to add sweetness

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH

Special to The CJN

I'm not sure if it's the thought of warmer climes during our months-long winter cold that has me pairing fruit with meat. Or if it's because I'm from Montreal where residents, I'm told, have an unusual affinity for sweet and savoury combinations. Or, perhaps, it's as simple as the fact that I have a sweet tooth.

Whatever the reason, I'm especially fond of roasting all manner of meat, red meat or fowl, with fruit stuffings, glazes and accompaniments. The fruity, sun-ripened flavour of fresh and dried fruit, in my opinion, helps bring out all the meat's succulence and adds an extra note of depth to the dish. For Passover this year, my recurring theme is to add a hint of fruit, be it to lamb shanks, turkey breasts or the finale of the meal.

So, even though the first seder falls in April, with its promise of sun in the following weeks, it's easy to provide a delicious jump-start to warmer weather with these pleasing fruit-enhanced main courses.

BRAISED LAMB SHANKS WITH RED WINE AND PRUNES

This deeply satisfying dish, with its richly coloured and flavoured sauce, can be made ahead. In fact, it's even better made the day ahead, to let the flavours mingle and develop.

1/2 cup finely ground matzah meal
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
6 lamb shanks (each about 1/4 lb.)
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 large onion, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced

3 carrots, finely chopped
2 stalks celery finely chopped
1 tbsp. dried basil
2 tsp. dried thyme
1 tbsp. finely grated lemon rind
2 bay leaves
2 cups chicken stock
2 cups full-bodied kosher for Passover red wine
1 cup canned crushed tomatoes
2 tbsp. tomato paste
1 cup dried pitted prunes
1/2 cup halved dried apricots chopped fresh parsley

In large shallow bowl, combine matzah meal, salt and pepper. Coat each lamb shank lightly. Reserve leftover matzah meal.

In large Dutch oven, heat half the oil over medium heat. Brown lamb in batches to avoid overcrowding, for about 8 minutes, turning to brown on all sides. Transfer lamb to roasting pan.

Heat remaining oil in Dutch oven. Add onion, garlic, carrots and celery, stirring to scrape up any brown bits. Cook, stirring occasionally, for about 5 minutes or until softened. Stir in basil, thyme, lemon rind, bay leaves and 1 tbsp. of reserved matzah meal and cook, stirring, for 1 minute. Pour in stock, wine, tomatoes and tomato paste; bring to a boil. Stir in prunes and dried apricots. Pour over lamb in roasting pan.

Bake in centre of preheated oven at 350 for about 2 hours or until meat is very tender and almost falling off the bone. (Recipe can be made ahead to this point, covered and refrigerated. Before serving, bring meat and sauce to room temperature. Reheat in oven at 250 for 1 hour).

Lots of ways to make charoset

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

I was once told by a chef that there are as many recipes for charoset as there are Jews in the world. I never truly understood that saying until I was a guest at a seder where two sisters, both in their 70s started discussing their grandmother's recipe. Their suggestions were similar, yet not quite the same. Neither had it written down, yet both thought that their version was the "one" they remembered from their childhood.

Charoset is one of the Pesach dishes that showcase the vastness of the Diaspora when it comes to Jewish culinary traditions. As people moved and settled into different geographic and ethnic areas, they incorporated local ingredients. Ashkenazi Jews used apples as their base. Sephardi Jews from the Mediterranean and other countries in the Middle East opted to make charoset with dates, figs and other dried fruits.

Although most North American Jews favour a mixture of apples, almonds, cinnamon and wine, this is by no means the only "real" combination possible. Walnuts, pine nuts, pecans or even chestnuts may be combined with apricots, coconuts, raisins, dates, figs or even bananas. Traditionally, charoset is eaten only during the seders. However, in my house, if there isn't any left over, I have to make another batch because everyone loves to eat it as a snack or a side dish long after all the guests have gone.

COCONUT AND LEMON CHAROSET

A touch of coconut lends this charoset an exotic flavour, and its chunky texture makes it a good accompaniment for roast chicken and carrots.

- 4 tsp. sugar
- 1 tsp. grated lemon rind
- 1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
- 2 gala apples, peeled, cored and cut into 1/2-in. pieces
- 2 Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored and cut into 1/2-in. pieces
- 1/2 cup coarsely chopped almonds
- 2 tbsp. coconut, toasted

Combine sugar, rind, juice and apples in a large bowl. Stir in almonds and coconut. Cover and refrigerate 2 hours. Garnish with parsley, if desired. Makes 4 cups. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

MAPLE CHAROSET

- 3 cups finely diced apple
- 1/2 cup sweetened dried cranberries, minced
- 1/4 cup Concord grape kosher wine
- 4 tsp. maple syrup
- 1/2 cup ground walnuts

Combine first 4 ingredients in a large bowl. Stir in ground walnuts. Refrigerate 2 hours in an airtight container. Makes 3 cups. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

SEVEN-FRUIT CHAROSET

Submitted by Ari Rosenthal of New York

A thicker, dense, almost jam-like consistency created by the dried fruit makes this charoset very different from the usually fresh fruit based variety.

- 8 oz. unsweetened coconut
- 8 oz. walnuts, chopped, or almonds, grated
- 1/4 cup sugar
- 1 tbsp. cinnamon
- 8 oz. raisins
- 8 oz. dried apples
- 8 oz. dried prunes
- 8 oz. dried apricots
- 8 oz. dried pears
- 4 oz. cherry jam
- sweet red wine

Combine everything except the jam and wine in a large, heavy pot. Add water to cover. Simmer over a low fire, stirring occasionally with a wooden spoon. Add small amounts of water periodically, so that the mixture does not stick to the pot. Continue stirring. Cook for at least 90 minutes. When the mixture is cohesive, stir in the cherry jam. Let stand until cool. Add enough sweet wine to be absorbed by the charoset mixture. Refrigerate. Makes about 5 cups.

DATE CHAROSET, SEPHARDI STYLE

Sephardi charoset can be made in various ways, but usually contains dates.

- 1 cup pitted dates
- 1 cup raisins
- 1/2 cup walnuts
- 1 medium apple, peeled and diced
- 1 tsp. cinnamon
- 1/4 tsp. ground ginger

3 to 4 tbsp. sweet red or white wine

Combine all the ingredients in a food processor; process until finely chopped. Put into a serving container and cover until serving time. Makes approximately 3 cups. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

TURKISH CHAROSET

- 1 cup seedless raisins
- 1 lb. pitted dates
- 1 orange, peeled, sliced and pitted
- 2 apples, peeled, cored and sliced

3 to 4 tbsp. sweet wine

In a large bowl, soak the raisins for about 30 minutes in hot water to cover. Drain. Place the raisins, dates, orange and apple together in the bowl of a food processor and process to combine. Add sweet wine to make a thick and chunky mixture. Cover and refrigerate until 1 hour before serving. Makes 3 to 4 cups.

Turkey always a crowd pleaser

Transfer meat to platter. Pour sauce into saucepan. Bring to boil; boil gently for about 15 minutes or until thickened and reduced by half. Spoon over lamb and garnish with chopped fresh parsley. Makes 6 servings.

ROASTED CORNISH GAME HENS WITH HONEY AND PEACH GLAZE

Grocery shelves are lined with an amazing array of differently flavoured honeys. Pick your favourite for this easy recipe. Cornish hens may be a bit more expensive than regular chicken, but the presentation of half a hen for each guest makes up for the budgetary lapse.

- 2 Cornish game hens
- 1/2 cup kosher for Passover dry white wine
- 2 tsp. honey
- 2 tsp. chopped fresh thyme
- 1 tsp. chopped fresh basil (or 1 tsp. dried)
- 2 bay leaves
- 1 tsp. grated orange rind
- 1/2 cup peach juice
- 2 small onions, sliced
- 1 tsp. kosher salt
- 1 tsp. pepper

Glaze:
1/2 cup basil leaves
1/2 cup kosher for Passover peach jam

Cut wing tips from hens. Cut through backbones to divide hens in half; trim excess fat and skin. Set aside.

In large bowl, stir together wine, honey, thyme, basil, bay leaves, grated orange rind, peach juice, onion slices and half of the salt and pepper. Stir in hens, coating well. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 4 hours or for up to 24 hours, stirring occasionally.

Preheat oven to 425. Discarding marinade, lay hens, skin side up, on foil-lined baking sheet. Gently loosen skin from each breast and leg, leaving skin attached on one side; place 2 basil leaves under skin of each hen. Brush peach jam evenly over skin. Sprinkle with remaining salt and pepper. Roast in centre of preheated oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until lightly browned; juices run clear when hens are pierced with a fork and meat thermometer registers 180F. Broil for 3 to 5 minutes to finish caramelizing the jam. Makes 8 servings.

DATE AND DRIED CRANBERRY STUFFED TURKEY BREAST

This impressive roast is destined to be a crowd pleaser. The date, cranberry and nut stuffing so expertly complements the turkey that it may just become a year-round entertaining specialty.

- 1/4 cup olive oil
- 1 large onion, chopped
- 3 cloves garlic, minced
- 1/4 cup pitted and finely chopped dried dates
- 1/4 cup dried cranberries (preferably unsweetened)
- 1/4 cup finely chopped hazelnuts
- 1/4 cup finely chopped fresh parsley
- 1 tsp. chopped fresh sage
- 1 tsp. salt
- 1/2 tsp. pepper
- 14 lb. boneless turkey breast, skin on
- 2 tsp. balsamic vinegar
- 2 tsp. potato starch
- 1/2 cup chicken stock

In large ovenproof skillet set over medium heat, heat half of oil. Add onions and garlic, and cook, stirring, for about 3 minutes or until softened. Stir in dates, dried cranberries, hazelnuts, parsley, sage, 1/4 tsp. of the salt and half of the pepper. Cook for 1 minute. Remove from heat and let cool slightly.

Butterfly turkey breast by slicing almost in half horizontally. Then open up like a book. Flatten slightly with meat mallet if necessary. Leaving 1-inch edge uncovered on all sides, spread date mixture evenly over meat. Starting at narrow end, roll up. Tie at 2- or 3-inch intervals with kitchen string. Combine 1 tsp. of the olive oil and 1 tsp. balsamic vinegar, and brush all over top of breast. Sprinkle with remaining salt and pepper. Heat remaining tablespoon of oil in skillet. Brown turkey for 2 minutes per side until well browned on all sides.

Transfer to preheated oven at 400 and roast for 30 to 40 minutes or until juices run clear and meat thermometer registers 170F.

Transfer meat to cutting board; tent with foil. Place skillet over medium heat; sprinkle with potato starch, whisking. Whisk in remaining tablespoon of balsamic vinegar and chicken stock, whisking to loosen any brown bits on bottom skillet. Bring to boil. Boil slightly for about 3 minutes or until juice is glossy and lightly thickened. Slice meat and serve with juices. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Hurtig is 2008 Winnipeg Negev Dinner honoree

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In choosing to honour community leader Larry Hurtig at this annual Negev Gala this year, the Jewish National Fund is recognizing an individual who has been involved in community work for more than 20 years and who is universally liked.

"Everyone I have spoken to who has heard that we are honouring Larry has expressed their delight," said Mel Lazareck, JNF's new president for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and northwestern Ontario and a previous Negev Gala honoree. "There is a real meeting of minds about Larry."

This year's gala is scheduled for June 17 at the Centennial Concert Hall.

Hurtig, the son of Bert and Rae Hurtig, was born in Winnipeg, spent his first few years in Saskatchewan and grew up in Thunder Bay. He came to Winnipeg to attend university.

A chartered accountant by training, he worked in public practice for 20 years. In 1981, he was invited by one of his clients, the Imperial Group, a property development company, to become the firm's vice-president.

When the Imperial Group went into receivership in 1986, Hurtig and Bob Shaer, an associate at Imperial, found themselves looking after some of the company's real estate properties that survived the bankruptcy. That association evolved into their present company, ASH Property Management and Chartered Financial Services.

Hurtig's community work began through the Talmud Torah when his children were attending the school. He organized the lottery campaigns.

Hurtig began volunteering with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg more than 20 years ago. He served as president from 1996 to 1999.

The highlight of his term in office, he recalls, was helping to inaugurate the Argentine Jewish immigration to Winnipeg. He made his first visit to Argentina in 1995 on behalf of the federation, accompanied by his son Jack, a representative of the provincial government. This was in response to contacts that then-premier Gary Filmon had made with a member of the Argentine Jewish community shortly before.

"I didn't know what to expect," he said. "All our meetings are arranged in advance. We visited the ORT school, synagogues, the university, and met with government representatives. When we returned to our hotel in the evening, there were always people waiting for us to ask us about Winnipeg and the Jewish community here. The Canadian Embassy was particularly helpful."

Larry Hurtig

Hurtig said he thought maybe four to six Argentine Jewish families would come in the first year, and maybe a dozen in the next. It turned out that more than 100 families have come to live in Winnipeg.

At first, Hurtig and his wife, Roberta, would greet all of the new arrivals and have them over for Shabbat dinner — until the numbers became too large.

Although the number of Argentine immigrants has dropped considerably in the last couple of years, Hurtig noted, there are still families coming from elsewhere in South America, and he expects the numbers from Argentina to start growing again soon.

The Hurtigs were also among the founders of the original Shalom Residence (which is similar to Toronto's Reena). Their son Bradley is one of the residents. Larry Hurtig has been president of the Shalom Residence Foundation since its formation 21 years ago.

As a teenager, Hurtig contracted polio. Although he recovered fully, about 15 years ago, he began to suffer from post-polio symptoms, which have limited his ability to walk.

As someone who understands the barriers faced by people with disabilities, Hurtig is now part of a group that has been lobbying new home and condominium builders to make sure their buildings are accessible to the disabled.

"It's not just for people who live in these homes," he said. "We want homes to be accessible for parents who may be handicapped who wish to visit their children."

Hurtig has been honoured in the past with the Jewish community's Sol Kanee Award and a Golden Jubilee medal.

He said he's humbled to have been asked to be a Negev honoree.

"It was a complete surprise to me. I thought Mel [Lazareck] was calling me to sell tickets. I am very honoured I have always been a strong supporter of the JNF," he said.

Israel puts out welcome mat for Que. tourists

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Bienvenue.

That's the greeting the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) is extending to Quebecers and other francophone Canadians through its new French-language website.

The site is designed specifically for the Canadian market, Jewish and, most importantly, non-Jewish. It's more than a translation of the existing English websites geared to Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom, and it differs somewhat from the one for France.

"It was long overdue," Jerry Adler, the IGTO manager of marketing and public relations, said of the creation of the site. The IGTO has had an English website for many years, and it revamped its English Canadian one last year.

While geared to any French-speaking Canadian, the IGTO is aware that Quebec, with its strong Catholic tradition, represents a potential source of many more tourists.

Accessible at www.goisrael.ca, the website offers information on Israel's history, government, geography, people and culture, as well as tips on how to plan a trip to Israel. Visitors to the site will learn that 25 per cent of Israelis speak French, and the site includes a Hebrew-French glossary of words and phrases that are useful to tourists.

"This website will create a new window to Israel for Québécois and for francophones across Canada, which will undoubtedly help foster greater understanding about this young country and its rich history, diversity and beautiful landscape," Yoram Elron, Israel's consul general in Montreal, said at the official launch.

"It was imperative for us to create this French-language site to improve our ability to reach out and address the needs of Canada's francophone communities, the majority of whom reside in Quebec," said Oded Grofman, director of the IGTO's Canadian office, which is based in Toronto.

The number of Quebecers travelling to Israel is not negligible.

Grofman said 30 per cent of the 60,000 visitors from Canada to Israel last year came from Quebec. Overall, 60 per cent of the Canadians were Christians, but only about one-fifth of them could be categorized as pilgrims or motivated by religious reasons.

Ideas are offered on tailoring a trip to specific interests whether they be religious, health-oriented, business-related or in a relaxing and interesting vacation.

Family raises funds to fight legal battle in life-support case

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — The daughter of an elderly Orthodox man whom doctors tried to remove from life support against his relatives' religious beliefs says her family is relying on outside support to pay its legal bills as it fights the case through the courts.

Miriam Geller, the daughter of Sam Golubchuk, 84, said her family "hopes to have the financial means to go to trial" against doctors who unsuccessfully tried to remove Golubchuk from life support more than 3½ months ago.

Geller said that as of last week, the Euthanasia Prevention Coalition of Canada "is the only one that has given us financial assistance."

But she also noted that Joseph Ben-Ami, president of the Canadian Centre for Policy Studies — an independent, non-partisan and non-profit think-tank — has set up a website for the Golubchuk family.

"[Ben-Ami's] organization has undertaken to assist us in fundraising so as to enable us to be in a position to go to trial," Geller said.

"If this case goes to trial, there will be a number of groups that will seek intervenor status"

"Although our organization does not usually get directly involved in fundraising, we see this as an important case, as there are some significant health care issues at stake," Ben-Ami said. "We don't want to see this issue lost because the family may not have the same amount of money at their disposal as the doctors and hospital."

Ben-Ami added that, "I fully expect that if this case goes to trial, there will be Justice Schulman's well-rendered decision," he said.

The doctors and hospital have 30 days to file an appeal of Schulman's interim decision from the date the order is signed.

In a March 17 interview, Kravetsky said the order would "be signed in the next day or two."

Golubchuk's son, Percy Golubchuk, an advertising salesperson for the local Jewish Post and News, said his family is gratified with the backing they've received.

"There are over 3,500 people from all around the world that have been writing to us on our website telling us that they support our position."

A trial would involve the testimony of two American doctors who reviewed the case and disputed the position of hospital physicians who said Golubchuk has minimal brain function.

Schulman ruled that until the trial, the hospital must provide Golubchuk with antibiotics, blood transfusions and CPR if necessary.

Life After Retirement

By: A. Goldman

An aging boomer... isn't that what they call us? Yes, I'm getting older, but I am enjoying my golden years—there is life after retirement! Like most people, I looked forward to retiring — days of leisure with piles of books to read. Of course I wanted to spend lots of time with the grandchildren, start an exercise regimen and even devote more time to communal activities.

Since my retirement, however, I've learned that leisure time is a bit over-rated. There are lots of hours in the day to fill. So I began looking for part-time employment — but not something monotonous and dull. After 40 years of work, I had a lot of experience to offer. Fortunately I found the perfect place for me. The work is very interesting and stimulating and I am able to choose the days that fit my schedule. It's a real pleasure collaborating with like-minded people in an informal, yet business-like atmosphere. And of course I bring home some extra money as well — which I can lavish upon my grandchildren!

Located in the Bathurst/Finch area, the company specializes in business-to-business, customer-related services. Each of us is responsible for 2 or 3 business clients, engaging in a variety of activities such as communications, market research, customer-service and project administration.

At first I thought my inexperience in these areas and my limited computer skills would be a problem. However, with onsite training I was brought up to speed very quickly. One delightful, yet unintended consequence of this training is that now I am able to teach my grandchildren a thing or two about using the computer.

Incidentally my wife points out that this would also be a wonderful opportunity for "empty-nester" moms returning to the workplace. When our last child went off to university, she felt ready for a new challenge that would stimulate her mind and get her back into the work force. A job like this would have been perfect for her at that time.

Grand-parenting is the greatest. A telephone call from a toddler can warm up even the frostiest morning! And who doesn't enjoy watching the kids flounder on skates for the first time or come running to proudly show you their report card.... Your grandchildren come first, but if you also want to include a part-time framework for yourself, Panmark is looking for someone just like you.

a number of groups that will seek intervenor status."

Last month, Justice Perry Schulman of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench granted the family an interim injunction preventing Grace Hospital from removing Golubchuk from life support until his case goes to trial. Schulman ruled that a court could intervene when doctors want to end a patient's life against the religious convictions and wishes of his family.

In November, the hospital took the position that Golubchuk had minimal brain function and that the decision to remove him from life support ought to be made solely by his doctors. But Schulman ruled that since doctors are not infallible and can make mistakes, a patient's family has the right to seek redress through the courts.

The family's lawyer, Neil Kravetsky, said last month that Golubchuk's condition had improved since the fall and that he was awake and "slowly being weaned off" life support.

Lawyers for the family and the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority, which oversees the hospital, were in court earlier this month trying to set a trial date.

That date looks to be at least nine months off — likely in December — partly because of a court backlog in Winnipeg, Neil Kravetsky told Sun Media.

He said a number of things would have to occur before the case would be ready for trial. "There has to be a full exchange of documents, we would want to have independent medical examinations of Mr. Golubchuk done, and examinations for discovery would have to take place," he said.

Kravetsky added that he hasn't heard from lawyers for the hospital as to whether they will appeal Schulman's interim ruling granting the injunction. "They may decide they would rather proceed to trial as opposed to appealing

New book's optimism doesn't jibe with Mideast reality

Dreams and Shadows: The Future of the Middle East, a new book by veteran Middle East correspondent Robin Wright, has garnered mixed reviews due to its seemingly misplaced optimism about the future of the region.

According to Reports

By

likelihood of an end to conflict in the Middle East... Hunkered under a siege mentality, Israel remains unwilling – and possibly unable to – satisfy the demands of Palestinians, Syrians and Hezbollah.

Obviously, Israel is unwilling to comply with the Hezbollah demand that it cease to exist. And to which Palestinians does Preston refer? Is it the Fatah faction, led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, which at least is officially committed to a negotiated peace with Israel? Or is it the Gaza-based Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction?

To be fair, Preston went on to describe Hamas as "a group of religious zealots that is not only deeply opposed to Israel's right to exist, but one that is also hostile to almost all of the norms and rights we consider essential for a just society."

In Dreams and Shadows, Wright, who reported for over a decade from the Middle East for the Los Angeles Times and now writes from Washington for the Washington Post, profited democratic and reform-minded activists in Iraq, Iran, Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Morocco, Turkey, the Gulf states, and the West Bank and Gaza.

Wright explained: "This is a book about disparate experiments with empowerment in the world's most troubled region. My goal was to probe deep inside societies of the Middle East for the emerging ideas and players that are changing the political environment in ways that will unfold for decades to come."

But, Preston noted: "Even [Wright's] own stories are full of admissions, caveats and concessions – and above all direct evidence – indicating that her optimism is largely misplaced because her local heroes aren't representative of local conditions, to say nothing of the realities of autocratic state power. Wright's encounters with the Middle East's democrats leave the impression that they are undoubtedly heroic, but also ineffective."

Ethan Bronner, in a New York Times review ("Undercurrents of Hope in a Region of Turbulence," Feb. 28), reached a similar conclusion, arguing that Wright's impatience to witness change in the Middle East led her to exaggerate the influence of liberal reformers.

Bonner wrote: "The spirit in the region that animated her quest three years ago [during the 'Cedar Revolution' in Lebanon, and Egyptian and Palestinian elections a few years ago] has been exposed as more illusion than real." He calls her reformers "marginalized and powerless."

Recent examples include Hamas' violent takeover of Gaza; Syria's and Egypt's crackdowns on reformers; Syria's and Iran's continued interference in Lebanese politics; and Iran's recent farcical elections in which conservative forces banned reformers from running for office.

A more realistic, if dire, view, was provided by Yossi Klein Halevi in "The Iranian-Israeli War" (New Republic, Mar. 11).

Wrote Halevi: "The Palestinian struggle is no longer about creating an independent state. It is about being a front-line participant in the Iranian-led jihad to destroy Israel, evolving from a nationalist to a religious war."

"Hamas [like Hezbollah] is an integral part of the Iranian war against Israel. Iran has trained hundreds of Hamas operatives and... continues to fund individual members of Fatah's Al Aqsa Brigades."

Halevi warned that a "ceasefire with Hamas... may well be the worst option of all. Hamas will likely use that interim period to turn itself into a second Hezbollah, equipped with Iranian weapons. And when Hamas feels empowered to break the ceasefire and resume its attacks, Israel will face a far more formidable enemy."

Canada, Israel sign security declaration

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

Staff Reporter

Canada and Israel have signed a "declaration of intent" to allow both countries to co-operate further on security matters of mutual concern.

The document – signed in Tel Aviv on Sunday by Canada's minister of public safety, Stockwell Day, and Israeli Minister of Public Security Avi Dichter – is intended "to enhance co-operation in the area of public safety" and is another indicator of continued warm relations between the two countries.

In a statement released by Canada's Department of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness, Day said the declaration would help both countries address "common threats" to national security.

"Today's declaration demonstrates the longstanding co-operation between Canada and Israel on public safety issues, and we welcome this increased co-operation in order to improve our countries' capacity to protect our citizens," Day said.

Among the items listed in the declaration, the two governments stated their intent to co-operate in the areas of border management and security; correctional services and prisons; illegal immigration; money laundering; organized crime; terrorist financing and trafficking in persons.

The document also outlines both countries' desire to set up "clear lines of communication and points of contact" between them; to "identify and share public safety concerns on the basis of threats, risk assessments, priorities, vulnerabilities, future. and consequences" and to "facilitate technical exchange co-operation, including education, training, and exercises," among other objectives.

The two countries also agreed to meet annually and "as needed" to work on and maintain security programs and "best practices."

Last October, Dichter and Day met in Ottawa while the Israeli minister was on a week-long trip through North America.

At the time, a report in the Jerusalem Post announced the two countries had signed an "interim agreement" on security matters after their meeting.

That report was premature, but on Monday a spokesperson for Day confirmed to The C/N that the new agreement was the result of "ongoing talks" between the two governments and is only intended as a "preliminary declaration" to help solidify the framework for more substantive work in the

No fixed schedule has been set, the spokesperson said.

Rights Council hears from Jewish refugee

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A United Nations body with a history of passing anti-Israel resolutions heard about a different side of the Arab-Israeli conflict last week when a Jewish refugee described her family's eviction from the home they had occupied in Libya for hundreds of years.

Regina Bubli-Waldman told the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) in Geneva that her family was expelled from Tripoli by the Libyan government after the 1967 Six Day War.

During that conflict, mobs turned out in the streets shouting "Slaughter the Jews." They burned her family's warehouse and it was only thanks to a neighbour's intervention were they able to flee. One month later, the Libyan government ordered all the country's Jews — there were 36,000 in 1948 — to leave. Their homes and other property were confiscated, she said.

Speaking under the auspices of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), Bubli-Waldman, who lives in San Francisco, said her family's fate mirrored that of many other Jews.

"I appear before you today not alone, but representing the nearly one million Jews resident in North Africa, the Middle East and the Gulf region at the turn of the century," she said. "Today, less than 5,000 Jews remain. Their plight and flight from 10 Arab countries has been ignored by the international community."

Bubli-Waldman — a co-founder of the San Francisco-based group JIMENA, Jews Indigenous to the Middle East and North Africa — appeared before the UNHRC in her great grandmother's wedding dress "to celebrate my heritage and mourn its loss."

She was only six years old when she first experienced hatred. During an arithmetic class in the local school, her teacher posed an arithmetic question: "If you have 10 Jews and you kill five of them, how many Jews do you have left to kill?"

"That was a traumatic and painful experience. I came home crying," she said.

Bubli-Waldman told the rights council that "after having to rebuild my life, I do not appear here with a bomb in my hand nor with hatred in my heart, but armed with these truths:

"That Jews are an indigenous people of the Middle East," that Jew were victimized by the state policy of various Arab regimes; and that the UN High Commissioner for Refugees has ruled Jews from Arab lands were bona fide refugees and "victims of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

She added: "The exclusion and denial of these truths will prejudice authentic negotiations and undermine the justice and legitimacy of any Middle East peace negotiations."

Bubli-Waldman's presentation was received respectfully, said Sylvain Abitbol, co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress and a member of JJAC's executive.

Her presentation was important in ensuring the UN body recognized that "Jews from Arab lands are refugees and should be considered as such," he said.

It also corrects the international record on behalf of the children of Jewish refugees, who have lost "a whole culture of Jews from Arab lands," he added.

Abitbol, himself a refugee from Morocco, said the speech was part of a broader campaign to bring attention to the plight of Jewish refugees. The day before Bubli-Waldman's presentation to the council, the same speech was given to a gathering of non-governmental organizations, he noted.

Stan Urman, executive-director of JJAC, said the organization is dedicated to raising the issue of Jewish refugees to all members of the so-called "quartet," which is supervising Mideast peace efforts. The "quartet" consists of the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations.

The UNHRC has been notorious for its "assault on Israel," Urman continued. "We thought it necessary to make a statement that, thanks to Israel, there was a home for the one million Jewish refugees."

The United Nations and the UNHRC continue to focus on alleged Israeli misdeeds, but "not one UN resolution has ever dealt with the issues of Jewish refugees from Arab countries. JJAC seeks to restore the plight and the truth of the Jews from Arab countries to the Middle East narrative from which they have been expunged and eclipsed," Urman said.

Late last year, JJAC researchers uncovered a 1947 Arab League document that outlined a policy of expulsion and robbery of longtime Jewish citizens.

The Arab League's proposed law was approved by Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Iraq and implemented by other nations. It provided that Jews would be considered "members of the Jewish minority of the state of Palestine" and have their bank accounts frozen and used to finance "resistance to Zionist ambitions in Palestine..." Jews believed to be active Zionists would be interned as political prisoners and their assets confiscated.

Strike Jews 'everywhere,' Al Qaeda No. 2 tells Muslims

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — In a new audiotape released Monday Al Qaeda's deputy leader called on Muslims to strike Israeli, Jewish and U.S. interests in revenge for Israel's ground incursion in the Gaza Strip earlier this month.

Ayman al-Zawahiri said attacks should not be limited to places in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

"Today there is no room for he who says that we should only fight the Jews in Palestine," he said. "Let us strike their interests everywhere, just like they gathered against us from everywhere."

The recording by al-Zawahiri came on the heels of a message earlier this month from Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden calling a holy war to liberate Palestinian lands — a new push by the terror network's leadership to use widespread anger over the Gaza violence to whip up support.

The authenticity of the four-minute, 44-second audiotape could not be independently confirmed. But the voice on it resembled that of al-Zawahiri on previous audio and videotapes confirmed to be his. It was posted on an Islamist website where Al Qaeda usually releases its statements, and a banner advertising the tape had the logo of Al Qaeda's media arm, Al-Sahab.

"Muslims, today is your day. Strike the interests of the Jews, the Americans, and all those who participated in the attack on Muslims," al-Zawahiri said.

Al-Zawahiri continued: "Monitor the targets, collect money, prepare the equipment, plan with precision, and then — while relying on God — assault, seeking martyrdom and paradise."

Israel launched the Israeli Defence Forces operation in early March to combat terrorists' rocket attacks on communities bordering the coastal strip. Two IDF soldiers were killed and eight were wounded, one moderately. Some 120 Palestinians were killed in the operation.

Speaking of Jews outside Israel, al-Zawahiri said: "Let them know that they will get blood for every dollar they spend in the killing of the Muslims, and for every bullet they fire at us, a volcano will turn back on them."

He added: "They cannot expect to support Israel, then live in peace while the Jews are killing our fugitive and besieged people."

Al-Zawahiri also referred to the publishing of a cartoon seen as insulting Islam's Prophet Muhammad in Danish papers. The cartoons, which were first printed in 2006 and reprinted this month, angered many Muslims.

"They will never be able to insult and make a mockery out of our Prophet, peace and prayers of Allah upon him," al-Zawahiri said.

Al-Zawahiri also accused Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak of colluding with Israel in besieging Gaza. Egypt has sealed its border with Gaza since the Palestinian terror group Hamas took over the territory last year.

He said Mubarak repeats "the same dirty role as the Lebanese Phalangists" — a Christian militia that was allied with Israel in Lebanon's 1975-1990 civil war and was blamed in the massacre of Palestinian refugees in the Beirut camps of Sabra and Shatila.

In an audio recording aired by Al-Jazeera last week, Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden called on Palestinians to use "iron and fire" to end the Israeli blockade of Gaza and liberate their country. The pan-Arab satellite TV station said the tape was new.

Little progress on books
Palestinians have made scant progress in removing anti-Semitic passages from school textbooks, a new report says.

Palestinian Textbooks: From Arafat to Abbas and Hamas, the fourth such report published by the American Jewish Committee and the Center for Monitoring Peace in the Middle East, found little mention of Israel in the books and said anti-West hatred was a "prevalent theme." The report examined 42 Grade 11 and 12 textbooks. It found most maps don't include Israel and that Jewish links to some holy places aren't mentioned. Some Grade 11 books showed improvement, the study said.

African refugees in Israel

Some 2,400 African refugees have crossed into Israel from Egypt so far this year, officials told Ha'aretz. The total number that have entered Israel is estimated at 6,000. Some 2,600 of them live in Tel Aviv, many in poor conditions in shelters and parks in south Tel Aviv. Mayor Ron Huldai said the refugees will be moved to a tent compound with better conditions.

Swiss gas deal protested

The Swiss ambassador was summoned March 19 to the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem to receive a formal complaint after Switzerland agreed last week to buy Iranian natural gas worth as much as $30 billion (US). Swiss Foreign Minister Micheline Calmy-Rey announced the deal in Tehran. Her trip, the Foreign Ministry said in a statement, was "an act unfriendly toward Israel" and threatened U.S.-led efforts to isolate Iran via economic sanctions. Calmy-Rey, whose government favours talks to curb Iran's nuclear program, denied the gas deal violates UN Security Council sanctions against Tehran.

Violence, political future worry South African Jews

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER

JTA

CAPE TOWN — Violent crime, political change and an energy crisis are fuelling a growing sense of panic among South African Jews.

Several weeks ago, the Jewish community was shaken when a Jewish man in Johannesburg named Sheldon Cohen was shot to death while sitting in his car waiting for his son to finish soccer practice.

In the past few months, at least two other Jews were murdered in the same city, including an elderly man on his way to synagogue on Shabbat morning who was shot for the contents of his tallit bag.

The violence comes amid growing concerns among South African Jews about threats to the rule of law in the country following the election last December of the controversial Jacob Zuma to the presidency of the ruling African National Congress.

At its December meeting, the ANC passed a resolution to push for disbanding the country's crack crime-fighting unit, the Scorpions, whose probes resulted in an indictment against Zuma on counts of racketeering, money laundering, corruption and fraud.

With Zuma now leading the ANC, he is the favorite to succeed South African President Thabo Mbeki in 2009.

The Jewish community is "very nervous — the worst I've seen in the eight years I've been in leadership," said Michael Bagraim, president of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, the community's umbrella group.

To make matters worse, a local energy crisis has prompted frequent power outages in South Africa since the beginning of the year, hurting the mining industry, the bedrock of the nation's economy.

"People want me to look in a crystal ball," Bagraim told JTA. "They want to know if we're going down the same road as Zimbabwe, whether the crumbling infrastructure will destroy the economy and whether there'll be a future for their children."

Many Jewish leaders here are afraid that concerns about the country's future could fuel Jewish emigration, further depleting a community that has declined to 75,000 from a peak of 120,000 in 1970.

Zev Kregel, chairman of the Board of Deputies, in a recent open letter to the country's Jews, acknowledged "a great deal of negativity and uncertainty."

Kregel told JTA he sees a wave of emigration as "inevitable," yet he insisted that South Africa remains a good place to be Jewish.

"Our rights are protected as a minority, and we have the lowest anti-Semitism in the world," he said.

Though Jews may not be singled out here for being Jewish, as well-to-do South Africans, they remain targets of violent criminals who don't discriminate.

The Jews' exposure to crime, coupled with the country's political direction, is prompting many to rethink their future here.

One Jewish woman interviewed by JTA recalled her upbringing in Congo in the 1960s, when at age 12 she and her family fled the civil war there. She believes her family may encounter a similar scenario of violence in South Africa.

"I feel that the young people and those that can afford it are definitely going to see a future away from South Africa, because they have seen the writing on the wall," she said.

Ivor Davis, a London native who as a journalist saw his fair share of African history first-hand during 33 years in Kenya, 12 in Zimbabwe and the last five in Johannesburg, is also concerned.

A resident of the affluent Johannesburg suburb of Sandton, Davis has a guard stationed inside his house at night, and his property is secured with palisades and barbed wire.

"It's a shame that our homes have to be turned into fortresses," he said.

Aside from having to live under the threat of muggings, burglaries and car jackings, South Africans face the prospect of a president who himself has been charged with crimes.

In 2005, Mbeki dismissed Zuma as the country's deputy president after Zuma was implicated in a corruption scandal. The next year, Zuma went on trial for raping a family friend at his home. He was acquitted.

Zuma is under indictment now on charges of fraud and corruption relating to a bribe he allegedly received from a French arms company in connection with a controversial arms deal.

One Jewish property administrator, Frank Stuppel, said the prospect of a Zuma presidency is "most disturbing and very worrying."

"He has an unsavoury history, and I think that's a problem," he said.

But other Jews said they're not overly worried by Zuma.

Kregel contrasted the situation with B.J. Vorster, the president of apartheid-era South Africa from 1978 to 1979 and prime minister from 1966 to 1978, who had expressed support for Hitler.

"It's not like when Vorster came into power and Jews were scared — this was a member of the Nazi Party," Kregel said. For the time being, Jewish leaders are urging the community not to panic.

In his letter, Kregel wrote that Jews should maintain a sense of perspective and remember that South Africa has gone through "far more difficult" periods in recent history.

South Africa's chief rabbi, Warren Goldstein, urged listeners in a recent radio address "to see the bad and the good," noting that "South Africa is really the quintessential comeback kid."

Bagraim says media reports and dinner-party conversations rather than hard facts, are fuelling negative perceptions of the situation.

"My answer to people is, 'Let's not get panicked because of the herd mentality,'" he said. "The main and only factor which is a real issue is crime, and there we've taken the bull by the horns."

The Jewish community's 13-year-old Community Security Organization has assisted in rolling out a community watch program that puts armed guards on some street corners, runs vehicle patrols 24 hours a day and has a centralized call centre.

Community Active Protection, as the program is called, has reduced violent crime by more than 80 per cent in its areas of operation.

Nevertheless, Jews still live under the threat of violence.

Hayley Pogrud, an information technology specialist, was held up at gunpoint and robbed two years ago while visiting a friend in the Cape Town suburb of Constantia.

"There is an underlying tension that we all live with," Pogrud said. "But at the moment, we've chosen to be here."

We are almost through the toughest time of year — and what a winter this has been! The days are beginning to get longer and the temperatures are not nearly as cold. It's time to put away the heavy coats and boots and bring out your spring collection. Do keep in mind that your face, body and legs are still stressed out from the cold temperatures.

Spring beauty begins with cleansing, toning and moisturizing, morning and night — and don't forget to apply a mask at least once a week. Spring is a great time to renew your image and test out new products and trends. Matte foundations are in — even bronzers are matted!

This season, makeup trends include bright candy colours during the day and deep plums and purple for the evening. Smoky eyeshadow still remains hot; however, it is a lighter version with grey and metallic silver tones. Pastel eyeshadows such as eggshell blue, light green and lilac are being seen on the runways. Full eyebrows are the hottest look this spring, so don't be afraid to accentuate them with a dark-coloured liner. Cat eyes are back, so choose your favourite liquid liner or extra-dark pencil. Lips also make a statement, with colours ranging from pink, orange, hot coral, fuchsia and brown to the sexiest of reds. Make sure to finish your look with the same colours, and if you feel you want to be daring, try navy blue.

Eat your fruits and vegetables and make sure to drink plenty of water. With the weather now beginning to improve, make sure to put aside at least 20 minutes for your daily walk. Put that smile back on your face. Spring is here!

FIORIO — Hairstylist Maurice Fiorio tells us that for spring, layers and movement are in, leaning away from structure, and that sweeping fringes are staying in for the season. For styles, ponytails are popular, either loose, messy, wavy and to the side, or tight, high on the head, sleek and straight. For colour, natural monochromatic colour is in, meaning subtle shades of a single colour and tone on tone with little contrast. To brighten up your spring colour,

Sightsee while having a beauty treatment

At the Lotus Spa & Beauty Salon on Princess Cruises' Golden Princess, you can sightsee while having a beauty treatment. Have a facial while leaving one port, and the next day enjoy a body treatment on arrival at another.

From fall to spring, pampering on the 15th deck of this ship allows you to view California and the Mexican Riviera; from spring to fall, the Golden Princess heads north to Alaska.

Jeanette Oevering is the manager of the Lotus Spa. Trained as an esthetician, she hails from Holland. "Our staff consists of two estheticians, two ionothermists, two fitness instructors, three hairdressers, one teeth-whitening technician, two nail technicians [and] eight massage therapists," she says.

"We have international staff. We are all trained in different services using techniques from where we are from – Africa, America, Europe and Asia. There are treatments on this floating spa, such as the Ionothermie and La Therapie Facial, that are hard to find on land."

Oevering describes the atmosphere in the spa as calming but also very fresh. It is painted in tones of yellows, greens and whites, with a lot of light in the spa and salon. All the rooms have tiled walls. There are 10 treatment rooms, as well as a salon and a well-equipped fitness centre. Two of the treatment rooms are in the beauty salon are used for La Therapie Hydralift Facials and acupuncture treatments for pain management, weight-loss, stress and to detox.

Nine of the treatment rooms have one-way windows facing the ocean, so the client can look out without passengers who are walking the deck being able to see in. Soothing music completes the ambience of the rooms.

"A new service we do on the ship is the GoSmile Tooth Whitening Treatment that is used by many celebrities. This is a cosmetic service, not a dental procedure. The tooth whitening is extremely popular. It doesn't hurt the enamel," Oevering stresses.

She says Ionothermie is a detox firming treatment with which you can lose up to three to five inches in a single session. It is the most popular treatment on board, and she adds it will make you bathing suit ready. People normally book a course of three treatments. Afterward, the therapist recommends a followup program to achieve the best results. Oevering says you can still eat a lot of the ship's delicious food, as long as you make healthy choices.

"Our newest treatment is an Oxygen/Collagen Facial. It is a resurfacing and regenerating facial with instant results," she says. "We have the La Therapie Hydralift Facials – it is not just for mature skin, but for those from 18 years old. The Aroma Spa Seaweed Massage is our most beneficial massage as the seaweed is very cleansing and detoxifying. It is good for people with arthritis or muscle tension – it breaks down the lactic acid around the muscles.

"We offer the Hot Aroma Stone Massage using heated stones from Bali. We place them on the key energy points on the body, then we massage with them. This treatment rebalances the body."

Also offered are a couple's massage, body treatments, man-

icures, pedicures, and hair and barbering services. Men's barbering services are offered in packages. One package includes an express shave, frangipani scalp massage, haircut and spa mini facial for $79 (U.S.). The spa's clientele usually consists of 70 per cent women and 30 per cent men.

Products used in treatments and available for sale at Lotus Spa include European lines – La Therapie facial products, Elemis for face and body and Steiner hair-care products.

Also offered at the Lotus Spa are fitness classes such as Pilates, circuit class and yoga, and free seminars on topics ranging from weight loss and life extension to acupuncture and energy assessment. For $60, you can sign up for a partner massage class.

Those who make one too many trips to the buffet line and find their waistsline expanding can combat weight gain by exercising with a personal trainer during the cruise.

Spa hours are 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. on sea days and 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. on port days, to accommodate guests who have taken a land excursion while at port and want to relax at the spa once back on the Golden Princess.

For those who wish to have spa treatments and not go into port, there are specials advertised on the back page of the Golden Princess' daily newsletter, The Princess Patter. The information is also at the reception desk.

One port-day special is the Pick 'n' Mix. For $69 (U.S.), passengers can choose any three treatments from a selection that includes frangipani scalp massage; conditioning hair treatment; re-polishing of hands or feet; foot and ankle massage; hair comb out; or mini manicure.

To book a cruise on the Golden Princess, contact your travel agent or call 1-800-Princess. Services at the Lotus Spa and Beauty Salon can be pre-booked online or once on board. It is advisable to book early, especially on sea days and formal dress nights.

A million girls would kill for my job, right?

Dining with designer Michael Kors, drinking with fashion stylist Rachel Zoe, dancing with actress Selma Blair — a million girls would kill for my job, right?

I've been in New York for the past seven months working as an intern at Teen Vogue and Interview magazine, and quickly advancing to the ranks of front-row seating at Fashion Week. Sounds too good to be true, but before I go on, let's get a few things straight.

First, interning in New York City could not be further from glamorous if it involved dressing up in lederhosen. (Yes, gals, that means all fond memories you may have of L.C. and Whitney having a gay old time in the Teen Vogue office on the TV reality series The Hills can escape your mind now...) Although interns are the foundation of the fashion industry, they are treated as cheap commodities: willing and able bodies who salivate at the very thought of running into the likes of Anna Wintour, the editor-in-chief of Vogue magazine.

Second, attending Fashion Week in New York is far from fun and games. For more than a week, my schedule consisted of running across town, tape recorder in hand, from 9 a.m. to 3 a.m., and writing from 3 a.m. to 6 a.m.

But let's start from the beginning. After graduating from the fashion communications program at Toronto's Ryerson University last spring, I decided to try my hand in New York. Since I had no experience in the United States, I had to start at square one, the world of not getting paid — standing on my feet for more than 10 hours a day, lifting boxes heavier than anvils, running around town doing pickups and drop-offs at the whims of anyone who felt like it... yipee!

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The C/JN

My first day at Teen Vogue, I headed for 4 Times Square (the headquarters of Vogue, Vanity Fair and GQ) with an optimistic head on my shoulders and one-size-too-small boots on my feet. Just after I got there, I stepped into a closet chock-full of American Apparel leggings, Marc Jacobs dresses and Miu Miu heels, and I dropped my bags and got right to work.

Although a handful of interns were already there, the work never seemed to subside. Halfway through the day, my boss mentioned that one of us would have to run over to Louis Vuitton. Like any fashion enthusiast, I jumped at the chance!

With mock importance, I pranced into the store. Surely mentioning Teen Vogue had got to give me some clout, right? As soon as I mentioned the name, however, I was shuffled into the dingy delivery office to pick up the package. As I hurried back to the office, I realized that my brilliant plan of wearing size eight boots was starting to backfire. By the end of day one, I had cut into multiple layers of skin. Très classy.

After a few gruelling days at Teen Vogue, I was ready to switch gears into the arty world of Interview. Not only was the magazine known for keeping its finger on the pop-culture pulse, but more importantly for me, the magazine was also started by the absolute love of my life — artist Andy Warhol. Working there would be like walking in his footsteps.

The closet would be the closest I'd ever get to the likes of designer Halston, model Edie Sedgwick or the singer Nico, never mind that the office has changed location at least twice since Warhol's heyday and that Halston, Sedgwick and Nico have long since bit the dust.

The atmosphere at Interview proved to be more relaxed than Teen Vogue, though no less fascinating. Instead of editors barking orders, this time it was fellow interns! While out of the boss' earshot, my intern counterpart whispered sweet nothings such as "I just want to let you know, if anyone's going on a photo shoot, it will be me." Much to his chagrin and to my surprise, I was asked to help on the set on my second day at the magazine.

One sample-ridden day in the Teen Vogue closet, the boss called all the interns into his office for a meeting. It turned out that the actress Sarah Jessica Parker was coming to our office! Oh. My. God. My legs were jelly.

Scenes for the Sex and the City movie that included Parker's character, Carrie, were to be filmed at Teen Vogue. The very reason I moved to New York was going to be standing in front of me within a matter of hours! What to wear!

The next day, the office had been transformed into a movie set. Parker was in the building. May I repeat: Oh. My. God. After filming was through, I sneakily followed SJP into the bathroom. To say what? I had no idea. As I ogled her, dumbfounded at how truly beautiful she was, she smiled and made pleasanties. My only reply was "ummmmm."

Picking clothes for Chloë

As my internships were coming to a close, I was hooked up with the fashion department at Page Six Magazine, the new magazine offshoot of the New York Post column, to pick clothes for a photo shoot with indie actress and fashion icon Chloë Sevigny. A million girls would kill for my job, right? A million Americans may be. A week or so into the job, and thankfully after the photo shoot, I was called into the human resources department and scolded for not having the right visa to be working there. Not only would they not help me with getting a new visa, but I was also out of the magazine, for good.

After a few weeks of panicking, I was miraculously hired by Fashion Week Daily, the cult magazine read by fashion insiders across the globe, to report during Fashion Week. Since my visa was problematic, they agreed to pay me per day. It was my job to talk to every designer, model and celebrity who crossed my path.

My first assignment with the Daily was to attend a private dinner given by Banks Fifth Avenue in honour of Michael Kors' spring collection. Hard life, right? Arriving at the dinner, however, was a different story. I stood paralyzed at the door, imagining a group of editors inside, forks in hand, glaring at whoever had the nerve to interrupt their dinner. My ears were ringing: "A million girls would kill for your job!" More like, a million girls would kill themselves if they had your job.

After the initial freak out, I had no choice but to quite literally eat, breathe and live fashion. It was lunch with fashion critic Steven Cojocar, then off to the Marc Jacobs and Louis Vuitton party (oozing with actress Anne Hathaway, model Heidi Klum, actor Josh Hartnett and actress Ellen Pompeo, just to name a few). And as for my obsession with the ghost of Halston past? I got to sit front row at the label's relaunch... across from Liza Minnelli. At night, I shuffled between parties for fashion designer Matthew Williamson, model Agyness Dean, Sevigny and the list goes on. Afterward, I'd limp home, gift bags bursting, and drag my tired body to the computer and write what would then be put into print for the next day's magazine.

As my stint during Fashion Week has long since passed, this front rower is back at square one, Canadian passport hidden in her back pocket.

JOY AFTER RETAIL:

The story of Toronto's Cherry fashion dynasty turns a new page. Joy Cherry, last in a long line of Cherry-branded fashion boutiques, will be closing after nearly 40 years of dressing Toronto's best-dressed women. For decades, the fashion-forward have turned to Joy for their seasonal infusion of Valentino, Lagerfeld or Givenchy – among the many greats whom Joy has been privileged to know – or for firsts such as the Canadian launch of Vera Wang or Yumi Katsura bridal creations.

The petite Joy Cherry is part of a fashion dynasty of epic proportions. Four generations of her family have been transposing fashion from the runways of Paris or Milan to the wardrobes of Toronto. Joy is the daughter of Esther Cherry and sister of Alan Cherry and Linda Cherry, each a banner name in high-fashion retailing. She is also mother of Barry and Deena Weinberg, the names behind Toronto's Max Mara and Marina Rinaldi boutiques.

In recognition of Joy's place amongst Canada's fashion royalty, she was the only Canadian retailer honoured with a presentation to HRH Diana on the Princess of Wales' trade mission to New York.

As tireless on behalf of charitable causes as in the art of business building, Joy has raised hundreds of thousands of dollars in support of organizations such as the Art Gallery of Ontario, Montcrest School and Rosalee Hall. She and her late husband were the major donors behind the creation of the Dr. Fred Weinberg and Joy Cherry Weinberg Judaica Collection at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Today, Joy Cherry is preparing to say goodbye to retailing. Yet, the fashion world still fascinates her, as it always has – and will continue to be part of her life. The closing of her store, therefore, is not the end of the story, but the beginning of the next chapter. We invite you to stay tuned ...

New book on Richler published this spring

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

For a time after his death, Mordecai Richler's profile seemed to recede. The recent CBC production of his mid-career novel, St. Urbain's Horseman, did little to affect this development, as it garnered largely negative reviews. But this trend may change with the publication of this spring of Reinhold Kramer's Mordecai Richler: Leaving St. Urbain, the first major effort to take on the Richler canon and his personal and political impact on Canadian culture since the 2003 publication of Joel Yanofsky's Mordecai & Me: An Appreciation of a Kind. And there is more to follow, as novelist Charles Foran is at work on what might be called the

Norman Ravvin

"authorized" biography.

The book to read alongside these contemporary takes on the writer's legacy is Richler's 1955 novel, Son of a Smaller Hero. Published first in England, it did not receive a Canadian reprint for more than a decade, when McClelland & Stewart brought it out with an introduction by the B.C.-based critic and editor George Woodcock, who recognized Richler as one of the key young Canadian writers of his time. Woodcock began his introduction by quoting from the novel's opening paragraphs, in which Richler provocatively depicts what he calls the Montreal Jewish "ghetto." The streets he grew up on, Richler tells us, are guarded by "atavism," the attendance to ancient and outmoded custom.

This was the beginning of the Canadian Jewish lovehate relationship with Richler, but Woodcock correctly saw the novel as prescient of changes in both Canadian society and literature. The young man's view of a minority upbringing and the vistas provided by assimilation, had, in Woodcock's view, become the pre-eminent Canadian story.

Son of a Smaller Hero is an edgier book than The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, which appeared in 1959. It covers some of the same material and is, in some ways, a tryout for the later breakthrough novel. It is more obviously an autobiographical fiction. The main character, Noah Adler, has a mother and father who mirror Richler's own, as well as a maternal grandfather who closely resembles Richler's grandfather, Yudel Rosenberg, a Polish-born rabbi who came to Montreal. The fictional rabbi is referred to as a Chassid and "poet," while the actual grandfather is undergoing a rather quirky renaissance in Jewish studies circles, as his writings about the Golem and Kabbalah receive renewed attention.

Son of a Smaller Hero is a young man's book, and it has the rough edges to prove it. Its portentous epigraph from Dostoyevsky signals

Mordecai Richler

the author's postwar existential ideals, but Noah, the Richler alter ego, is not a true hard-boiled Hemingwayesque quester: no matter how much his maker would wish him to be. Noah abandons his St. Urbain Street family, but spends a good deal of the novel mooning about nearby, mourning his loss of male intimacy, bathroom humour and corner-store camaraderie. He even stands by his mother when she enacts what is obviously a high anxiety attack dramatized as a true collapse. A dalliance with a non-Jewish woman is a disaster from the moment it starts.

Son of a Smaller Hero captures Montreal in the 1950s. It alights again and again on St. Catherine Street, which was clearly a different sort of strip after the war than it is today. Richler would have his reader take it to be the city's Times Square, where streetcars and neon lend the pavement a cinematic sheen. The early '50s, too, was the time of an influx of Holocaust survivors to Montreal, and Richler is fierce in his satire of the established community's discomfort with Park Avenue being overtaken by what his characters refer to as greenhorns. Here we have one of Richler's strong suits: his willingness to say things out loud that others only whispered to themselves. With Son of a Smaller Hero, Richler became a key Canadian voice, as well as a writer ready to make enemies.

Norman Ravvin is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His essays on Canadian Jewish literature, including Mordecai Richler, are collected in A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory.

Toronto singer keeps her passion for music alive

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

It's been about 10 years in the making and she's had lots of ups and downs since but Ofir has finally released her self-produced CD The Passion Show.

The eight songs on The Passion Show are full of vibrant energy and dance rhythms that would be at home in the hottest dance clubs in Europe.

Ofir (Ronit Ofir Engel) combines Eurobeat with world music and American pop to create her own unique style, and her vocal range is truly beautiful and impressive. She also throws in some Spanish flavour on Never Call Me Babe, and on It's Awesome she mixes Chinese styles with a dance beat.

It's hard to find a basis of comparison but songs like Task of Mind and Outrageous bring Madonna's Ray of Light and Geri Halliwell's It's Raining Men to mind.

"People definitely keep saying Madonna," the Nahariya-born singer/songwriter says of her sound. "And even Celine Dion gets mentioned. When people tell me I can write for Celine Dion that makes me feel, 'Wow! That's great.'"

Ofir spent some time in New York (where she had a role in the pilot for TV's Sex in the City) before moving to Toronto in 2004.

Ofir combines Eurobeat with world music and pop.

While her music is pop/dance oriented she doesn't feel her lyrics are as throw-away as many pop songs. "I have a unique style. My words are not cheap. They're very calculated."

The song Fire Escape, for instance, was written after 9/11 when she was worried about the fate of a firefighter friend of hers. "I tried to imagine what it's like to be the wife of a husband there and you don't know if he survived."

Ofir has won poetry competitions in the past and last year released a spoken-word CD of her poetry Poetry of the Brilliant Silence.

She has also won several song-writing awards. An earlier version of the title track she recorded in 2004 placed in the Top 5 of VH-1's Pop Song of the Year Contest.

Some of the songs on The Passion Show were written 10 years ago and others are more recent. Despite all the promises and accolades she's had, getting this album out has been an arduous journey.

Shortly after coming to Toronto she was seduced by a shady producer who offered to record and distribute her album on his label. She was told she had to put $35,000 up front, of which she came up with $17,000.

Long story short, that deal fell through and she never got her money back.

Undaunted, Ofir finally decided to do it all herself and set up her own record label Passion Show Records.

While she admits it's been tough, it has been rewarding. "I sold 1,500 CDs on my own. That's very good for a small label. I'm working towards getting a good manager now and a booking agent to make this bigger."

Ofir has had some radio exposure in the United States and Toronto Exclusive magazine nominated the song Task of Mind for best dance song for 2007.

Ofir also does lots of charitable work. After the tsunami in Southeast Asia, she organized a toy drive for hospitalized children. In 2005 she recorded Natalee, a song for Natalee Ann Holloway who disappeared in Aruba.

You can hear and purchase her songs on her website www.thepassionshow.com and her Myspace page www.myspace.com/goldced. Try these: Task of Mind, It's Awesome, Outrageous and She Breaks Windows.

OXFORD ECONOMIST WINS $15,000 LIONEL GELBER PRIZE FOR THE BOTTOM BILLION

Oxford University economist Paul Collier has won the 2008 Lionel Gelber Prize for his book The Bottom Billion: Why the Poorest Countries Are Failing and What Can Be Done About It (Oxford University Press).

Judith Gelber, chair of the prize board and niece of the late Canadian diplomat Lionel Gelber, announced the winner recently in Toronto. The Lionel Gelber Foundation, in partnership with the University of Toronto's Munk Centre for International Studies and Foreign Policy magazine, presents the award annually to the author of the world's best book on international affairs.

Collier is to receive the award on April 1 at the Munk Centre, where he will deliver the Lionel Gelber Lecture. The event begins at 6 p.m. People wishing to attend may register online at www.utoronto.ca/mcis/gelber.

Jury chair Barbara McDougall, Canada's former Secretary of State for External Affairs, said The Bottom Billion "provides a penetrating reassessment of why vast populations remain trapped in poverty, despite endless debate over foreign-aid policy among wealthy countries and institutions."

In The Bottom Billion, Collier sees 980 million people around the globe living in "trapped countries clearly heading towards a black hole." Many are in Africa, but there are large pockets of severe poverty in Bolivia, Cambodia, East Timor, Haiti, Laos, North Korea, Myanmar, Yemen and elsewhere.

Collier asserts that the challenge of lifting them out of poverty is akin to rebuilding Europe after World War II, requiring not only immediate aid but also trade and military security. The sad fact of the new millennium, Collier writes, is that even as rich countries get richer, the bottom billion are sinking into intractable poverty that will have disastrous consequences for future generations unless practical – and sometimes controversial – policies and measures are enacted.

Names in the News: American playwright Marv Chernoff flew from balmy Los Angeles to Toronto a few weeks ago to see Teatron Jewish Theatre Company's production of his play Chaim's Love Song at the Leah Posluns Theatre. Arriving in the middle of a snowstorm, he initially regretted making the trip. Then he saw Teatron's production of his play and was thrilled.

"I expected a good production. My expectations were way too low," he wrote to director Ari Weisberg. "From start to finish, it was done naturally. The actors disappeared and became the characters they played. Each plot change came logically, properly motivated. The laughs were there. The dramatic theme even more so. The audience was movingly affected."

Chernoff said he'd been "mostly satisfied" with the many previous productions of the play he'd seen, but Teatron's seemed to surpass them all. "Never have I felt the script handled so lovingly, carefully and naturally," he wrote. "The acting, the direction, the work of the crew were all integrated, warm and first-rate." Kudos to Weisberg and cast.

Teatron has just announced that A Glimpse of the Light by Ben Finn and The Dybbuk by S. Anski will be part of its upcoming season. Tickets are on sale now. For more information, visit www.teatrontheatre.com or phone 416-781-5527.

Survivor's sculptures exhibited at Hamilton art gallery

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Upon meeting Ora Markstein — who is big as a minute and had a bubbly-like concern for a cold visitor on a snowy day — I could not grasp the commanding talent behind that sweet smile.

Markstein, 83, is an accomplished sculptor. Her current show, "Atelier: Ora Markstein," is on exhibit at the Art Gallery of Hamilton until April 27.

Carved by hand, her sculptures are formed from blocks of soapstone, marble and alabaster in every imaginable colour.

Born and raised in an Orthodox Jewish family in a town near Budapest, Markstein studied drawing and painting. When she was 15, the Holocaust began. She had met her fiancé, Francis, weeks before the men were taken away for slave labour.

Markstein, her sister and her parents, as well as her fiancé, survived the war. But at least 35 other relatives, uncles, aunts and cousins, died.

A survivor of Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen, Markstein returned to Hungary and reunited with Francis on Sept. 15, 1945. They were married 10 days later.

"It was the poorest wedding I've ever attended. And it was mine," Markstein says.

The town's synagogue was destroyed and the Jewish community was virtually wiped out. The wedding took place in an old age home, with cake and wine and a challah baked by Markstein's mother.

"Who cared at that time. It did not bother anyone," Markstein says. "What bothered us was that there were no Jews."

In 1946, the Marksteins travelled in an illegal transport organized by the Jewish Agency to a UN-sponsored refugee camp in Germany, where Markstein gave birth to their son, Igor.

A year later, the Marksteins went to France and then back to Hungary, which they left for Israel in 1949.

"We lived in utter poverty. We had no electricity for six years," Markstein says.

Igor demonstrated musical talent and began to study violin with a master teacher.

"I picked the violin because my sister played the violin. She saved herself and me by playing in the Auschwitz orchestra, which was ordered by the Nazis," Markstein says.

She also found a teacher and learned how to sculpt in clay and plaster.

Igor moved to Illinois in the early 1970s, and Markstein and her husband went to Montreal in 1974.

"I felt I needed some peaceful years. I started to carve stone here. I couldn't have done it anywhere else," she says.

In Montreal, Markstein received a scholarship to the Saidye Bronfman Centre. Her instructor saw her talent immediately. "You don't need me. Just work," he told her.

Markstein's husband was also an artist. He wrote poetry and translated classic works into English, French, German, Hungarian, Hebrew, Italian and Spanish. He found employment in as a teacher at Hamilton's Beth Jacob Synagogue's afternoon school, and the couple moved to the city in 1975.

Markstein soon had an exhibit at Hamilton's Jewish Community Centre. Many other exhibits followed, including two one-person shows in the 1980s at the McMaster Hospital gallery.

Her son, Igor, became a professional musician, even though Markstein would rather that he had chosen a more practical profession. Igor and his wife, both successful musicians, live in Florida.

In 1991, Markstein's husband died, and she did not sculpt for two years. She eventually realized she couldn't live without it.

"I had to. There was no use to punish myself. It did not bring back my husband," she says.

In 2006, Sara Knelman, the Art Gallery of Hamilton's curator of contemporary art, visited Markstein's studio.

According to literature accompanying Markstein's current show, her work often describes the pain of death and loss. "More often, though, she counters with explorations of love and spiritual renewal," it states.

The works explore her expression of three themes: love, loss and renewal.

"I think she is an exceptional sculptor. Regardless of her biography, she is exceptional," Knelman says.

"She has a beautiful classical style, which sometimes moves into a more abstract, almost deco style of sculpture. She finds life in these slabs and creates an emotional tension in the works and a kind of purity that comes through."

Markstein can't wait for spring, so she can return to her outdoor studio.

"It's like an obsession. You have a drive, you feel you have to do it. You just have to," she stresses. "It's a dusty dirty job. It's physically demanding. But what I get out of it gives me so much pleasure. I forget about the dust, the dirt and everything else."

Markstein's home is filled with sculptures, as well as her own drawings and paintings.

She says that as long as you are in good health, age should not slow you down. "I am just as interested in everything as I was 50 years ago. I am not going to sit down and stop."

"Life is hard. Some are harder than others. Our background is not normal, but life is still beautiful."

For more information about Ora Markstein's exhibit, contact the Art Gallery of Hamilton at 905-527-6610 or visit the gallery's website at www.artgalleryofhamilton.com.

Jailhouse violence threatens Itzhayek

BY DAVID LAZARUS

Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Saul Itzhayek's sister and an interfaith group of clergy issued a desperate appeal to Prime Minister Stephen Harper last week to increase Ottawa's advocacy on behalf of the Montreal businessman after violence erupted in the Indian jail where he's been held for the past 10 months.

They made the plea at a March 20 press conference at Montreal's Imani Family and Full Gospel Church, six days after rival gang warfare broke out in Motihari Prison and five days prior to Itzhayek's latest appeal in the local district court — scheduled for March 25 — in an effort to overturn his conviction for entering India from Nepal with an expired visa.

That motion was originally slated to be heard on March 17, the same day another prisoner was killed by two bombs smuggled into the prison, which has also been the site of riots and shooting deaths. Itzhayek, 42, was arrested last May for crossing into India from Nepal with a lapsed visa, despite ostensible assurances of safe passage.

"He's terrified," his sister, Sylvia Itzhayek, told The CJN. "He is in a cell adjacent to a man who might be the next victim. My brother refuses to come out of his cell."

"He called me five minutes after the bombing and said, 'I'm really, really afraid,'" she said.

"Now he's in a self-imposed lock-down."

The letter to Harper said the signatories — Rev. Daryl Gray, Father John Walsh, and rabbis Reuven Bulka, Reuben Pouppou, Michael Whitman, and Chaim Steinmetz — were "frightened" for Itzhayek's life, and it denounced the "blasé attitude" of Indian authorities. It called on the Indian government, "in the name of justice and security," to release Itzhayek immediately and allow him to return home.

It said Canada should follow up on its petitioning of India to pardon Itzhayek and "escalate and pursue" other remedies, such as deportation, a suspended sentence, and transfer to a Canadian prison.

Aspirals girls excel at rhythmic gymnastics meet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In one of the first competitions of the season, Jewish athletes from the Aspirals Rhythmic Gymnastics Club captured four of the club's six medals and took the first step toward the provincial championships in early June.

Performing in the 2008 Aspirals Valentine Classic, seven-year-old rookie Sasha Garber finished second overall in level 1B, in which she demonstrated her abilities with rope and in a free routine. (The free routine is the execution of rhythmic body movements without the use of one of the sports' hand apparatus — rope, hoops, balls, clubs and ribbon.)

Katerina Shimansky, age nine, came second all round in level 3A, working with hoops and in a free routine.

Ilana Enoukov and Ella Gutman, both 14, finished second and third, respectively, in level 5A, working with rope, ribbon and in a free routine.

Ayelet Reiss, 13, finished ninth overall in level 4A, working with a ball and performing a free routine.

The Valentine Classic, which was held at Bur Oak Secondary School in Markham, is an annual event hosted by the Aspirals. This year, it attracted 120 athletes from nine clubs in southern Ontario, including London, Burlington, Newmarket and Markham.

Reiss' accomplishment was noteworthy in that she is Orthodox and cannot compete on Shabbat, putting her at a disadvantage to other girls. "She's a really, really dedicated girl," said Sima Studin, president of the Aspirals club.

Dedication and hard work are necessary qualities for all top performers in the sport, she continued.

To excel in rhythmic gymnastics, athletes must possess "high flexibility, technical skills and good eye-hand coordination." Equally important is that performers "must be driven" and should possess a good measure of aggressiveness, Studin said.

"You have to be able to present yourself in front of judges," she said. "When your name is called and even before you step onto the carpet, you're competing, by the way you hold your head. Even before the music starts, you should look like a winner, and you should fight like a winner."

Top athletes combine all these characteristics while manipulating one or two apparatuses. The sport combines elements of dance and acrobatics and requires good balance and presentation. Competitors are judged for leaps, balances, pivots, flexibility, apparatus handling and artistic effect.

About 25 per cent of the Aspirals club — which holds some of its lessons at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre — consists of Jewish girls, Studin said. A good number are children of immigrants from eastern Europe.

Most enjoy the sport as a recreational activity, but others are more competitive. Many parents like the atmosphere at the club, which keeps the girls busy, provides a sense of accomplishment, creates lasting friendships and assists in maintaining discipline and good time management, Studin said.

Studin is confident that the Aspirals' girls will perform well at the RG Provincial Championships and RhythmFest, set for June 7 in Markham.

"Absolutely the girls can make it to the championship level," she said. "Technically, our girls are very good, and they show very interesting combinations."

Vienna sports club re-opens after 70 years

JTA

VIENNA — A Jewish sports club confiscated by the Nazis 70 years ago has reopened in Vienna.

Hakoah reopened recently in Prater Park on the site of its former headquarters.

The Karl Haber Sport and Leisure Centre features a jogging track, tennis courts, swimming pool, solarium, fitness room, cafe, restaurant and child-care facilities. Karl Haber was a Hakoah member who sought to have the club's property returned to the Jewish community after World War II.

The city of Vienna and the Austrian government covered the $11.5-million (US) cost of the new building. The reopening took place on the eve of the 70th anniversary of the Anschluss, Nazi Germany's annexation of Austria, which was mostly welcomed by Austrians.

Some 180,000 Jews lived in Vienna before World War II, when Hakoah was the city's biggest sports club. Approximately 10,000 Jews, many from central Asia, now live in the Austrian capital.

The creative spirit in seniors

By MICHAEL GORDON

The scene opened with old faces, withered and lined. Then the scene shifted to rural Alabama, and multi-coloured quilts filled the screen as they were hung on rope lines. These were the creations of Arlonzia Pettway, now 84, along with her friends and neighbours – a group of quilt makers from Gee's Bend, Ala.

It was at the end of the first full day of the annual conference of the Canadian Association on Gerontology, held this year in Calgary. The documentary Do Not Go Gently (the title comes from a poem by Welsh poet Dylan Thomas), produced by Melissa Godoy and her mother Eileen Littig and directed by Godoy, was being premiered to those at the conference.

Moving effortlessly from narration by quilt-maker Pettway, who started to make her creations when she was a small child in Alabama, to the story of Frederick Franklin, a 90-year-old ballet instructor whose illustrious career in classical ballet spanned decades, to comments on the world of music by Leo Ornstein, a 109-year-old classical pianist whose musical journey spanned continents and almost a century of playing, the film extols the creative forces that exist in all of us.

The segments highlighting the featured "stars" of the film are interspersed with scenes showing creative programs in long-term care facilities and senior centres where poetry, dance, music and art are produced by and integrated into the lives of individuals in the later years of life, many of whom suffer from complex medical conditions, including cognitive impairment.

The film was narrated by Dr. Gene Cohen, co-founder of the Creativity Discovery Corps, whose mission is to identify and preserve the creative accomplishments of under-recognized talented older adults. He is the first director of the Center on Aging, Health & Humanities at George Washington University, and a renowned scholar and researcher in the field of aging whose most recent focus has been on the creative spirit in seniors. His narration helped focus not just on the accomplishments of the unusually creative "stars" of the film, but on the marvellous and often untapped potential of seniors at all stages of life and in all living situations.

The message of the film was moving and uplifting. For those involved in eldercare, the plight of many in institutional settings is often a major challenge and cause for concern. Godoy has said that one of her motivations for producing the film was her experience with another project that took her to nursing homes where she observed the severely limited interactions of the residents and the lack of emotional, verbal or creative stimulation or programs.

In organizations and jurisdictions that recognize the intrinsic desire of seniors, including those with severe disabilities, for music, dance, art and words, and their responsiveness to these stimuli, programs are developed to seek out and promote the creative spirit often locked up in frail elderly individuals.

Over the years, I have observed and personally experienced remarkable expressions of talent by individuals and groups who have been given the opportunity and the means to express themselves. I have seen rhythm groups of people with substantial cognitive impairment playing drums and tambourines and xylophones create unadulterated joyous and compelling beat-filled music. Choirs made up of seniors of all ages entertain others. I have had patients undertake memoirs in their late years, in their quest to preserve their past and leave a legacy for their families.

The movie Do Not Go Gently is an eloquent reminder of the power of artistic creativity, which can and should be tapped in the elders we care for as family members and professionals, so that their talents can enrich their lives, the lives of others and the world.

Shabbos. The Day of Rest. What then would make more sense than the Shabbos nap?

According to the pundits at the Boston University's Center for Psychological Rehabilitation, a midday nap is a great remedy for a bad night's sleep. Studies at the Henry Ford Hospital's Sleep Disorders and Research Center in Detroit revealed that a two- or four-hour nap before being up all night helped individuals stay alert the following day. Research published in the Archives of Internal Medicine recently linked obesity to a lack of sleep; the less people sleep, the heavier they tend to be. Therefore, the Shabbos nap makes scientific sense.

There are variations on the Shabbos nap, which takes place Saturday afternoon. It changes depending on what time Shabbos starts and finishes, and what your responsibilities within the family are. As an example, if Shabbos starts at 4:30 p.m., it concludes at about 5:30 p.m. There is then little time to crawl into bed and get some rest because one needs to return to shul for the afternoon services shortly after lunch is over. The Shabbos nap will be short, and likely on the couch.

On the other hand, if Shabbos starts at 7 p.m. or later, there will be plenty of time to grab a nap. The napper might then likely climb upstairs and formally go to sleep in bed.

It is not uncommon in a household for the father and mother to split a Shabbos nap, especially if the children in the house are babies or toddlers. If Shabbos starts early, a good husband will tiredly suggest to his exhausted wife she finds some time to shluf (Yiddish for "sleep"). A good wife will respond this is unfair, but upon coaxing will give in and ultimately settle into their comfy bed, under their thick duvet, exhale and grab the moment and the gift she has received.

Camp can bring Torah to life

Epi on Education

While most of my columns deal with formal education – schooling – the work I do deals with the informal sphere as well.

Traditionally, one thinks of schools as an educational base for literacy and informal activities such as youth groups, camps, and Israel tours as places to nurture Jewish identity. But there are two flaws with that premise.

First, Jewish education, or talmud Torah has always had two functions: it is instruction for the future, but also a meaningful mitzvah in its own right. Studying a sacred text involves learning lessons to apply in one's life and, in itself, should be a significant spiritual moment. Experiencing the joy of Shabbat in a summer camp is, many times, a memory for life, but it can also translate into bringing more Shabbat into one's future life.

Second, the old walls separating formal from informal and literacy from identity are crumbling. Camps always taught swimming. Now, some teach Hebrew poetry. Schools run Shabbatonim so that some of the lessons taught in class can be applied to real life over a 25-hour period.

With that understanding, it's clear why so much effort is currently going into the promotion of high-quality Jewish camping. Camp has the potential to mix the forms of education in the most imaginative ways. One can be playing baseball and learning Jewish values at the same time. The forests and lakes of Ontario have messages in them that are straight out of our talmudic tradition. The 24/7 aspect of summer camp makes the educational experience a life-connected one, and not as artificial as the classroom can become.

But there is one other quality of camping that makes it unique among our educational options. Unlike school, camp is all about creating your own life away from home. Officially, you get to do things you can't do at home – and off the record, sometimes you get to do things you dare not do at home. In that respect, it's a creative and imaginative experience.

If an inspired educator can show children how to be creative and imaginative Jewishly, the kids are being trained to not only continue Jewish life, but to change it for the better. As my readers well know, I value Jewish creativity much more than Jewish continuity.

The shabbos nap

Let's go back to where the Shabbos nap takes place. If you were to enter a home of a family that celebrates Shabbos, you will witness much debating, laughing and discussion. This normally begins in the foyer, then moves into the living room or den, and ultimately makes its way to the dining room table. Once the Kiddush and Hamotzi have been said, it is time for lunch, which often includes a hearty slow cooker full of cholent. According to Wikipedia.com, cholent is a food of Ashkenazi Jews, a type of stew (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ashkenazi_Jews) that has simmered (<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Simmering>) over a very low flame or inside a slow oven for up to 24 hours before being served. It is usually served hot as the main course of the Shabbos lunch meal. A cholent can include potatoes, barley, beans, carrots, garlic cloves, mushrooms, fried onions and brisket. Sephardim have their own form of cholent.

This heavy and intense Shabbos afternoon dish will make even a type A personality tired. After lunch, those sitting around the table will make their way over to the couch or a large armchair and quickly doze off. Interestingly, many of the people I have known over the years who take a Shabbos nap prefer to do so on the sofa. This is likely because the couch is in greatest proximity to the table and allows the Shabbos napper to continue schmoozing with his family and friends while he/she falls asleep.

Studies show most of us are sleep deprived, slaves to schedules dotted with meetings, family responsibilities and a frequent need to extend the day so as to maximize its potential.

A Shabbos nap on the Day of Rest therefore makes a lot of sense. If you are a novice to this Jewish ritual, ask around to determine the best way and place to take a Shabbos nap. It is simple once mastered and marvellous for the digestive system, longevity and the soul.
